Publiſhers PREFACE.

IT would be needleſs to treſpaſs upon our reader's patience with a long previous account of the particulars contain'd in the following hiſtory, being fully convinced, that they are ſuch as will afford a profitable entertainment to moſt of our readers.

IT is neceſſary, however, that we ſhould ſay ſomething of the order in which we have placed this hiſtory, and the reaſon why we have varied in that particular from all the other editions of the works of this learned author, which have yet appear'd in print.

IT has hitherto been a cuſtom to place the life of F. JOSEPHUS, (which was written by himſelf in the fifty ſixth year of his age,) ſometimes after his antiquities, and ſometimes after his wars; for which we think no ſufficient reaſon can be aſſign'd, becauſe 'tis contrary to modern cuſtom to place the life of an author (though writ by himſelf) in the middle of his works; and therefore as critics cannot eaſily determine whether his Wars of the Jews, or his Antiquities, were writ firſt, we think the moſt natural method is to place the Life of the author before both. An account of the birth, education, and religion of an author (eſpecially when penn'd by himſelf) carefully read, ſerves as a comment to the reſt of his works, which it in ſome ſort illuſtrates, by inſenſibly conveying into the mind of the reader, a juſt idea of his temper, genius, ſtile, and way of thinking, and therefore, we think, deſervedly claims precedency of order, that people thereby may be able to form some judgment of his worth and abilities, before they proceed to read his other works: this seemed to us most natural, and consequently is the method we have followed.

We have likewise in this edition placed the defence of the Antiquities immediately after the Antiquities; and the martyrdom of the Maccabees immediately after the Wars; and the same argument will serve for this transposition, as was used for the former, viz. That it appeared to us the most consistent; and thus much for the order of the work.

And now we will proceed to shew some of the reasons which induced us to publish the works of this author.

We assure the publick, that it is with no mercenary view to our own private interest that we have attempted to publish this new edition, but only with a design to render the works of that learned Jew, Flavius Josephus, of universal use to all degrees of men, by giving the world a fair and just translation of the most curious pieces of history and antiquity, that ever were writ by any author, either ancient or modern.

To which end, we have indeed taken a great deal of pains, to render it more compleat than any other translation yet extant, by adding a great many useful notes to explain the most difficult passages throughout the whole book; and we have likewise been at a great expence, by engraving Maps and curious Sculptures for the better illustration of the history.

A great deal more might be urged in favour of this new translation, but as it might seem impertinent in us to be too vain of our own performance; and as we have no design to raise our reputation by undervaluing the labours of others, we leave the work to recommend itself; and as it is found to prove either good or bad, so we expect to be incouraged or discouraged, and no otherwise.

And therefore we intreat, that every one of our subscribers would carefully examine the subject of the following sheets, that they themselves may be able to judge of the merit of the undertaking.

DISCOURSES.

DISCOURSE I.

Wherein the Life and Religion of Joſephus is briefly examined, and an Account given of that famous Paſſage relating to our bleſſed Lord and Saviour.

IN this preliminary diſcourſe I ſhall chiefly enquire into the life and religion of Joſephus; a right underſtanding of which will explain ſome obſcurities in him, and remove the objections that have been made againſt that memorable paſſage concerning our Saviour.

He has given us the hiſtory of his own life, writ by himſelf at the age of fifty ſix; wherein he tells us he was of the ſtock and lineage of Aaron, and by his mother's ſide, a deſcendant of the Maccabees, and of the courſe of Jojarib, the firſt of the twenty four orders of the prieſts. He ſaith that he was born in the firſt year of Caligula's reign, A. D. 37. He made trial of the three famous ſects that were then among the Jews; Phariſees, Sadducees, and Eſſenes: and leaving them at the age of ſixteen, he ſpent three years in the wilderneſs of Judea, under the inſtructions of a famous maſter nam'd Bani. Serrarius took this Bani for an Eſſene, Druſius and the author of Juchaſin for a Phariſee; but they are all miſtaken; ſince Joſephus in that very place diſtinguiſheth him from the three ſects he had before made trial of. It is more likely, that he was one of the diſciples of St. John Baptiſt, or our Saviour. The Talmud makes mention of one of Chriſt's diſciples, by the name of Bani, or Buni. But whoever he was, at the end of three years Joſephus left him alſo; and being now nineteen years old, return'd to Jeruſalem, where having ſpent ſeven years, he went to Rome, being twenty ſix years old; and there contracted an acquaintance with Nicanor, (who was afterwards a colonel in Veſpaſian's army) and with Alityrus, one of Nero's minions, and by his means with the empreſs Poppea, from whom he receiv'd many favours. After two years abode at Rome, he reviſited his own country, the war being now ready to break out; in which war Joſephus, being thirty years old, and a governor in Galilee, oppoſed the Romans, till at laſt being over-powered, he yielded (or in the language of his enemies, revolted) to them. At this time he told Veſpaſian, that he ſhould become emperor of the Romans; and when Joſephus ſaw his prophecy fulfill'd, and the whole nation of the Jews ſubdued by him, he took him for the Meſſiah and king king of the Jews, foretold by the prophets. Upon theſe accounts he was highly valued by Veſpaſian and Titus, and from them took the name of Flavius. And becauſe this is ſo remarkable a part of the life of Joſephus, it may not be amiſs to quote it in his own words. "Nothing ſo much ſtirr'd up the minds of the "Jews to the preſent wars, as a doubtful prophecy found in their ſacred books; that about that time there "ſhould ariſe in their country, one who ſhould become ruler of the whole world. —— By this oracle the "empire of Veſpaſian was predicted, which began in Judea." Alſo chap. xiv. he ſaith, "That God revealed "to him in a dream the deſtruction of the Jews, and their conqueſt by the Romans, and what ſhould be-"fal the Roman emperors." For being a prieſt, he knew how to explain the ſacred books of the prophets, and to interpret dreams. He often declared to the Jews, that God had left them, and was gone over to the Romans; that the Jews in reſiſting, not only fought againſt the Romans, but God alſo; and that the writings of the prophets manifeſtly pointed out the deſtruction of Jeruſalem about that time; and that God had long ſince ordained it. From the waters of Siloam being dried up, when in the power of the Jews, and flowing plentifully when in poſſeſſion of the Romans, he infer'd, that God had deſerted the Jews, and was gone over to the Romans. When the war was ended, and all things had fallen out according to Joſephus's predictions, he determin'd to publiſh the hiſtory of it; which he did firſt in his mother tongue, the Hebrew, for the uſe of the eaſtern nations (a book long ſince loſt,) and afterwards coming to Rome with Titus, he there publiſhed theſe books in Greek, which are now extant. But this was not done upon his very firſt coming thither; for the triumph of Veſpaſian and Titus over the Jews was firſt paſt, which Joſephus deſcribes in thoſe books. There were alſo falſe accounts of that war publiſh'd by many, before he publiſh'd his; and it was after the fourth year of Veſpaſian's reign, which he makes expreſs mention of in his ſeventh book of the wars of the Jews; and after the building of the temple of Peace at Rome, which he alſo takes notice of, and which, as Dion informs us, was dedicated A. D. 75. that is, five years after the finiſhing of the war; and yet it was before the death of Agrippa, who highly approv'd of it, and writ ſeveral letters in its commendation. Agrippa came to Rome, and had ſeveral new honours conferr'd upon him by Veſpaſian, that very year that the temple of Peace was dedicated (as appears from Dion,) beſides the concurrent teſtimony of ſeveral coins. Euſebius in his chronicle, and the author of the Paſchalion ſay, That he reign'd twenty ſix years, that is, till the ſeventh year of Veſpaſian; all which I the rather recount, becauſe two very learned men of the laſt age have fixed his death in the third year of Veſpaſian. From hence it is manifeſt, that Joſephus publiſh'd his book of the wars of the Jews betwixt the fifth year of Veſpaſian, when the temple of Peace was dedicated, and the ſeventh year of Veſpaſian, in which Agrippa dy'd.

It was out of reſpect to the Romans, among whom he liv'd, that he wrote theſe books, and from whom he had receiv'd many honours; for he was made free of Rome by Veſpaſian, lived in the palace, and had a yearly penſion allow'd him by the emperor; and having preſented his books of the Jewiſh war to Veſpaſian and Titus, the firſt ordered a ſtatue to be erected to him at Rome, the latter ſign'd his approbation of them with his own hand, and gave orders for them to be kept in all the publick libraries. As the Romans extoll'd him, ſo he conſtantly magnifieth and flatters the Romans, and gives very indifferent characters of the Jews; for which they generally condemn his writings. Abarbanel ſaith, that he falſified the truth to magnify the Romans, whoſe diſpleaſure he was afraid of, and wrote to pleaſe them. And though theſe cenſures of the Jews are falſe and groundleſs, yet I cannot but remark, that he ſo far complied with the rites and cuſtoms of the Romans, that Minucius Felix in the very next age after took him for a Roman; "De Judæis ſcripta eorum relege; vel, ſi Romanis magis gaudes, Flavii Joſephi, "vel Antonii Juliani de Judæis require, i. e. Concerning the Jews, either read their own writers, or if "you would rather read Romans, inquire for Joſephus or Antonius Julianus." This latter was without doubt the ſame Antonius Julianus that was procurator of Judea in the very time of the war, and is mentioned by Joſephus. He was by birth a Spaniard, a man very eloquent and learned, and one who publickly taught rhetorick at Rome. When Joſephus therefore wrote his books of the wars of the Jews, he was of opinion, that God had forſaken their nation, and was gone over to the Romans. He had ſeen his country laid waſte by a war that had exhauſted above 1100000 people, the whole city levelled, and God's temple ſo utterly deſtroyed, as that there was ſcarcely one ſtone left upon another; the ſacred books of Moſes, and the holy veſſels of God's houſe, firſt made part of the Roman triumph, and afterwards prophan'd to furniſh the temples of Jupiter Capitolinus, and that of Peace; and the very ſhekels which were formerly paid by the Jews all the world over to the temple at Jeruſalem, were now paid to Jupiter Capitolinus. By which and other circumſtances, Joſephus was thoroughly confirm'd in his opinion, that God had forſaken the Jews, and was become the God and favourer of the Romans, and that Veſpaſian was the promiſed Meſſiah. His opinion about government was, that no one could be promoted to a throne, but by God's ſpecial favour, and he makes king Agrippa thus addreſs the Jews: "It's plain that God is now "gone over to the Romans; for it's impoſſible that ſo great an empire ſhould be eſtabliſhed without God." For theſe reaſons Joſephus conceived favourably of the religion of the Romans, and was pleaſed that many of the Jewiſh opinions agreed with theirs. The prodigies that he recounteth before the deſtruction of Jeruſalem, would better become Livy or Tacitus, than a Jewiſh hiſtorian; and he could not tell whether he ſhould aſcribe his great deliverance at Jotapata to chance or providence. And when Judas, an Eſſene, foretold the death of Antigonus at Strato's tower, the prophecy was not fulfill'd at the famous Cæſarea, ſo called by way of eminence, but at another obſcure place of that name; which ſeems copied from the fable of the death of Alexander king of Epirus at Pandoſia, as it is recorded by Livy and others. And what he relates of the apples of Sodom and the Sabbatical river, is more like a romance, invented to divert his reader, than with any regard to truth; and the ridiculous ſtory of the root Baras ſeems borrow'd from the Moly of Homer, or Circea of Dioſcorides and Theophraſtus. The four colours of the veil of the temple at Jeruſalem, he makes to be an imitation of the four elements, and the ſeven candleſticks a Reſemblance of the ſeven planets. The flying open of the great brazen gate of the temple, is ſuch a like circumſtance as happen'd at Thebes juſt before the great battle of the Lacedemonians at Leuctra, when the great gates of Hercules's temple open'd of themſelves without any one's touching of them. [Cic. de Divinat.] I omit many other things of the like nature; from whence it's manifeſt, that Joſephus endeavour'd to greciſe, and ſhape the hiſtory of the Jews as like as he could to thoſe of the Greeks and Romans.

And thus I have given a ſuccinct account of his ſentiments when he wrote the wars of the Jews; but his books of antiquities were not writ till the thirteenth year of Domitian the emperor, after the death of his three great patrons, two emperors, and a king; and now he betook himſelf to the patronage of Epaphroditus, to whom he dedicates his twenty books of antiquities, his own life, and two books againſt Apion. He had now ſeen his ſuppoſed Meſſiah die, without advancing the Jewiſh intereſt, or anſwering the characters given him by the prophets; by which means he ſeems to have altered his opinion, with reſpect to revealed religion, and to be grown very looſe in his ſentiments about its myſteries; a great latitudinarian, and chiefly adhering to the general notions of the excellency of virtue and goodneſs, and the agreeableneſs of moral religion to the nature of God, and ſuch other like ſentiments; wherein the wiſeſt of the Jews, Heathens, and Chriſtians were agreed, without any religious veneration to ſuch things as had been reveal'd to the Jews by Moſes and the Prophets; and of this it may be proper to give ſome inſtances. Circumciſion was one of the moſt ſacred rites of the Jews, which God gave Abraham, and by which they were known to be his ſeed; and yet when Joſephus is ſpeaking of the antiquity of it, he leaveth the matter undecided betwixt Herodotus and Moſes, whether the Egyptians learn'd it from the Jews, or the Jews from them. He does not ſcruple to ſay, that one might worſhip God without circumciſion, ſo that he reſolv'd to obſerve the Jewiſh laws: that this was far better than circumciſion, and that God would eaſily pardon one that did omit it for fear of perſecution. And in this it is evident, that Joſephus complied with the bad circumſtances the Jews were in under the emperor Domitian, by reaſon of their circumciſion, of which Suetonius hath theſe words: "Judaicus fiſcus acerbiſſimè actus eſt. Interfuiſſe me memini, cùm à procuratore frequentiſſimo concilio inſpiceretur nonagenarius ſenex, an circumſectus eſſet, i. e. "The Jewiſh tribute was moſt rigorouſly exacted. I remember that I was preſent when an old man of ninety "years of age was in a great aſſembly inſpected by the procurator, whether he was circumciſed or not." When Joſephus relates the miraculous paſſage of the Iſraelites through the Red Sea, he adds with an air of diffidence, That he tells every thing as it was in the holy books, and doubts whether the ſea went back of its own accord, or by God's ſpecial command, and ſeems inclin'd to think it ſuch a circumſtance as happen'd to Alexander's army at Pamphylia. In concluſion he adds, That every one might think of it as he pleaſed. When he mentioneth God's coming down to mount Sinai, he ſaith, Let every one believe of it as he pleaſeth, but he related no more than he found in the holy books. When he ſaith, That God was the author of the law of Moſes, he adds, But let every one think of theſe things as he pleaſeth. And the like reflections he makes upon Jonas's being ſwallowed by a great fiſh, and Nebuchadnezzar living ſeven years in the wilderneſs with the beaſts. In his ſecond book againſt Apion, he ſaith, "That "Moſes from his juſtice and piety might eaſily think that he had God for his guide; and when he was "once poſſeſſed with ſuch notions himſelf, he did well to perſuade the people to think ſo too; juſt as "the Greeks to gain a ſanction to their laws, pretended they were given by Apollo, whether they really "thought ſo, or thought that the beſt way to make them receiv'd of the people." He ſaith, "That the "Jews obſerve their own law, and never cenſure others, and do not rally, or rail againſt thoſe that are "thought Gods by others." Of which place Grotius remarks, that he undoubtedly flatter'd the Romans; and long before him Philoſtorgius made the like obſervation, that Joſephus was afraid to offend the Gentiles, and took great care in his books not to diſpleaſe them.

Now the diſeſteeming the rites and ceremonies of the law of Moſes, and paying ſo great a regard to the precepts of morality, are two conſiderable ſteps that Joſephus made towards the doctrine of chriſtianity; and whereas of all the ſects of the Jews, Joſephus gives the beſt character of, and ſeems to have the higheſt value for the Eſſenes, ſo it is obſervable, that of all the ſects of the Jews, they approach'd neareſt to the chriſtians. The Eſſenes were forbidden to keep any changes of coats or ſhoes, as Chriſt alſo forbad his diſciples, Matth. x. 10. The Eſſenes were forbidden to ſwear, as Chriſt alſo forbad the chriſtians. The Eſſenes excommunicated perſons that liv'd unbecoming their profeſſion; and of ſuch it was obſerv'd by them, that they uſually came to ſome untimely end: juſt as St. Paul obſerves of thoſe who prophan'd the ſacrament of the Lord's ſupper, in thoſe pureſt times of chriſtianity, that it often happen'd, that they were deliver'd to Satan. The Eſſenes never troubled themſelves with ſacrifices, but faſted often, and readily became martyrs for their religion; all which things comport with the precepts of the goſpel. Of the Eſſenes, Joſephus particularly obſerves, that they were endowed with the gift of prophecy, and could foretel things to come; to which may be added of them, in the laſt place, that though Chriſt vehemently cenſures the phariſees and ſadducees, yet he never once inveighs againſt the Eſſenes. And when Joſephus, at the end of his ſecond book againſt Apion, makes the Jewiſh religion to conſiſt in piety, juſtice, concord, and obſerving God and his providence, he comes very near the deſcription of chriſtianity.

And having thus far taken notice of Joſephus's ſentiments in religious matters, when he wrote his antiquities; let us ſee in the laſt place, whether there is any thing in that remarkable account he gives of our Saviour, that is not very agreeable to Joſephus, and the time when he wrote. The place is Antiq. B. XVIII. chap. 4. "There was about that time one Jeſus a wiſe man, if yet it be lawful to call him a man: he "was a worker of ſtrange miracles, a teacher of ſuch men as would readily embrace the truth, and had "many followers both of Hebrews and Helleniſts, (i. e. Jews and proſelytes.) This was the famous "Chriſt, who upon the accuſation of the chief men among the Jews was crucified by Pontius Pilate; and "yet thoſe who firſt lov'd him, did not forſake him; for he appear'd to them the third day alive again. "Their holy writers have declar'd theſe and many thouſand other wonderful things of him. The ſect of "chriſtians, which are ſo call'd from him, remain to this day." In all which I ſee nothing but what may agree to a Jew, giving an hiſtorical account of the affairs of his own nation to the heathens; eſpecially what may agree to Joſephus, who often tells his reader, that he did not aver the truth of every thing he related, but faithfully tranſcrib'd what he found in their books; and ſo indifferently related the opinions of the Phariſees, Sadducees, Eſſenes, and of the followers of Judas Galilæus, and gives a particular account of St. John Baptiſt, and St. James the brother of Chriſt; ſo that it would have been very ſtrange if Joſephus ſhould have paſs'd by Chriſt and the chriſtians in ſilence; eſpecially at the thirteenth year of Domitian, when they were grown ſo very numerous. At the end of Nero's reign, Hermas, Clement, Tacitus, Lactantius, and Sulpitius Severus call them a great multitude; but at the end of Domitian's reign, moſt nations abounded with chriſtians. Oroſius calls the chriſtian church at that time, Confirmatiſſimam toto Orbe Eccleſiam, a church firmly eſtabliſh'd in all the world. Pliny not long after ſhews that Pontus and Bithynia were full of chriſtians; and even at Rome they were ſo numerous, that Domitian was jealous of them, and their ſetting up of Chriſt's kingdom; and for that reaſon rais'd a perſecution againſt them. But becauſe ſo many learned men have employ'd their pens in cenſuring the authenticknes of this paragraph in Joſephus, I will examine it yet more particularly.

There was about that time one Jeſus (Ἰησοῦς τις.) This is the proper language of the Jews uſed by Tryphon in Juſtin Martyr, (where Chriſt is call'd Jeſus, Ἰησοῦς τις) and by Joſephus upon other occaſions, as in his wars of the Jews, lib. vii. cap. 11. and 12. Ἰησοῦς τις; and even of Zenodorus a Tetrarch, Ant. lib. xv. cap. 13. Ζηνόδωρός τις. He calls Banus, Τινα Βαρὸν; alſo Hyrcanus, lib. xviii. cap. 8. Theudas, lib. xx. cap. 4.

A wise man (σοφὸς ἀνὴρ) the old appellation of a philoſopher; and no more than what the ſame Joſephus ſaith of St. John Baptiſt, who is call'd by him a good man (ἀγαθὸς ἀνὴρ.)

If he ought to be call'd a man who was a worker of miracles, (εἴγε ἄνδρα αὐτὸν λέγειν χρὴ.) Joſephus means that he ſeem'd ſuperior to a common man. So when Pilate wrote to Tiberius, it was de Chriſto Deo. Tertullian and Pliny, that the chriſtians ſang Chriſto quaſi Deo. i. e. concerning the God Chriſt, i. e. to Chriſt as a God. That he did miracles, is what the Jews own'd, John xi. 47. They ſaid, what do we? for this man doth many miracles. In Juſtin Martyr's dialogue with Tryphon the Jew, the Jews own that ſuch miracles ſeem'd to have been done, but imputed them to magick; and both Celſus and Porphyry, though bitter enemies to the chriſtians, confeſs'd that Chriſt did miracles. Phlegon acknowledges that Chriſt foreknew future things. Pilate gave the emperor Tiberius Nero an account of our Saviour's miracles, as Tertullian and Euſebius aſſure us. And from that account he underſtood, that he was a wiſe man, and doer of miracles (Φιλόσοφος καὶ θαύματα ποιῶν.)

A teacher of ſuch men as would with pleaſure embrace the truth. (Διδάσκαλος ἀνθρώπων τῶν σὺν ἡδονῇ τ' ἀληθῆς δεχομένων. Porphyry quotes many oracles in the praiſe of Chriſt, that declare him to be religious and immortal. To which Porphyry adds, that Chriſt was good, and carried to Heaven, and yet blames the chriſtians.

Trypho, a Jew, extolled the holy lives of chriſtians; and Galen, an heathen, ſaith of the chriſtians, "That they were chaſte, much addicted to prayer and faſting, abſtain'd from injuries, &c." Nor is it a leſs advantagious character that Pliny gives of them in his epiſtle to Trajan; and Joſephus alſo in giving an account of the martyrdom of St. James highly commends him, and thoſe that took his part, as men moſt juſt and exact about the obſervance of the law.

This was the famous Chriſt, (ὁ Χριστὸς οὗτος ἦν,) viz. He that was the author of chriſtianity; for Joſephus wrote thoſe books to inform Epaphroditus and the heathens, who knew him beſt by the name of Chriſt; for ſo he is call'd by Suetonius, Tacitus, and Pliny, and they ſay expreſly that the chriſtians were ſo denominated from him. It's beyond the ſenſe and deſign of Joſephus to expound theſe words of true and ſaving Faith in Chriſt; for Joſephus was (τῶν ἀπίστων Ἰησοῦ ὡς Χριστοῦ) among thoſe that did not believe Jeſus to be the true Meſſias, as we are told by Origen: But Joſephus meant no more than only to let us know, that this Jeſus was the ſame that was uſually call'd Chriſt, and was the author of Chriſtianity: Thus elſewhere he tells us that St. James was Brother τοῦ λεγομένου Χριστοῦ, of him that is call'd Chriſt.

He was crucify'd by Pontius Pilate. This is a plain hiſtorical truth recorded alſo by Tacitus, and the Acts of Pilate: The truth is, that Tacitus's account of Chriſt agrees pretty much with this of Joſephus: Auctor nominis ejus Chriſtus, qui per Pontium Pilatum ſupplicio affectus erat. i. e. Chriſt who was crucify'd by Pontius Pilate was the author of the ſect of chriſtians. And ſince it's evident that Tacitus had read Joſephus, (for in his hiſtory lib. v. he ſaith, Expanſæ repentè delubri fores, & audita major humanâ vox excedere Deos, i. e. "on a ſudden the doors of the temple flew open, and a voice louder than human was heard to ſay that the Gods were departing the place," which is taken from Joſephus, lib. i. cap. 6. μεταβαίνομεν ἐντεῦθεν, &c.) it is more likely he had his account from Joſephus than from the goſpel; and ſo he will be an early evidence of the authority and great antiquity of this paragraph in Joſephus.

by

He appear'd to them the third day alive again. Joſephus here doth not relate his own but the chriſtians faith; and this information he might get, not only from their goſpels, but even from the letter which Pilate ſent to Tiberius, and is in part extant in Juſtin, Tertullian, and Oroſius; in which we have an expreſs narrative of Chriſt's reſurrection from the dead on the third day; beſides Celſus teſtifies, that Chriſt appear'd to his followers after his death.

Their holy writers have declar'd theſe and many thouſand wonderful things of him (τῶν θείων προφητῶν ταῦτά τε καὶ ἄλλα μύρια ὧδε ἀυτῷ θαυμάσια εἰρηκότων.) Theſe words having reference to them, i. e. the chriſtians in the former ſentence, ought properly to be underſtood of the writings of the prophets. Thus Joſephus reckons the books of Maccabees among the Jewiſh prophets, and the holy books of the Eſſenes he calls προφητῶν ἀποδέγματα, i. e. the doctrine of their prophets; and this ſenſe is here much confirm'd by the word εἰρηκότων, which hath no relation to the foretelling future things, but properly ſignifieth, hiſtorically declaring: thus Euſtathius upon Homer explains ἐρῶ by ἀγγέλλω, from whence cometh the word evangeliſt; and ſince the books of the goſpels were now generally receiv'd in the chriſtian churches, it does not ſeem at all improbable, but that Joſephus might have ſeen ſome of them. Tryphon, the Jew, tells Juſtin Martyr, that he had read them; and ſo the modern Jews do now. It is plain that he uſeth the chriſtian, and New Teſtament language in other places, as when he calls St. John the Baptiſt, St. James the brother of Chriſt.

So that I ſee nothing in all this account of Chriſt but what may be allow'd to come from Joſephus; and indeed it would be more ſtrange, if ſuch an accurate hiſtorian, and one that ſpeaks ſo fully of St. John Baptiſt and St. James, ſhould not ſay a word of Chriſt himſelf; and when afterwards he calls James the brother of Chriſt, it may very well be ſuppoſed, that he had given ſome account of Chriſt before. And, laſtly, we may make this probable conjecture, that at the writing of his antiquities, he began to have a good opinion of the chriſtians. He commends St. John Baptiſt and St. James as well as Chriſt, whom in his wars of the Jews he never mention'd; and never ſo much as once ſpeaks of Veſpaſian, whom he had before magnified as the Meſſiah. He thought formerly, that the murder of Ananus and Jeſus were the real cauſe of God's anger againſt the Jews, and the deſtruction of Jeruſalem. But in his antiquities he makes the murder of St. James the apoſtle to have been the cauſe of it; if we may believe Origen and Euſebius. It cannot ſeem ſtrange, that Joſephus ſhould ſay ſo of St. James, when Maimonides himſelf declares, that this Jeſus who was put to death by the Sanhedrim, was the cauſe of the deſtruction of the nation of the Jews, and was propheſied of by Daniel. Now whereas Chriſt is term'd by the chriſtians, the ſtone cut out without hands, from Dan. ii. 45. (a place which many Jews, and particularly Tryphon in Juſtin Martyr, confeſs'd to relate to the Meſſiah) Joſephus, when he comes to give the meaning of it, expreſly owns, that it was ſuch as he had no mind to publiſh, and ſo tacitly acknowledges Jeſus to be the Meſſiah, though he would not openly confeſs it. But be this as it will, it is certain that though Joſephus often condemns the Sadducees, taxeth Theudas, Judas, and others, that ſet up for prophets to draw people after them, yet he never once accuſeth Chriſt or the chriſtians.

Upon the whole, there does not appear to me to be the leaſt reaſon to believe this paſſage ſpurious or interpolated; it is quoted in the very ſame words by Euſebius, St. Jerome, Iſidorus Peluſiota, Sozomen, Ruſinus, Sophronius, Cedrenus, Freculphus, Suidas, Joan. Sarisb. Hegeſippus, Caſſiodorus, Nicephorus, and many other antient writers; it is extant in all copies and MSS. of Joſephus in the world, and in all tranſlations; particularly that of St. Ambroſe, which goeth under the name of Hegeſippus, hath it at large twice, viz. in the ſecond book, and again in the Anacephalæoſis; ſo that Tanaquil Faber, the great oppoſer of this paſſage of Joſephus, ſeems very aſſuming, when he ſays of this Hegeſippus, that "Joſephum eo accuſat nomine quod reſurrectionis Domini noſtri Jeſu Chriſti non meminerit, i. e. Hegeſippus "accuſeth Joſephus, for not mentioning the reſurrection of Chriſt," which is not only weak, upon the account that Hegeſippus is nothing elſe but a corruption of the word Joſephus, and that book a free tranſlation of it; but alſo that this paſſage about our Saviour occurs in two different places at large. Ludovicus Vives was the firſt I met with who diſcover'd St. Ambroſe to have been the true author of the tranſlation that goes under the name of Hegeſippus: his words in his book De Tradenda Diſciplina are theſe: "Hegeſippus Latinus factus ab Ambroſio Mediolanenſi Antiſtite, i. e. The Latin Hegeſippus was made by "St. Ambroſe, biſhop of Milan." The old Latin verſion of his antiquities made by the care of Caſſiodorus recites this place alſo. This verſion hath been falſly father'd upon Rufinus, and though the old copy at Milan hath been by ſome learned men thought as old as Rufinus, if not the very ſame copy; yet it is plain from Caſſiodorus, that it was not at all tranſlated into Latin till one hundred and fifty years after Rufinus, by Epiphanius Scholaſticus. And, laſtly, the Hebrew verſion of ſome parts of Joſephus, commonly publiſh'd under the name of Ben Gorion, hath this paſſage of Joſephus about our Saviour; for though it be not in the imperfect edition of Munſter, which is but part of that work, yet it is certain that it was in the compleat copies of that book. P. Fagius in his edition of the Tisby of Elias Levita, at the word רשך, puts down the whole paragraph with this preface to it. "Ego Paulus Fagius interpres hujus li-

" belli, in honorem Christi & redemptoris nostri, huc referam quæ scripta inveniuntur in libro Josephi filii " Gorion, cujus hæc sunt verba: fuit iisdem temporibus Jesus, &c. i. e. I Paul Fagius, interpreter of this " book, will relate here, for the honour of Christ and our redeemer, what is found written in a book of " Josephus, the son of Gorion, in these words; There was at that time one Jesus, &c." and there sets down this whole passage as it is in the Greek Josephus. Baronius mentions an old Hebrew copy of Josephus, in which this passage appear'd to have been inserted, but was erased; and even our old English translation of that book by P. Morisyn hath this paragraph at large; and moreover Giraldus Cambrensis tells us, that Robertus Canutus (the frier of St. Frideswide, who lived about the year 1171. and was well skilled in Hebrew) declar'd that he found this testimony concerning our Saviour in two Hebrew copies of Josephus; and that it was erased in others, as he made it appear to some Jews then living in Oxford.

So that in short, there seems as much evidence for the authority of this place in Josephus, as of any other in all his works; and it would have been a far greater wonder, if in his circumstances, and at the time when he wrote, he should have said nothing of Christ, than that he saith what he doth; yet if any one desires fuller satisfaction in this particular, let him consult Andreas Bosius's Exercitationes Histor. Critic. Chr. Arnoldus's collection of letters concerning the testimony of Josephus. Vossius's Chronologia Sacra, cap. xvii. Huetius's Demonstratio Evangel. prop. 3. Bishop Parker's demonstration of the divine authority of the law of nature and the christian religion, p. 222, &c. and Dr. Cave's Historia Literaria, Part II. p. 17, &c.

DISCOURSE II.

By Way of Enquiry into the Chronology of Josephus in his Antiquities.

SINCE the copies of Josephus have been alter'd and corrupted, the best method that I can propose to discover his chronology, is, to make an exact collection of such passages of Josephus, as were quoted from him within two or three hundred years after he wrote, and in those books remain'd unalter'd; together with a careful perusal of his other works, which, being written upon other subjects, and not containing the history of the bible, are less likely to have undergone alterations in favour of either version. In pursuance of this method, the first place that I shall pitch upon is that of Eusebius in his history, lib. iii. cap 10. where he cites a large paragraph out of Josephus's first book against Apion, which asserts, that from the beginning of the world to the death of Moses was almost three thousand years; his words are ἔτος ὁ χεί-μῳ ἀπολείπει τεισχιλίων ὀλιγον ἔπων, i. e. This space of time falls but little short of three thousand years. These words, Valesius observes, are in all his old MSS. of Eusebius. The same words are also quoted by Nicephorus, Hist. Eccl. lib. i. p. 162. and are at this day to be read in all the versions and manuscripts of Josephus: nor was this alter'd to comply with Greek and Hebrew chronology; since it manifestly departs from both. Our present Latin Josephus turns these words thus, Hoc tempus de tribus millibus annorum paululum minus est, i. e. This space of time is something less than three thousand years. In the translation used by Bede and Hermannus Contractus, and which was probably the same that Epiphanius made, they are translated thus; Qui paulo minus ad tria millia annorum continentiam gerunt, i. e. Which contains the space of near three thousand years. The word continentia is used after the same manner by Epiphanius in the Preface to the Antiquities. These same words of Josephus are twice quoted by Bede in his book de Ratione temporum, and his Apologetick Epistle, and also are in Hermannus Contractus A. M. 2493. From all which we are well ascertain'd that this was the genuine text of Josephus, and our belief herein is farther confirmed from Josephus himself in other parts of his works. In the preface to his Antiquities he saith, That the holy books of the Jews contain'd the history of five thousand years; and that he would have this to be understood from the beginning of the world to his time, is apparent, partly from the conclusion of his Antiquities, where he saith of his whole history, that it was taken from the sacred writings; and more fully from the beginning of his first book against Apion, where he saith, That his books of Antiquities contain'd the history of five thousand years. And to take away all doubt, Josephus in three distinct places, where all copies agree, computes two thousand years from Moses to his time, as Philo doth likewise. Now if these two thousand years from Moses to his time be added to the almost three thousand years from Adam to Moses, it makes up the sum of near five thousand years from Adam to the time of Josephus. Origen also saith, That from Adam to the seventieth year of Christ's oeconomy was four thousand nine hundred years; and tho' he doth not there quote Josephus, yet it is plain that he had it from him. For First, That number widely differs from the Hebrew and Septuagint, but agreeth with Josephus. Secondly, In that ſame homily he twice quotes the hiſtory of the Jews, and the wars of the Jews; by which he undoubtedly meant thoſe of Joſephus. Thirdly, the ſeventieth year of Chriſt's œconomy is the exact time when Joſephus's books end. And to ſhew that that number in Origen is right, he adds in the ſame place, that it was four thouſand eight hundred and thirty years from Adam to Chriſt; from all which it ſeems evident, that Joſephus computed almoſt three thouſand years from Adam to the death of Moſes, and almoſt five thouſand years from Adam to his own time.

The next place that falls under my conſideration, is in the ſame book of Origen, Hom. x. p. 25. where he obſerves, that it was as long from Adam to Noah, i. e. the flood, as from Moſes to Chriſt. Now, if with Origen we aſſign four thouſand eight hundred and thirty years from Adam to Chriſt; and if according to the Hebrew we reckon one thouſand ſix hundred and fifty ſix years to the flood, we ſhall find juſt ſo many years in Joſephus to Chriſt. And becauſe I would not as yet urge the authority of the preſent copies of Joſephus, we may take this period out of Clem. Alex. Strom. i. p. 250. where he quotes Joſephus from a yet elder author, who flouriſhed under Antoninus Pius, and ſo near to Joſephus's time, viz. that from Moſes, i. e. the coming out of Egypt, to David, was * five hundred and eighty five years, from David to the ſecond of Veſpaſian one thouſand one hundred and ſeventy nine years, both together one thouſand ſeven hundred and ſixty four years. Now if from that ſum we take the forty years that Moſes was in the wilderneſs, and ſeventy years of Chriſt's œconomy, there will remain one thouſand ſix hundred and fifty ſeven years from Moſes's death to Chriſt's birth; which he thus takes from Joſephus, and which plainly ſhews that in the time of Origen, Joſephus before the flood agreed with the Hebrew. And if we ſubtract twice 1656. i. e. 3312 out of 4830, there will remain for the ſpace betwixt the flood and the death of Moſes, 1518, which comes very near to what we now read for that period; and if we put all this together, the chronology of Joſephus will ſtand thus:

From Adam to the flood one thouſand ſix hundred and fifty ſix years, to the death of Moſes one thouſand five hundred and eighteen; to the birth of Chriſt one thouſand ſix hundred and fifty ſix, to the twelfth of Nero ſeventy years; in all four thouſand and nine hundred years: or according to Joſephus, almoſt five thouſand years from Adam to his own time, at the thirteenth year of Domitian.

Before I proceed to a more diſtinct conſideration of particulars, it will be requiſite to ſhew what evidence may be produced out of the preſent copies and manuſcripts of Joſephus, that he followed the Hebrew before the flood, and the Greek after it.

The period before the flood agreeth with the Hebrew. Firſt, in the age of Lamech's begetting Noah, the Hebrew is 182, and the Greek 188, the difference only in the laſt figure. Now all copies, verſions, and manuſcripts of Joſephus read two in the laſt place, according to the Hebrew, and not eight according to the Greek. Secondly, in the age that Enoch begat at, the Hebrew is ſixty five, the Greek 165. Now the copies and manuſcripts of Joſephus are herein alſo alike to the Hebrew, and contrary to the Greek. Thirdly, the Hebrew computes to the flood 1656, the Greek 2242 years. Now there are no copies of Joſephus conſonant to the Greek; but they have either 2656, or elſe 1-56, the number of hundreds being omitted; and either way there are plain marks of agreement with the Hebrew. Laſtly, Joſephus ſaith of this period, that he tranſcrib'd the years from the holy books with even a religious exactneſs, where by holy books he meant the Hebrew; and ſo in his preface to his antiquities, though the LXX tranſlated the books of Moſes, yet there are many more things in the holy writing, i. e. the Hebrew, which he intended to explain. And againſt Apion, Book I. he ſaith, that he compiled his hiſtory in Greek from the holy books, i. e. the Hebrew books; and again he ſaith, that he tranſlated his Antiquities from the holy books, as thereby meaning thoſe letters, i. e. the Hebrew books and letters.

The period next after the flood agreeth with the Greek. For firſt, moſt of the Greek extant here follow the LXX. Secondly, the old Greek copy of Epiphanius here certainly followed the LXX; for ſo Freculphus about A. D. 800. in Chron. T. I. l. i. cap. 35. "De numero annorum à diluvio uſque ad nativi-
"tatem Abrahæ aliter Joſephus atque LXX interpretes & Euſebius ſentiunt quam in Hebraica veritate con"tinetur, i. e. Concerning the number of years from the flood to the birth of Abraham, Joſephus, the "Septuagint, and Euſebius diſſent from the teſtimony contained in the holy books of the Hebrews;" and afterwards adds, that the Hebrew has two hundred and ninety two years, the LXX and Euſebius nine hundred and forty two years, "A quibus Joſephus non longe exorbitat, i. e. from whom Joſephus departs
"but a little." Thirdly, Joſephus ſaith that Phaleg was born about the time that the diviſion of tongues happened. But thoſe who follow the Hebrew ſay, that wonderful event did not come to paſs till the death of Phaleg, finding a hundred years too few for the peopling of the world. Fourthly, they who follow the Hebrew, make Sem to be Melchiſedech, as living in the days of Abraham, according to their chronology: but Joſephus calls him a Chanaanitiſh king, and gives us not the leaſt hint of a thing ſo ſtrange, as that Abraham's great grandfather's great grandfather's grandfather Sem ſhould be then alive to bleſs him. Fifthly, ſince Jocktan in Joſephus is elder brother of Phaleg, and had thirteen ſons at the building of Babel, who gave names to countries, it is impoſſible that Phaleg ſhould be born in the thirtieth year of Heber, but muſt, according to the LXX, be born at leaſt in the hundred and thirty fourth year of his father.

* In the firſt ſum is a ſmall miſtake of ε for η', five for eight, and then both will be 1767.

father. And laſtly, in this period of time Joſephus hath no where intimated that he took his years from the Hebrew, as he has of the period before the flood. From all which it is highly probable, that he followed the Hebrew before the flood, and the LXX after it. Yet he ſeems to have departed both from the Hebrew and Greek in one inſtance before the flood, and one after it. In the period before the flood he departs from the Hebrew in the age of Jared's begetting Enoch, and adheres to the Samaritan writing ſixty two, inſtead of one hundred and ſixty two; and thereby making that number more ſuitable to the reſt, as may be ſeen by this table.

| | Samaritan | Hebrew | Septuagint |
|---|---|---|---|
| Adam | 130 | 130 | 230 |
| Seth | 105 | 105 | 205 |
| Enos | 90 | 90 | 190 |
| Kainan | 70 | 70 | 170 |
| Malelеel | 65 | 65 | 165 |
| Jared | 62 | 162 | 162 |
| Enoch | 65 | 65 | 165 |

In this table the Samaritan and Hebrew are alike in all but the age of Jared's begetting Enoch; the Septuagint exceed the Hebrew by an hundred years, in every one but in that of Jared; ſo that in the Hebrew copies which they uſed, it was ſixty two. Joſephus here made Jared's begetting at ſixty five, proportionable to that of his ſon after him; his father's at ſixty five; his grandfather's at ſeventy; and his great grandfather's at ninety: and that this was really the meaning of Joſephus, will appear, Firſt, from the adjuſting the particulars to the general ſums I have laid down, and making them to the death of Moſes to be almoſt three thouſand years. Secondly, from Joſ. Antiq. Book x. Chap. 11. where it is ſaid that the temple was deſtroyed 1950 years after the flood, and 3513 years after Adam. Deducting, therefore, the firſt ſum from the ſecond, we ſhall find 1556 years to remain betwixt Adam and the flood, that is, one hundred leſs than the Hebrew. And in theſe numbers there is a wonderful harmony among the Greek and Latin copies; ſo Zonaras read the Greek in his time, and ſo Freculphus read the Latin in his time; and the numbers, though wrong, yet are proportionable, and have juſt five hundred wanting in each of them. Thirdly, all the Greek manuſcripts of Joſephus, even thoſe that follow the Septuagint, attribute but ſixty five years to the age, at which Enoch begun to begat. They have left out one hundred years from Enoch, which ſhould have been taken from his father Jared, as in the ages after the flood in almoſt all manuſcripts of Joſephus; and the years of Ragau and Saruch are interchang'd, who are the ſixth and ſeventh patriarchs after the flood, as Jared and Enoch are the ſixth and ſeventh before the flood.

In the period next after the flood, Joſephus no where departs from the LXX, unleſs only in the age of Nachor's begetting Terah; and here is ſo great a variety and diſagreement in the manuſcripts and printed editions, that it is very difficult to tell what to truſt to.

|---|---|
| Some editions of the LXX, as that of Complutum and Rome, have | 179 |
| Other editions of the LXX have only | 79 |
| Theophilus ad Autolycum | 75 |
| The Hebrew | 29 |
| The Samaritan | 79 |
| The vulgar Latin, and ſome copies of Joſephus have | 28 |
| The uſual Greek copies of Joſephus | 120 |
| As corrected by Voſſius | 129 |
| Freculphus Lexov. read in Joſephus ſome number above | 79 |
| Origen in the place above cited | 109 |

For ſince Origen accounted fifteen hundred and eighteen years from the flood to the death of Moſes, and excluſively of the year wherein Moſes died, fifteen hundred and ſeventeen years, and the LXX leaving out Chanaan II. (as Joſephus did) account only fourteen hundred and eighty ſeven to that ſpace, it is evident that in Origen's copy of Joſephus he read forty years more than the LXX, and inſtead of ſeventy nine read ἐννατον καὶ ἑκατοστὸν, one hundred and nine. Amidſt this great variety and uncertainty, if we admit a ſmall alteration, and inſtead of Origen's ἐννατον καὶ ἑκατοστὸν, read in this one place, ἔννατον καὶ εἰκοστὸν, twenty nine, which is conſonant to the Hebrew, Joſephus will agree exactly with all the obſervations I have made; and from Adam to the death of Moſes will be two thouſand nine hundred and ninety three years, i. e. almoſt three thouſand years.

These things being thus adjuſted, the chronology of Joſephus before and after the flood will ſtand thus:

Adam

| | | | | | |
|---|---|---|---|---|---|
| Adam | 130 | Sem | 2 | To the promise made to Abraham, | 75 |
| Seth | 105 | Arphaxad | 135 | | |
| Enos | 90 | Sala | 130 | To the coming out of Ægypt, | 430 |
| Kainan | 70 | Heber | 134 | | |
| Maleleel | 65 | Phaleg | 130 | To the death of Moſes, | 40 |
| Jared | 62 | Ragau | 132 | | |
| Enoch | 65 | Saruch | 130 | | 545 |
| Mathuſelah | 187 | Nachor | 29 | | |
| Lamech | 182 | Terah | 70 | | |
| Noah | 600 | | 892 | | |
| | 1552 | | | | |

ALL three ſums together 2993, and ſo according to Joſephus, ἔτος ὁ χρόνος ἀπολείπει τρισχιλίων ὀλίγον ἐτῶν, i. e. This period of time falls but a little ſhort of three thouſand years. The ſums of the four firſt books (commonly printed at the beginning of Joſephus) have 3093. Now if we caſt away one hundred from the age of Jared, which ſeems to have crept into the text even before Origen's time, we have this very ſum of two thouſand nine hundred and ninety three years.

SEVERAL reaſons may be aſſign'd why Joſephus choſe to follow the Hebrew before the flood, and the LXX after it, (which though an affected way of writing chronology, has, however, been practiſed by St. Auſtin, De Civ. Dei, lib. xv. cap. 13. very probably in conformity to Joſephus's method.) The principal are theſe:

FIRST that he being well skill'd in Hebrew and Greek, and highly eſteeming both editions of the Bible, did indifferently make uſe of both, ſometimes following one, and ſometimes the other.

SECONDLY, Hebrew was his mother tongue: he firſt wrote his hiſtory of the Jewiſh wars in that language, and addreſſed the Jews, his countrymen, in ſeveral eloquent Hebrew ſpeeches, to perſuade them to ſurrender; and in many places (where all copies agree) followeth the Hebrew Bible, where it differs from the Septuagint. As Firſt, Joſephus and the Hebrew omit the ſecond Chanaan, ſon of Arphaxad, who is in the LXX. Secondly, Gen. xlvi. 22. Joſephus and the Hebrew have fourteen, the LXX eighteen. Thirdly, Gen. xlvii. 27. Joſephus and the Hebrew have ſeventy, the LXX have ſeventy five, and ſo are quoted by St. Luke, Acts vii. 14, 15. Fourthly, Gen. xxii. 2. Joſephus and the Hebrew have the land of Moreah, the LXX have τὴν γῆν ὑψηλήν, i. e. the hill-country. Fifthly, Numb. iv. 3. Joſephus and the Hebrew have thirty years old, the LXX twenty five years old. Sixthly, 2 Sam. xxiv. 13. Joſephus and the Hebrew have ſeven years famine, the LXX three years. Seventhly, 1 Sam. iv. 18. Joſephus and the Hebrew have Eli govern'd forty years, the LXX have twenty years, as obſerv'd formerly by Syncellus, p. 176. Eighthly, 1 Kings iv. 32. Joſephus and the Hebrew have one thouſand and five, the LXX five thouſand. Ninthly, 1 Kings xv. 2. Joſephus and the Hebrew have three years, the LXX ſix years. Tenthly, Eſther i. 5. Joſephus and the Hebrew have ſeven days, the LXX ſix days. Eleventhly, Eſther ix. 16. Joſephus and the Hebrew have ſeventy ſix thouſand, the LXX fifteen thouſand.

THIRDLY, he underſtood Greek alſo, had a great veneration for the verſion of the LXX, and relates its whole hiſtory from Ariſtæas, frequently making uſe of it in his Antiquities. As Firſt, Gen. vii. 11. Joſephus and the LXX have the twenty ſeventh day, the Hebrew and the Samaritan the ſeventeenth day. Secondly, Exod. xii. 40. Joſephus and the LXX have the Iſraelites in Chanaan and Egypt four hundred and thirty years, the Hebrew in Egypt four hundred and thirty years. Thirdly, 1 Sam. xi. 8. Joſephus and the LXX have Judah ſeventy thouſand, the Hebrew Judah thirty thouſand. Fourthly, 1 Sam. xv. 4. Joſephus and the LXX have Gilgal, the Hebrew Telaim. Fifthly, 1 Sam. xv. 4. Joſephus and the LXX have Iſrael four hundred thouſand, the Hebrew Iſrael two hundred thouſand. Sixthly, 1 Sam. xv. 4. Joſephus and the LXX have Judah thirty thouſand, the Hebrew Judah ten thouſand. Seventhly, 1 Sam. xxii. 18. Joſephus and the LXX have three hundred and five prieſts, the Hebrew eighty five prieſts, obſerv'd by St. Hierom, Tom. III. p. 71. Eighthly, 2 Sam. viii. 13. Joſephus and the LXX have Idumæans, the Hebrew Syrians. Ninthly, 2 Sam. xxv. 15. Joſephus and the LXX have till dinner time, the Hebrew till the time appointed. Tenthly, Eſther ix. 26. Joſephus and the LXX have Φρῦραι, the Hebrew Purim. Eleventhly, Joſephus relates the contention of the Jews before Darius about what is the ſtrongeſt, which is not at all in the Hebrew, but Greek Eſdras.

FOURTHLY, Joſephus many times departed from them both: As firſt, Gen. xiii. 18. the Hebrew has the plain of Mambre, the LXX the Oak of Mamre; but Joſephus the Oak of Ogyges. Secondly, Gen. xxxv. 28. the Hebrew and LXX ſay Iſaac dy'd one hundred eighty years old; Joſephus, but Iſaac dy'd one hundred eighty five years old. Thirdly, Numbers iii. 39. the Hebrew and the LXX have twenty two thouſand, Joſephus twenty two thouſand eight hundred and eighty. Fourthly, 1 Sam. xviii. 25. the Hebrew and the LXX have one hundred foreskins, Joſephus ſix hundred, not foreskins, but heads, κεφαλάς. He thus alter'd it to make it more compliable to the way of the Romans. Fifthly, 2 Sam. iii. 14. the Hebrew and the LXX have one hundred, Joſephus ſix hundred. Sixthly, 2 Sam. xv. 7. the Hebrew and the LXX have forty years, Joſephus four years. Seventhly, 1 Kings vi. 1. the Hebrew and the LXX have four hundred eighty, or four hundred forty, Joſephus five hundred ninety two. Eighthly, 1 Kings xii. 33. the Hebrew and the LXX the eighth month, Joſephus the ſeventh. Ninthly, 1 Chron. xxii. 14. the Hebrew and the LXX have one hundred thouſand talents of gold, Joſephus ten thouſand talents of gold. Tenthly, 1 Chron. xxii. 14. the Hebrew and the LXX have one million of talents in ſilver, Joſephus one hundred thouſand talents of ſilver. Eleventhly, Neh. ii. 1. the Hebrew and the LXX have the twentieth of Artaxerxes, Joſephus the twenty fifth year of Xerxes. Twelfthly, Neh. xiii. 6. the Hebrew and LXX have the thirty ſecond year of Artaxerxes, Joſephus the thirty eighth year of Xerxes. Not to mention his making Solomon reign eighty years, and is therein follow'd by Theodoret on 1 Kings ix. 37. and Procopius on the ſame place, &c.

Fifthly, To reconcile numbers that were different, he took a middle proportion. As 2 Sam. viii. 4. the Hebrew has ſeven hundred horſemen, the LXX ſeven thouſand horſemen, in Joſephus five thouſand horſemen. 2 Sam. xxiv. 9. the Hebrew and the LXX have Iſrael eight hundred thouſand, but 1 Chron. xxi. 5. the Hebrew and the LXX have one million one hundred thouſand, Joſephus hath Iſrael nine hundred thouſand.

From all which it is evident that in compiling of his hiſtory, he made uſe of the original Hebrew, as well as Septuagint verſion of the old Teſtament alternately, as occaſion offer'd: nor ſcrupled, when he thought there was reaſon, to recede from both.

The next conſiderable period is, from the death of Moſes to the laying the foundation of Solomon's temple in the fourth year of Solomon, five hundred fifty two years: To which add the forty years in the wilderneſs, and it will be five hundred ninety two years from the coming out of Egypt: And ſo Joſephus hath it expreſsly in B. vii. of his Antiquities, and Chap. 2. Again, from Joſhua to David's taking Jeruſalem are five hundred fifteen years, Antiq. B. vii. Chap. 3. add thirty three of David and four of Solomon, and we have five hundred fifty two years. Add the forty in the wilderneſs, and they make five hundred ninety two, as before. Again Antiq. B. x. C. 11. Nebuchadnezzar burnt the temple in the year four hundred ſeventy after its building by Solomon, and in the year one thouſand ſixty two after the coming out of Egypt. Take the firſt number out of the ſecond, and there will remain five hundred ninety two from the coming out of Egypt to Solomon's temple. Again, the ſum of the fifth book is four hundred ſeventy ſix, of the ſixth book thirty two, of the ſeventh book forty, and four years of Solomon. All which make five hundred fifty two. So that if we add forty in the wilderneſs, the whole will be five hundred and ninety two. Clem. Alex. in Strom. i. p. 250. quotes Joſephus for ſaying that from Moſes, i. e. the coming out of Egypt, to David are five hundred eighty eight years. Add the four years of Solomon, and you have again five hundred ninety two years. Sulpicius Severus, omitting the four years, hath for that period only five hundred eighty eight years.

Now to make all this more evident, I will inſert the particulars thus:

| | | | |
|---|---|---|---|
| Moſes in the wilderneſs | 40 | | |
| Joſhua | 26 | | |
| Othoniel | 40 | Servitudes under | |
| Ahod | 80 | | |
| Deborah and Barach | 40 | Cuſhan | 8 |
| Gideon | 40 | The Moabites | 18 |
| Abimeleeh | 3 | Jabin and Chanaanites | 20 |
| Thola | 23 | Midianites | 7 |
| Jair | 22 | Ammonites | 18 |
| Jephthe | 6 | Philiſtines | 40 |
| Ibſan | 7 | | In all 111 |
| Elon | 10 | | |
| Abdon | 8 | | |
| Sampſon | 20 | The fourth year of Solomon | 1 |
| Eli | 40 | To which add | 480 |
| Samuel and Saul | 32 | | |
| David | 40 | And the whole will be | 592 |
| Solomon | 3 | | |
| | In all 480 | | |

The Greek copies of Joſephus ſay that Saul reign'd twenty two years after Samuel, and ſo Zonaras read it; but Epiphanius and the Latin verſions have only two. Clemens Alexandrinus, Strom. i. p. 238. ſaith, That Saul dy'd two years after Samuel; and Theophilus ad Autol. giveth Samuel twelve, and Saul twenty, together thirty two years, according to Joſephus. The Jews in Seder Olam and other books give Saul only two years, that is, after the Death of Samuel. That Saul reign'd in all but twenty years is expreſs'd in Joſephus, Antiq. B. x. C. 11.

Some few things may be objected againſt this number of years for this period, which muſt be conſider'd.

I. 'Tis objected, that after the death of Joſhua they were eighteen years without a prince. Joſ. Antiq. B. vi. C. 6.

It may be anſwer'd, that it ought to be read only eight years; and is to be underſtood of their ſervitude under Cuſhan.

II. 'Tis

II. 'Tis objected, that according to Josephus (Antiq. B. xx. chap. 8.) from the coming out of Egypt to Solomon's temple are six hundred and twelve years; and just so it is read in Photius and Hegesippus, B. ii. c. 13.

I answer, Josephus here gives an account of the time from the coming out of Egypt to the dedication of the temple, and the first priests that serv'd in it and left off the tabernacle. Now that was just twenty years from the foundation of it laid by Solomon. (Compare 1 Kings ix. 10. and 2 Chron. viii. 1. and the Septuagint 1 Kings viii. 1.) so that if to the five hundred and ninety two years to the laying the foundation of Solomon's temple we add twenty, we have this very sum of six hundred and twelve years; so also Sulpitius Severus, p. 187. "Cœptum templi opus vigesimo anno explicuit, i. e. The temple was fi-" nished in the twentieth year after it was begun to be built."

The next period is from the foundation of the temple to its destruction by Nebuchadnezzar, viz. four hundred seventy years, six months, and ten days. Josephus is express as to this, Antiq. B. x. c. 11. in which place also from the children of Israel's going out of Egypt to the destruction of the temple, are one thousand and sixty two years. Take out thence the space to the building of the temple, five hundred and ninety two years, and there will remain for the duration of the temple four hundred and seventy years; and the reading of that place is confirm'd by Zonaras and Freculphus. Again, Antiq. B. x. c. 11. the kings of the race of David reign'd five hundred fourteen years, six months, and ten days; from which number take away forty of David, and four of Solomon, and there will remain four hundred and seventy years, six months, and ten days. Again, Antiq. B. xi. c. 4. the kings reign'd five hundred and thirty three years. Take away from Saul twenty, David forty, and Solomon four, there will remain from the foundation of the temple to the captivity, four hundred seventy years, six months, and ten days. There is, I confess, a small difference in the Latin edition, and in that of Freculphus, and the Greek of Zonaras, p. 126. who have but five hundred thirty two years, six months, and ten days.

The particulars of this sum we may easily collect from several parts of Josephus thus:

|---|---|
| From Solomon's laying the foundation of the temple to his death, Jos. B. viii. c. 2, 3. | 77 years. |
| From Rehoboam to the captivity of the ten tribes, B. ix. c. 14. | 260 years, as it should be read. |
| From thence to the captivity by Nebuchadnezzar, B. x. c. 11. | 133 years, corrected so by Vossius. |
| In all | 470 Years. |

In most of the present copies of Josephus, B. ix. c. 14. there is two hundred and forty, instead of two hundred and sixty; and in B. x. c. 11. we have one hundred and thirty, instead of one hundred and three.

| | | | |
|---|---|---|---|
| Again the sum of the eighth book | 163 years | So Vossius, | the Greek 182. |
| of the ninth book | 177 years | | the Latin 230. |
| of the tenth book | 203 years | | |
| In all | 543 | | |
| Take away three years of Solomon, and seventy years of the captivity, | 73 | | |
| There remains from the building to the ruin of the temple, | 470 years. | | |

It may be objected, that Antiq. B. xx. c. 8. we have from Solomon's temple built, to its destruction, four hundred and sixty six years.

To which is answer'd, that the translation by Ambrose had in this place of Josephus four hundred and sixty years, six months, and ten days. It should be four hundred and fifty years, six months, and ten days, and there are to be accounted from the dedication of the temple six hundred and twelve years after the coming out of Egypt.

It is observable, that whensoever Josephus gives the time of the burning of the temple, whether from Solomon's building it, from the flood, or from Adam, yet still he adds to the sum six months and ten days; whereas it is certain that the temple was burnt the tenth day of the month Ab, which is the fifth month. Josephus therefore is to be understood according to the order of the months among the Romans, for whose sake he wrote, and so calls Adar March, Nisan April, Jiar May, Sivan June, Tamuz July, Ab August, or Sextilis, the sixth month among the Romans; and therefore in his wars of the Jews, B. vii. c. 9. he saith the temple was burnt August 10. and in his wars with the Jews April is Nisan.

In Josephus, B. x. c. 11. the Greek and Latin copies say, that from David, twenty one kings reign'd to the captivity, five hundred and fourteen years, six months, and ten days. Take away forty four for David and Solomon, and there are four hundred and seventy years, six months, and ten days.

Vossius, p. 129. ſaith, that the old Paris manuſcript of Joſephus, hath from Adam to the burning of the temple by Nebuchadnezzar, four thouſand years. According to my account it comes to four thouſand and fifteen, and perhaps the odd fifteen may be in the manuſcript, though omitted by Voſſius.

From the burning of the temple, to the firſt of Cyrus, Joſephus hath ſeventy years; for

First, Antiq. B. xi. c. 1. The firſt of Cyrus is the ſeventieth year from the beginning of the captivity. Now the captivity began at the burning of the temple; for (B. x. c. 11.) the twenty third year of Nebuchadnezzar is the fifth year of Iſrael's captivity.

Secondly, Antiq. B. xi. c. 1. Seventy years after the burning of the temple they return'd from Babylon, and that undoubtedly was the firſt year of Cyrus.

Thirdly, Antiq. B. x. c. 11. From Iſaiah to the burning of the temple by Nebuchadnezzar, one hundred and forty years. From Iſaiah to the firſt of Cyrus, two hundred and ten years; therefore from the burning of the temple to the firſt of Cyrus are ſeventy years.

Fourthly, B. xi. c. 1. From the burning of the temple by Nebuchadnezzar to the firſt of Cyrus, when the Jews return'd from captivity, are ſeventy years.

Fifthly, B. xi. c. 1. The temple lay deſolate ſeventy years, and they ended the firſt of Cyrus.

Sixthly, Joſephus (Antiq. B. x. c. 12.) hath the particulars thus:

Nebuchadnezzar forty three years; Evilmerodoch eighteen years; Niricolaſſar, or Egreſſarius forty years; Laboſadarchus nine months; Balthaſar, or Nabonidus, ſeventeen years; Cyrus one; in all one hundred and nineteen years and nine months; ſo that if we take out ſeventeen years of Nebuchadnezzar, there will be left for the captivity, one hundred two years, and nine months, which is certainly wrong, and ſhould be thus: Nebuchadnezzar forty three years; Evilmerodoch twelve years; Niricolaſſar fourteen years; Laboſadarchus nine months; Nabonidus ſeventeen years; Cyrus one year; in all eighty ſeven years and nine months. If we then take out ſeventeen years of Nebuchadnezzar, there will remain ſeventy years and nine months; ſo that the firſt year of Cyrus was the ſeventieth of the captivity; and this account, though falſe, yet agreeth with Joſephus, and was taken thence by that anonymous author whom Sulpicius Severus, B. ii. c. 31. hath tranſcrib'd thus: Nebuchadnezzar forty three; Evilmerodoch twelve; Belthaſar fourteen; Darius Medus eighteen; Cyrus one; in all eighty eight.

From the firſt year of Cyrus to the conqueſt of Darius by Alexander (i. e. the whole ſpace of the Perſian monarchy) Joſephus hath two hundred and forty ſix years. So Antiq. B. x. c. 12. from the prophecy of Daniel in the firſt year of Darius, who with Cyrus took Babylon, to the deſtruction of the temple by Antiochus, are four hundred and eight years, as 'tis quoted by Cedrenus, p. 191. Now that prophanation by Antiochus was in the hundred and forty fifth year of Seleucus, (Antiq. B. xii. c. 15.) which Æra began the eighteenth year after Alexander's conqueſt of Darius. If we therefore take one hundred and forty four, and eighteen (i. e. one hundred and ſixty two,) from four hundred and eight, there will remain two hundred and forty ſix years for the duration of the Perſian monarchy.

Secondly, Antiq. B. xx. c. 8. From the firſt of Cyrus to Antiochus Eupator, are four hundred and fourteen years; which words are cited from Joſephus by Photius and Hegeſippus. Now Joſephus ſaith of Antiochus Epiphanes, that he, dying in the hundred and forty ninth year of Seleucus, left the kingdom to Eupator, Antiq. B. xii. c. 14. and Eupator's firſt year was the one hundredth and fiftieth of Seleucus, to which add eighteen from the conqueſt of Alexander over Darius (i. e. in all one hundred and ſixty eight) and ſubſtract that from four hundred and fourteen, there will remain for the Perſian monarchy, two hundred and forty ſix years.

Thirdly, the ſum of book xi. is two hundred and fifty three years, and contains the ſpace from the firſt of Cyrus to the death of Alexander. Now from Alexander's conquering Darius, and putting an end to the Perſian monarchy, were ſeven years; if therefore we take ſeven from two hundred and fifty three years, there will remain for the Perſian monarchy two hundred and forty ſix years.

Now it is certain that the duration of the Perſian monarchy was not ſo long; but Joſephus, miſtaking him for Xerxes, in whoſe time Nehemiah came to Jeruſalem, and built the walls of it, (making Nehemiah cup-bearer to Xerxes,) it was neceſſary for him to aſſign to his reign above thirty two years; which we find mention'd Neh. xiii. 6. Joſephus ſpeaks of the ninth month of the thirty eighth year of his reign, and added twenty years to his reign, as he did forty to Solomon's. The chronology of Joſephus, as to thoſe Perſian kings, ſeems to have been thus:

|---|---|---|---|
| Cyrus | 30 | Artaxerxes | 46 |
| Cambyſes | 6 | Ochus | 21 |
| Magi | 1 | Arſes | 2 |
| Darius | 36 | Darius | 4 |
| Xerxes | 41 | | |
| Artaxerxes | 41 | In all | 247 |
| Darius | 19 | | |

All theſe agree with the Canon Ptolemaicus, except one year wanting to Cambyſes and the Magi, and twenty added to Xerxes; ſo that if we caſt away the firſt of Cyrus, which was accounted to the ſeventy years captivity, there were juſt two hundred and forty ſix years.

Some

Some old authors make the empire of the Perſians to laſt two hundred and forty eight years, including the firſt of Cyrus; and ſo Euſeb. Dem. Ev. p. 393. but they were to be underſtood of the whole ſpace, from the firſt of Cyrus, to the firſt of Seleucus, or the * Æra Seleuci.

From Alexander's conquering Darius to his own death, are ſeven years; for if we deduct two hundred and forty ſix (the duration of the Perſian monarchy) out of two hundred and fifty three, (the number of years from Cyrus to the death of Alexander, as in the ſum of book xi.) there will remain ſeven for the number of years betwixt the end of the Perſian monarchy and the death of Alexander.

From Alexander's death, to the beginning of the Æra Seleuci, are eleven years, as is evident thus: Joſephus allows from the firſt of Cyrus to Antiochus Eupator, four hundred and fourteen years, and his firſt year was the hundredth and fiftieth year of Seleucus. Now if we take the one hundred and fifty, and two hundred and fifty three (from the firſt of Cyrus to the death of Alexander) out of four hundred and fourteen, there will remain eleven years betwixt the death of Alexander and the beginning of the Æra Seleuci.

From the Æra Seleuci to the Maccabees, one hundred and forty ſix years; for ſo we read in Antiq. B. xii. c. 7, & 8. that Matthias and Judas Maccabæus began to prevail in the year of Seleucus, 146.

From the Æra Maccab. in the year of Seleucus, 146. to the beginning of Herod, are one hundred and twenty ſix years, as Antiq. B. xiv. at the end; or if the Æra of the Maccabees began the year following, i. e. in the year of Seleucus 147. then Joſephus aſſigns them but one hundred and twenty five years, as B. xviii. c. 8. which therefore muſt end in the year of Seleucus 272. for Herod was made king at Rome in the year of Seleucus 273. and yet Joſephus makes theſe end at the death of Antigonus, in the year of Seleucus 276. and ſo accounts three or four years ſhort, as is evident to any one that ſhall add the particulars.

Aristobulus (Joſeph. Antiq. B. xiii. c. 19.) began to put on a regal diadem four hundred and ſeventy one years after the return from the captivity; ſo likewiſe in his wars of the Jews, lib. i. In Freculphus it is falſely read four hundred and ſeventy five, in the preſent Greek and Latin copies four hundred and eighty. But the four hundred and ſeventy one years are thus made out, viz.

| Thence to Jonathan's high-prieſthood | 160 years. |

From the beginning of Herod, after the death of Antigonus, to the deſtruction of the temple, in the ſecond year of Veſpaſian, are one hundred and ſeven years, Joſ. Antiq. B. xx. c. 8.

Theſe laſt ſums put together ſtand thus:

* An Æra is a reckoning of time from ſome memorable event, as from the creation of the world, Noah's flood, the Iſraelites coming out of Egypt, &c. The famous Æra of Seleucus began in the reign of Seleucus, firſt founder of the Syrian kingdom, ſoon after the expiration of the Grecian monarchy, eighteen years after the end of the Perſian monarchy, according to Joſephus; and in the year of the world, 3636. before the birth of J. C. 312. according to other chronologers.

THE ſums in the old Latin Joſephus are almoſt the ſame, and differ but in three years and five months.

The whole chronology of Joſephus will be thus:

|---|---|
| From Adam to the death of Moſes, | 2993 |
| To the building of Solomon's temple, | 552 |
| To its deſtruction by Nebuchanezzar, | 470 |
| The Babyloniſh captivity, | 70 |
| From the firſt of Cyrus to the twelfth of Nero, | 639 |
| Sum total | 4724 |
| From the twelfth of Nero to the thirteenth of Domitian, | 28 |
| In all | 4752 |

AND that ſum Joſephus accounted numero rotundo to be five thouſand years. There are alſo in Joſephus, many ſums of years which are certainly falſe, as Antiq. B. vii. c. ult. From David to Hyrcanus's opening of his ſepulchre, when Antiochus beſieg'd Jeruſalem, are thirteen hundred years; and ſo Freculphus alſo read it, T. I. l. iii. c. 3. and yet this was but eight hundred and eighty four years. Joſephus, againſt Apion, B. II. ſaith, that the Jews had been a free people, under the Maccabees, to Pompey's taking Jeruſalem, for one hundred and twenty years. It is plain that it ſhould be only one hundred and two years; for it was in the year of Seleucus 230. which was one hundred and two years after Judas's defeating of Antiochus, and purging the temple, in the year of Seleucus 148.

AN

AN APPENDIX TO THE Two Preceding Discourses.

BESIDES the reason already adduced, many others may be alledged that make the chronology of the Septuagint in the ages after the flood more probable than the Hebrew.

FIRST, It seems absurd and prepostorous, that the seven first patriarchs after the flood, who liv'd three hundred, and four hundred years, should beget at thirty, or thereabouts, as the present Hebrew says; and yet the succeeding patriarchs, who did not live half so long, should not beget their first-born till they were twice as old; Terah at seventy, Abraham at eighty seven, Isaac at sixty, Jacob at eighty four, Levi, Chaath, and Amram, at about sixty each of them; for from the birth of Levi, to the birth of Moses, the son of Amram, were about one hundred and eighty years.

SECONDLY, It is not likely that Noah, who liv'd six hundred years before the flood, should see ten generations succeed each other after the flood, and live till the fifty eighth year of Abraham; that Sem should see nine generations after him successively die, and survive Abraham many years, the ninth person lineally descended from him; who yet died in a good old age, an old man, Gen. xxv. 8. That Sala should outlive Phaleg, Ragau, Lamech, Nachor, Terah, and Abraham, for six generations, lineally descended from him; and even the last of them liv'd to be an old man; that Heber should outlive Phaleg, Ragau, Lamech, Nachor, Terah, Abraham, and Isaac, seven successive generations that descended from him; and yet Abraham and Isaac should both live to be old men, Gen. xxv. 7. and xxxv. 29.

THIRDLY, It is not possible that Jocktan should have thirteen sons when Phaleg was born, at the division of tongues, if Phaleg was born at the thirty fourth year of Heber, as it is in the Hebrew; and to fancy Phaleg first call'd so at the time of his death is ridiculous, and expresly contrary to Josephus. At the division of tongues we are told, that Mizraim, Chanaan, Sidon, Elam, Assur, Aram, &c. gave names to countries, and yet they died before Phaleg. Sem, Arphaxad, Salah, Heber, &c. according to the Hebrew, were living when God instituted circumcision; and yet none of them order'd to be circumcis'd, which was then the sign of being in covenant with God.

BUT how evidently so ever preferable to the Hebrew in this period the LXX may seem in the judgment of most, yet I foresee several things that may be objected, and which it may not be improper to consider.

FIRST, 'Tis objected, that it is not probable that the ante-diluvian patriarchs, who lived to be nine hundred years old, should beget their first-born at sixty or seventy years old, as is affirm'd in the Hebrew and Josephus; and yet those after the flood, who did not live half so long, should not beget their first-born till about one hundred and thirty years old.

TO which I answer, that could we be certain these mentioned after the flood were the first-born, the objection would be very weighty and material. But it is much more probable that they were not; for Sem was younger than Japhet, Gen. x. 27. and therefore Japhet is placed first in the genealogies, Gen. x. 2. and 1 Chron. i. 5. Arphaxad younger than Elam or Assur, 1 Chron. i. 5. Gen. x. 2. vi. 21. Phaleg younger than Jocktan, who at Phaleg's birth had thirteen children, Gen. x. 25, 26, &c. Abraham younger than Haran, Haran born at the ſeventh, and Abraham at the hundred and thirtieth year of Terah, Gen. xi. 27, 28, 29, 32. Acts vii. 4. and Abraham married Haran's daughter.

It is very probable that it was ſo alſo in the other patriarchs, (though we cannot prove it from ſcripture, where the hiſtory we have of them is very ſhort,) becauſe God continued this method afterwards. Iſaac was younger than Iſhmael, Jacob than Eſau, Judah than Reuben, of whom it is obſerv'd, 1 Chron. v. 1. Now the ſons of Reuben the firſt-born of Iſrael, (for he was the firſt-born, but becauſe he defiled his father's bed, his birthright was given to the ſons of Joſeph, and the genealogy is not to be reckon'd after the birthright, &c.) St. Auſtin de Civ. Dei, lib. xv. c. 15. obſerves of the patriarchs after the flood, that "Magis credibile eſt non hic primogenitos commemoratos, ſed eos per quos ſucceſſionis ordo ducerétur, i. e. It ſeems more probable to believe, that they who are here reckon'd up, were not the firſt-born, but they by whom the order of ſucceſſion was to be derived."

Secondly, 'Tis objected, that the Jews were ſuch faithful tranſcribers of the law, that if ever the Hebrew had agreed with the Samaritan and Septuagint, they would not have alter'd it.

I answer, that the words of Philo (in Euſeb. Præp. Ev. lib. viii.) and of Tryphon (in Juſtin Mart.) are certainly to be underſtood of the Septuagint, and not of the Hebrew; and what Joſephus ſaith to the ſame purpoſe, muſt either be underſtood of the Septuagint, or elſe in ſo large a ſenſe, as that according to him the LXX tranſlators were prophets, and did not make any alterations in any thing; and indeed whatever is to be met with in other books to this purpoſe, is taken from Deut. iv. 2. and xii. 32. and muſt be underſtood of their not adding to or diminiſhing the precepts of the law of Moſes; and it is manifeſt, that the verſion of the Septuagint, the Targum of the Onkelos, the books of Irenæus, Euſebius's chronicle, and Rufinus, had ſolemn adjurations added to them not to change or interpolate any thing; and yet it is certain, that they have been much corrupted. The Rabbies mention thirteen places alter'd by the LXX interpreters, but not one of them that relates to the chronology of the patriarchs. The preſent Hebrew bibles in twenty ſix places leave a ſpace to ſhew that ſomething is wanting, which is ſupplied by the LXX. The marginal readings vary from the text in eight hundred and forty eight places, and they are generally reckoned the trueſt. Ezra vii. wants one whole verſe, which is in 1 Chron. vi. though the genealogy, Neh. vii. is only a tranſcript of that we find in Ezra ii. yet it is very different from it. And in Pſal. cv. betwixt Ver. 13 and 14, is the omiſſion of a whole verſe, as appears by the alphabet in that pſalm, which was in the text when the LXX tranſlated it; ſo that it is plain that there are corruptions of the Hebrew text of the bible, and many of them ſince the time that the LXX tranſlated it. And ſince it is evident, that in the time of * Origen, when he compiled his Hexapla, the Hebrew text was the ſame as now, it is certain that the alterations therein were made before that time; and as it ſeems moſt probable, about the reign of Adrian and Antoninus Pius. The Hebrew of the bible was at, and after the time of our Saviour, a dead language, not underſtood by any but ſcholars; the common language of the Jews being at that time a mixture of Syriack and Chaldee; and the Jews wondered how Chriſt underſtood letters, having never learn'd, John vii. 15. And Luke x. 26. Chriſt ſaid to one of the ſcribes, as being his peculiar skill, How readeſt thou? And the reading of the law in Hebrew was not uſual in the ſynagogues, without an explanation of it, which they read alſo. Now their ſcholars and bibles were generally deſtroyed by the perſecutions they ſuffered in the ages after the apoſtles. Veſpaſian deſtroyed four hundred and ſixty ſynagogues; and Trajan forbad the Jews the reading of their law; and in his time R. Ananias was burnt, and the book of the law with him. R. Akiba had two thouſand and four hundred ſcholars kill'd by Adrian, in the rebellion of Cochab; and R. Simeon, the ſon of Gamaliel, had two hundred and fifty thouſand ſcholars ſlain, and not one left. And the very reading of the law had been utterly loſt, had not R. Judah, the ſon of Baba, with the expence of his own life, preſerv'd five copies, by hiding them; for Adrian made a law, by which it was death to ordain doctors, and keep up their ſchools; and learning was at the ſame time brought to ſo low an ebb at Babylon, that two of Juda's ſcholars were ſent thither to inſtruct them; and the very reaſon why R. Judah collected the traditions into the book of the Miſna, was, that learning was likely to be abolithed, and the law made void. Moſt of the Moſaick rites ended with the temple, and thereby the book of the law was leſs eſteemed, and the Jewiſh learning was become little elſe than a multitude of idle traditions. R. Judah took great care, that in all the cities of the land of Iſrael there ſhould be ſuch as taught traditions. Alting. tells us, that "Tanta fuit Miſnæ auctoritas, etiam vivo auctore, ut "ſepoſitis codicibus propheticis, in hoc uno explicando & interpretando omnem operam collocaverint, "i. e. The authority of the Miſna became ſo great, even in the author's life time, that neglecting the "books of the prophets, they [the Jews] ſpent all their pains in explaining and interpreting this only." So that here was a very fair opportunity for thoſe few ſcholars that were left to alter the Hebrew text as they pleas'd, and for the few Hebrew copies that were then extant to ſuffer corruption. The Jews in their diſperſions for the moſt part learn'd Greek, and in their ſynagogues uſed Aquila's verſion; ſo that the Hebrew was in a great meaſure neglected. And to make all this plain, I will give ſome inſtances of the * Origen died in the 69th year of his age, in the reign of Gallus and Voluſianus, according to ſome; or as others, of Valerian and Gallienus, A. D. 253. ſo that his Hexapla muſt have been compiled betwixt the beginning and middle of the third century.

the Jews altering the text and changing their opinions, as to the matters I am ſpeaking of, after the deſtruction of the temple, and before the compoſing of the Miſna in the time of Antoninus Pius; or at leaſt before Origen publiſh'd the Hebrew.

FIRST, Gen. ii. 24. the Samaritan and Septuagint have the word Two, and Mat. xix. 5, 6. our Saviour urgeth the Phariſees with the force of that word; and they, though well skill'd in Hebrew, were unable to anſwer the force of the argument; whence it appears, it was then in the Hebrew, though not now; and probably left out by R. Akiba, in the age I am ſpeaking of, who allow'd the Jews to marry any woman they ſaw fairer than their own wife.

SECONDLY, Pſal. xxii. 16. They pierc'd my hands; ſo the Septuagint, Syriack, Arabick, Ethiopick, and ſome few manuſcripts of the Hebrew. Aquila likewiſe read it ſo; for he tranſlates it by a verb; but the Rabbins, to evade ſuch a plain prophecy of our Saviour's crucifixion, alter the word of the text, and read, As a lion.

THIRDLY, Joſh. xv. 59, &c. there are two verſes in the LXX, which ſhew Bethlehem to be in the tribe of Judah, wanting in the Hebrew. St. Jerom, on Micah v. thinks them eraſed by the Jews, ſince the time of our Saviour, that it might not appear that Bethlehem was in the tribe of Judah.

FOURTHLY, After the deſtruction of Jeruſalem, and before the Seder Olam Rabbah was made by R. Joſe in the days of Adrian, the Jews ſo curtail'd the Perſian monarchy, as to make Daniel's weeks to begin with the Babyloniſh captivity, and end at the deſtruction of the temple. Joſephus knew of no ſuch chronology in his time, and it could not be chance, but a contrivance of the Jews after the ſecond of Veſpaſian, that with the loſs of two hundred years made Daniel's four hundred and ninety years exactly end at that time.

FIFTHLY, The great diſagreement of the opinions of the Jews before and after the deſtruction of the temple. Before that time the verſion of the LXX was held in great eſteem by Philo and the Egyptians, (who kept a feaſt yearly in memory of it) and by the Jews in all the Greek diſperſion, and at Nazareth, Luke iv. 16, 17, 18, 19. and by thoſe of Jeruſalem, as appears by Joſephus, who magnifieth it, and the account given by Ariſteas. In Adrian's time the LXX were rail'd at by the Jews, and the Jews kept a faſt upon the day it was tranſlated, viz. Tebeth the eighth, and made another Greek verſion to oppoſe it, and deliver'd it as a tradition, that darkneſs overſpread the world for three days after the verſion of the LXX was made, and that it was as unlucky a day to the Jews, as when the golden calf was made.

SIXTHLY, Phaleg was born at the diviſion of tongues, ſaith Joſephus, according to the opinion of the Jews that then prevail'd; but the Rabbins who have lived ſince tell us, that he died at that time.

SEVENTHLY, Melchiſedech was a Canaanitiſh king, ſaith Joſephus, according to the opinion of the Jews in his age, and 'tis agreeable to St. Paul; but the ſucceeding Jews ſuppoſed him to be Sem.

EIGHTHLY, Daniel's weeks, according to Joſephus, ended at the deſolation of the temple by Antiochus, which was according to him four hundred and eight years, from the firſt year of Darius; to which add the ſeventy years from the burning of the temple, and it comes very near to Daniel's number; but the following Jews curtail the Perſian monarchy; and though they begin the weeks at the beginning of the Babyloniſh captivity, yet they end them at the ſecond of Veſpaſian.

SOME will object, what end or deſign ſhould the Jews have in ſhortening the period betwixt the flood and the birth of Abraham.

FIRST, It may be anſwer'd, that it might be for the eaſier bringing down their pretended traditions from Adam, Noah, &c. for ſo the Jews boaſt, in Seder Olam Rabbah, that ſeven men meaſure the world, Adam, Methuſelah, Sem, Jacob, Amram, Ahaja Salonites, and Elias, who is ſtill alive; when as, according to the chronology of the Samaritan Septuagint, and Joſephus, there muſt be added at leaſt Heber, Saruch, and Abraham, betwixt Sem and Jacob; and even ſo Saruch would be but eight years old at the death of Heber, and Jacob but fifteen years old at the death of Abraham; ſo that there would be need of two more perſons to be inſerted for carrying on their traditions, and ſo from Sem to Jacob would be as many perſons as they made in all the world. Secondly, That it might be done to obviate the prophecy of the houſe of Elias, that Chriſt ſhould come at the beginning of the fifth millenary. Now ſince the fourth millenary, according to the preſent account of the Jews, ended A. D. 242. it is evident that this curtailing their chronology was long before that time, in which they expected the Meſſiah. But when they found themſelves miſtaken alſo in the account, they took up that ſaying, Curſed is he that numbereth the times. Thirdly, that it might be done to baffle the argument that St. Paul puſhed the Hebrews with, that Melchiſedech's prieſthood was above Aaron's; which we find urged alſo by Juſtin Martyr againſt Tryphon, by Tertullian, and other early Chriſtians. For if Melchiſedech be Sem, then Aaron, who was lineally deſcended from him, inherited his prieſthood alſo; and ſo the argument of St. Paul and the chriſtians of a ſuperior prieſthood to the Aaronitical, would be deſtroy'd. And here it is probable, that as the old Rabbies talk'd much of the ſchools of Sem and Heber, and that Jacob ſtudied in them; ſo at firſt they deſigned Heber to be Melchiſedech, and cut off the years only of the patriarchs after him; for the preſent Hebrew ſaith, that he lived after he begat Phaleg four hundred and thirty years, where the Samaritan and Septuagint agree in the number of two hundred and ſeventy years; and if after Heber we follow the preſent Hebrew, Heber lived to the hundred and fifth year of Abraham; and to this agreeth what Epiphanius tells us in the hereſy of the Melchiſedechians, that ſome Hebrew copies from the birth of Sem to the time that Melchiſedech met Abraham in the eighth or ninth year of Abraham, have about ſix hundred and twenty eight years, thus:

|---|---|---|---|
| Sem | 102 | Ragau | 32 |
| Arphaxad | 100 | Saruch | 30 |
| Sala | 100 | Nachor | 29 |
| Heber | 150 | Terah | 70 |
| Phaleg | 30 | Abraham | 85 |
| | | In all | 628 |

But this project not taking, they choſe rather yet to ſhorten this period, and make Sem to be Melchiſedech; for ſince the Chaldee paraphraſe ſaith that Rebecca conſulted the ſchools of Sem, and the Rabbies added that Jacob ſtudied in the ſchools of Sem, they the eaſier concluded that Sem was alive in the time of Jacob. Now that this was contrived after the deſtruction of the ſecond temple, appears from hence, that not only Joſephus tells us that he was a Canaanitiſh king, but that it is impoſſible for the Samaritan or Septuagint, or ſuch as uſed either of thoſe pentateuchs, to take him for Sem. Indeed all the early fathers who mention him (Irenæus, Hippolytus, Theophilus, Euſebius, Hieronymus, Theodoret, &c.) aſſent to Joſephus, and make him a Canaanitiſh king; and St. Paul, when he wrote to the Hebrews, ſeems an intire ſtranger to any ſuch extravagant fancy as that of making Melchiſedech to be Sem, but all along takes it as a ſettled confirm'd opinion, and a thing univerſally agreed on, that he was not concerned in the genealogy of Aaron; and ſo according to the laws of the Jews could have no right to the prieſthood.

Some others of the Jews endeavour'd to evade St. Paul's argument, by making Melchiſedech an angel; an opinion that Origen and Didymus borrow'd from them, and which St. Ambroſe, De Fide, lib. iii. cap. 5. calls Judaicum Ludibrium, i. e. a ridiculous Jewiſh notion.

But the ſubterfuge, which chiefly prevail'd among them, was the curtailing the period of the poſt-diluvian patriarchs, and making Sem to be Melchiſedech, and then Aaron lineally deſcending from him to inherit his prieſthood alſo; and to make this probable, it may not be improper to obſerve, how induſtrious the Jews have been to pervert the hiſtory of Melchiſedech, and anſwer St. Paul's argument taken from him.

First, They tell us that Melchiſedech was a baſtard; and becauſe his name was not to be found in the genealogies, therefore ſaid to be without father, &c. (See Epiphanius of the hereſy of the Melchiſedechians, p. 7.) But how this will agree with his being Sem, I cannot conceive.

Secondly, They denied Melchiſedech's prieſthood, and tranſlate כוהי prince, contrary to the opinions of the ſeventy Jews that tranſlated it ἱερεὺς, to Eupolemus in Euſebius's Præp. Ev. lib. xix. c. 17. to Philo the Jew in his book of Abraham, to Joſephus in Antiq. lib. i. c. 7. to ſeveral Jews in Epiphan. T. i. p. 473. and to St. Paul in his epiſtle to them, c. 7.

Thirdly, they make Sem elder than Japhet, and to inherit the prieſthood by right of primogeniture, contrary to the LXX, Gen. x. 21. and to Joſephus, Antiq. B. i. c. 7. who calls Sem the third ſon of Noah.

Fourthly, They give a different expoſition of the text, ſo as to make Melchiſedech pay tithes to Abraham, contrary to the Septuagint, to Joſephus, Antiq. B. i. c. 11. to Philo, and St. Paul, Heb. vii. 2.

Fifthly, They corrupted the text, Pſal. cx. 4. where by adding a jod, they apply it to David, contrary to the Septuagint, to St. Paul, Heb. v. 6. and vii. 17. and to the Scribes and Phariſees, who expounded that pſalm of the Meſſiah, Matth. xxii. 42, 43.

Upon all which accounts it may not ſeem improbable, that as * Aquila made his verſion of the bible in the time of † Adrian, to oppoſe chriſtianity, and depreciate the verſion of the Septuagint, which was uſed by the Chriſtians; ſo the few learned Jews that lived about that time, did agree to make ſome alterations in the Hebrew alſo, in order to oppoſe the Chriſtians, and to magnify their traditions; and then the true chronology of the Hebrew will be that preſerv'd by Joſephus in his Antiquities, which followeth the ſhorter account before the flood, and the longer after it.

* This Aquila was a man of unſettled principles; firſt a judicial aſtrologer, then a chriſtian, and after that, upon ſome diſguſt or other, he turn'd Jew, and was circumciſed, and became a bitter enemy to the chriſtian religion. Whoever has a mind to know more of him, may conſult Epiph. in l. de Menſ. & Ponderib.

† Adrian begun his reign A. D. 117. and died A. D. 138.

LIFE of JOSEPHUS,

Written Originally by Himſelf.

AS different nations ſet a value on dignity of birth and illuſtrious extraction, according to their ſeveral conceptions and notions of honour; ſo with us nothing more ennobles a family, than the diſcharge of the ſacerdotal function; upon which account I may look upon myſelf by birth, ſufficiently diſtinguiſhed from the vulgar, as I am deſcended not only from holy progenitors, who bore the ſacred office, but from prieſts of the firſt courſe of the * Four and twenty, amongſt which there are different degrees of diſtinction. By my mother's ſide I am related to royal blood; for the Aſamonæan family, from whom ſhe derived her deſcent, ſucceſſively bore the office of king and prieſt in our nation for a great many generations. I ſhall ſet down the ſucceſſion in order. Simon, ſirnam'd Pſellus, was my great grandfather's grandfather, who lived when Hyrcanus, the ſon of Simon the high-prieſt, and firſt of that name, held the pontificate. This Simon Pſellus had nine ſons, Matthias for one, otherwiſe called Aphlias, who took to wife the daughter of Jonathan the high-prieſt, by whom, in the firſt year of the reign of Hyrcanus, he had a ſon called Matthias Curtus; to whom, in the ninth year of the reign of Alexandra, was born Joſeph; and to him Matthias in the tenth year of king Archelaus; and to Matthias in the firſt year of the reign of † Caius Cæſar, I myſelf, who have three ſons alſo; Hyrcanus, the eldeſt, was born in the fourth year of the reign of Veſpaſian Cæſar; Juſtus in the ſeventh, and Agrippa in the ninth; and this account of my family I have ſet down as I find it upon record, little regarding the malice of my enemies, who may endeavour to traduce my family, and calumniate my character.

Joſeph the ſon of Matthias.

Joſephus had three ſons, Hyrcanus, Juſtus, and Agrippa.

My father Matthias was highly reſpected all over Jeruſalem by perſons of all degrees and conditions, not only for his noble birth and extraction, but much more alſo for his integrity and juſtice. I had an own brother of my father's name, and he and I were educated at ſchool together from children. Now being endued with a tolerable good underſtanding and memory, by the age of fourteen I had acquired ſuch a reputation for learning, that the chief prieſts and rulers would frequently come to conſult me about the more difficult and abſtruſe points of the law. After I had arrived at ſixteen, I determin'd to dip into the doctrines of the principal ſects among us, whereof there are three, the Phariſees, the Sadduces, and the Eſſenes; concluding after I had tried them all, I ſhould be the better able to chuſe that which I liked beſt; ſo I paſſed through the requiſite auſterities of them all, with much labour and mortification; nor did I think fit to ſtop here, but hearing of one Banus, who lived like an hermit in the wilderneſs, I became a follower of him alſo. His cuſtom was to uſe no other cloathing than the leaves of trees; to eat no other food than what the earth naturally produced; to bath often in cold water, the better to reſtrain the irregularities of his appetites, and preſerve his chaſtity. After I had ſtaid with him three years under theſe diſciplines, and fully gratified my inclination herein, I returned into the city. And

He applies himſelf to the ſtudy of the three ſects.

Becomes a diſciple of one Banus, a man of great auſterity.

* The four and twenty were inſtituted by king David in the latter end of his reign, out of the four and twenty families of prieſts, ſixteen of which were deſcended from Eleazar, and eight from Ithamar, the two ſons of Aaron. By this appointment every family was to officiate in the temple eight days, or from ſabbath to ſabbath, and ſo to do duty one after another, each in his turn or courſe, which was at that time determin'd by lot, and enter'd upon roll. The firſt family, and ſo the ſecond, the third, &c. in order, according as it happened.

† Caius Cæſar Caligula, the fourth Roman emperor. He begun his reign, A. D. 173.

now being nineteen years old, I betook myſelf to a ſecular courſe of life, adhering to the ſect of the Phariſees, whoſe doctrines approach neareſt to the opinions of the Stoicks amongſt the Greeks.

Joſeph. inclines to the way of the Phariſees.

WHEN I was ſix and twenty years old, there fell out a very particular occurrence, which occaſioned me a voyage to Rome; it was this: Felix being procurator of Judea, had for ſome ſlight affront or other, ſent priſoners to Rome, ſeveral prieſts of unblameable characters, who were my intimate acquaintance, in order to take their trial before Cæſar. Upon the news of my friends misfortunes, I imbarked for Rome, reſolving to uſe my utmoſt efforts, to effect their deliverance, eſpecially when I heard they continued ſtedfaſt to their principles, though reduced to the utmoſt diſtreſs, and neceſſitated to feed upon figs and nuts, to ſupport life. In my paſſage thither I went through innumerable dangers at ſea; for our ſhip foundered in the middle of the Adriatick gulph, and out of a matter of ſix hundred of us, who were in company, only I, and ſome others, about eighty in all, who outſwam the reſt, were by God's ſpecial providence preſerved, being taken up early next morning by a ſhip of Cyrene, after we had been a whole night in the water. After this deliverance I contracted an acquaintance at Dicearchia, or Puteoli, as the Italians chuſe rather to call it, with one Alityrus, a comedian and favourite of Nero, who was by nation a Jew, and by whoſe intereſt I became known to Nero's wife Poppæa, of whom I quickly obtained, that thoſe prieſts ſhould be ſet at liberty; and ſo I returned to my own country, diſmiſs'd not without conſiderable preſents over and above. At my arrival there, I found the minds of the people diſpoſed for an inſurrection, and ready to revolt from the Romans; whereupon I endeavour'd all I could to bring the mutineers to better reaſon, by laying before them the power of the enemy they had to do withal, a people much their ſuperior in martial diſcipline, policy, and fortune; wherefore I adviſed them not inconſiderately and raſhly to hazard the ruin of their country, themſelves, their wives, and children, upon ſuch unequal terms. At this rate I plied them with all the arguments I could think of, to diſſuade them from enterprizing on a war, which I plainly foreſaw would involve them in the moſt diſmal and deſtructive conſequences; yet all to no purpoſe, their reſolutions were deſperate, and their madneſs incurable. Fearing therefore leaſt I had by a frequent and importunate repetition of the ſame counſels, incurr'd their diſpleaſure, and given them cauſe to ſuſpect I was a favourer of the enemy, to avoid the danger of being ſeized, and put to death, I withdrew into the temple, the faction having already made themſelves maſters of fort Antonia. After * Manahem and the ringleaders of his faction were cut off, I came out of the temple, and converſed frequently with the chief prieſts and principal men among the Phariſees, who were in great fear and perplexity; for we ſaw the people up in arms, and what to do we knew not. To appeaſe the conſpirators was beyond our skill, beſides dangerous to attempt, wherefore we pretended to approve their proceedings, but yet adviſed them not to be too raſh, but let the enemy † draw off a little, hoping that Geſſius || would come ſpeedily with a power ſufficient to ſuppreſs the ſedition. Geſſius came back indeed to his coſt; for his troops were intirely cut to pieces in the attempt, and himſelf ſlain; and this blow proved the utter ruin of our nation; for the ſucceſs of this action made the conſpirators vain enough to think they were able to conquer the whole Roman power with the ſame eaſe. Juſt at this time happened a very tragical occurrence, which was as follows:

Felix ſends ſeveral prieſts priſoners to Rome.

Joſeph. takes a voyage to relieve them.

The ſhip is loſt, and Joſephus is wonderfully preſerv'd.

He is made known at Rome to Poppæa, who gets the priſoners their liberty.

The people in a deſperate uproar Joſephus gives them good counſel.

Manahem, and ſome of the ringleaders put to death.

Geſſius Florus defeated.

THE Syrians and Jews living promiſcuouſly together in ſeveral great towns bordering on Judea, the Syrian inhabitants took occaſion to murder all the Jews, men, women, and children, who lived with them in thoſe cities, without any provocation at all; for they had neither ſhewn any publick tokens of diſaffection to the Romans, nor been guilty of doing any wrong to them in their private circumſtances. But above all, the barbarity of the Scythopolitans was moſt tranſcendently wicked and inhuman; for being invaded by Jews, who did not live amongſt them, they not only forced the Jews of the place, their fellow-citizens, to take up arms againſt thoſe of their own country, which is a thing forbidden by our laws; but after they had with their help diſperſed the enemy, and obtained a complete victory, contrary to gratitude, to juſtice, and common faith, they maſſacred all of that nation amongſt them without diſtinction, to the number of ſeveral thouſand perſons. The Jews that inhabited in Damaſcus fared no better; but of this I ſhall ſpeak more at large in my hiſtory of the wars of the Jews, that the reader may ſee we did not begin this war by choice, but were forced to it by extreme mere neceſſity.

A maſſacre of the Jews.

The barbarous ingratitude of the Scythopolitans.

A war of neceſſity.

AFTER the defeat of Geſſius, the chief men amongſt the Jews finding themſelves left naked and defenceleſs, and the mutineers well furniſhed with arms, apprehended, what afterwards proved true enough, that they ſhould be expoſed to their inſults; and underſtanding that but one part of Galilee had revolted from the Romans, and that the other was peaceably inclined to them, they commiſſioned me and two other prieſts, Joazar and Judas, men of good repute, to go thither, to intreat the diſaffected party to lay down their arms, and to convince them that it was much better at preſent to ſurrender them up into the hands of the governors, who would be ſure to let them have them again whenever there was an occaſion to make uſe of them; and by all means to forbear hoſtilities at preſent, till they ſhould know more certainly the real intentions of the Romans.

Commiſſioners ſent to quiet the common people.

* This Manahem was wont to upbraid the Jews, for profeſſing to worſhip one God, and at the ſame time owning the Romans for their maſters: he was a perſon of mean extraction, of a very turbulent and ſeditious temper, and the head of a faction againſt the Romans. Setting himſelf up for a prince, he was put to death, together with the chief of his accomplices, by Eleazar the high-prieſt's ſon the head of another faction, and the firſt who excited the Jews to rebel againſt the Romans.

WITH

A quarrel betwixt the Galileans and the Sepphorites

WITH theſe inſtructions I went into Galilee, where I found the Sepphorites ingaged in defence of their country, that was in great danger of being overrun by the Galileans, who had invaded them becauſe they continued firm in their alliance to the Romans, and would not violate their faith with Senius Gallus then governor of Syria. But I found an expedient to make the Sepphorites eaſy, and to pacify the Galileans, by procuring them a licence to ſend as often as they pleaſed to Pora, a city of Phœnicia, to their hoſtages there, whom they had given to Geſſius.

Tiberias in arms. Three factions.

As for the men of Tiberias, I found them all in arms, and the quarrel was this: There were three parties in this city; One conſiſting of well-affected people, headed by Julius Capellus, who was joined by Herod the ſon of Mirarus, Herod the ſon of Gamalus, and Campſus the ſon of Campſus; but as for Criſpus his brother, who had been ſome time governor of that city by the appointment of Herod the Great, he at this time lived at his own eſtate beyond Jordan. Theſe all of them abode by the king and the Roman people, and ſo too did all the reſt of the nobility to a man, ſave Piſtus, who in compliance with his ſon Juſtus ſtood out. The ſecond party conſiſting of ſcoundrels and rabble, declared for a war. At the head of the third was Juſtus the ſon of Piſtus, who though he did not give his opinion in expreſs words for a war, yet at the ſame time from the bottom of his heart wiſhed for nothing more than a revolution, in hopes thereby of gaining ſome conſiderable poſt, and advancing his fortune; to which end he made a ſpeech to the people in a full aſſembly, endeavouring to perſuade them, "That their city was always reckoned to belong to Galilee, and that it had once been the metropolis of that country in the time of Herod the Tetrarch, who being the founder of it, made Sepphoris ſubject to it; that it continued to enjoy this preheminece even under the government of Agrippa the Father, till Felix became governor of Judea; and that it but very lately loſt its right of precedency, no longer ago than the time it was beſtowed upon Agrippa the Younger by Nero; and that the Sepphorites were never favour'd with any privilege above their neighbours, till their ſubjecting themſelves to the Roman power, and the removal of the records and the king's houſhold thither upon that revolution." With theſe and many other the like invective expreſſions againſt the king, when Juſtus perceived he had excited a ſpirit of rebellion in the minds of the people, he ſaid, "Since the Sepphorites obſtinately reſolved to continue their alliance with the Romans, now was the only time to aſſert by force of arms their juſt right of precedency over the whole; and in conjunction with the reſt of the cities of Galilee, who all bore them an antipathy, to fall upon them with their whole force, and do them what miſchief they could." With this plauſible and popular harangue, which ſeemed to carry the air of reaſon in it, he gained over the multitude: beſides he was ſo well verſed in Græcian literature, as to be able to compile the hiſtory of thoſe times, whereby he diguiſed the truth of things at pleaſure, as he found it made moſtly for his purpoſe. But of this man's wickedneſs, and how near he and his brother went to the total and irrecoverable deſtruction of their country, an account ſhall be given in the ſequel of this diſcourſe. When Juſtus therefore had prevailed upon ſome of the citizens by fair means, and others by force to take up arms, he marched out with them all in a body, and laid in aſhes the villages of the Hippenes and Gadarenes adjoining to the country of Tiberias and Scythopolis.

Juſtus ſtirs up the people againſt the Romans.

Juſtus burns the Hippenes and Gadarenes out of their houſes.

To paſs over from the ſtate of affairs at Tiberias to that of Giſchala: John the ſon of Levi obſerving ſeveral of his countrymen grown weary and impatient of bearing the Roman yoak any longer, did all he could to keep them in their allegiance and duty; but all to no purpoſe: for their neighbours the Gadarenes, Gabaraganeans and Tyrians, gathering together in a ſtrong body, aſſaulted and carried by ſtorm Giſchala, which after they had burnt, and laid level with the ground, they retired. John was ſo provoked at this outrage that he marched with all the Troops he could raiſe againſt them, engaged, and vanquiſhed them; and after that rebuilt the city, and for ſecurity environed it with a wall.

Giſchala laid in aſhes. John the ſon of Levi defeats the rebels.

Gamala firm to the Romans.

BUT the people of Gamala all this while continued firmly attached to the Roman intereſt, as may be ſeen by what follows. Philip the ſon of Jacimus Agrippa's lieutenant, having unexpectedly got off whilſt the enemy were ſtorming the palace at Jeruſalem, fell into another danger every jot as bad, and had like to have had his throat cut by Manahem and his barbarous crew; but was, however, happily ſaved at the interceſſion of ſome of his Babylonian relations, who were then at Jeruſalem; and five days afterwards by diſguiſing himſelf in a cap of falſe hair, he made his eſcape to a certain village near the caſtle of Gamala, ſituate in his own dominions; where when he was arrived he ſent for ſeveral of his ſubjects to come to him. In this place he happen'd to be ſeiz'd ſuddenly with a fever, which by a wonderful providence proved the occaſion of ſaving his life; for while he lay ſick he wrote letters to Agrippa and Berenice by a certain freedman, with orders to deliver them to Varus, to whom at that time, by the king and queen's appointment, was committed the care of the palace, they being on their journey to Berytus to meet Geſſius. When Varus upon the receipt of the letters underſtood that Philip was got ſafe off, he took it to heart exceedingly, fearing leſt the king and queen ſhould diſmiſs him, as ſoon as Philip ſhould return in ſafety. Wherefore Varus expoſes the meſſenger to the people as a cheat, and one that had come to him with a lie in his mouth, ſince to his certain knowledge (as he ſaid) Philip was then in the Roman army at Jeruſalem, fighting againſt the Jews; and accordingly upon this accuſation ſentenced him to be ſeverely puniſhed. The former meſſenger not returning Philip diſpatches a ſecond with another packet, requiring him to bring him word what had befallen the firſt that he did not come back; Varus took occaſion to deal by him alſo as he did by the firſt; for the Syrians of Cæſarea had puffed up Varus with an opinion that he ſhould become a great man, perſuading him that the Romans would put Agrippa to death for this rebellion of the Jews, and that they would confer the crown upon him as a near relation of the royal family; for it was well

Philip's wonderful eſcape and deliverance.

Philip writes to Agrippa and Berenice.

Varus puts a meſſenger to death as an impoſtor.

He puts a ſecond meſſenger to death upon the ſame pretence.

well known he had royal blood in his veins, being deſcended from Sohemus the Tetrarch of Libanus. Elated with theſe hopes Varus therefore made bold to detain the letters, and took particular care the king ſhould never have them; and for fear leſt any one ſhould eſcape privately, and inform the king of his proceedings, he ſet guards in all the paſſes: moreover to ingratiate himſelf with the Syrians of Cæſarea he put great numbers of the Jews to death, determining likewiſe with the aſſiſtance of the Trachonites of Batanæa to fall upon the Jews of Ecbatana, who are called Babylonians. To which end calling to him twelve of the chief men among the Cæſarean Jews, he ordered them to go immediately and tell their countrymen in his name, that he had received intelligence they were making preparations of war againſt the king, which he was not willing to believe; but notwithſtanding, that he ſtrictly enjoined them to lay down their arms, as the moſt convincing proof they could give of their innocence, and that the report was without foundation; adding farther, that he inſiſted upon their ſending ſeventy of their principal men to clear them of the crime wherewith they were charged. The twelve deputies faithfully executed their orders; but when they came to Ecbatana they found their countrymen about no ſuch deſign; however in conformity to their orders they prevailed with them to ſend the ſeventy perſons required along with them back to Cæſarea. Varus in the mean time, with a party of the king's ſoldiers, intercepted them on their journey, fell upon them, and cut them and the deputies likewiſe, all off to a man; after which, he advanced upon his deſign againſt the Jews at Ecbatana: but by a ſtrange providence one of the ſeventy eſcaped the maſſacre, and had the good luck to get there before him with the news of this moſt treacherous and inhuman action: whereupon the inhabitants immediately armed themſelves, and with their wives and children took refuge in the caſtle of Gamala, leaving their effects and cattle to a conſiderable value, behind them. So ſoon as Philip heard of this adventure he went thither to them, where the people gave him an univerſal and hearty welcome, intreating him that he would by all means undertake the war, and be their commander againſt Varus and the Syrians of Cæſarea; for there was a current report abroad that they had killed the king. But Philip did all that lay in his power to appeaſe their fury, by reminding them of the many and great favours the king had conferred upon them, and of what dangerous conſequence it would be to riſe in rebellion againſt the vaſt and formidable power of the Romans: inſomuch that they were brought, at laſt, by his arguments to a better temper. Herod coming at laſt to hear that Varus had a deſign to have maſſacred all the Jews of Cæſarea, with their wives and children, to the number of ſeveral thouſand perſons, he diſcarded him, and ſent Equus Modius to ſucceed him, as we ſhall take notice of elſewhere, whilſt Philip kept Gamala and the adjacent countries in obedience to the Romans.

The Jews treacherouſly inveigled and cut to pieces.

The inhabitants withdraw upon it into Gamala.

Philip goes to them there.

The people offer to chuſe him for their leader againſt Varus.

Varus diſplaced and Equus Modius ſucceeds him.

AT my arrival in Galilee, having received certain intelligence of theſe things, I wrote to the council at Jeruſalem for inſtructions what to do; and the anſwer I received was to continue in Galilee, and provide for the ſafety of the place as well as I could, and to retain my colleagues ſtill with me, if they could be prevailed upon to ſtay; for having received ſome conſiderable ſums of money that were in arrear for the prieſts tithes, they had ſome thoughts of returning home again; but being intreated to ſtay till we had eſtabliſhed peace and quietneſs in the place, they readily conſented: ſo we went all together from Sepphoris to Bethmaus, a place about four furlongs diſtant from Tiberias; from whence I ſent a meſſenger to ſummon the ſenate of Tiberias, and ſome of the heads of the people to come over to me. Upon their arrival, and Juſtus among the reſt, I told them I had a commiſſion from the council at Jeruſalem, together with my aſſociates, to confer with them about the demoliſhing the palace which Herod the Tetrarch had built there, and adorned with ſeveral curious images and figures of living creatures, being a thing expreſly forbidden by our laws; preſſing earneſtly that it might be done out of hand. Capella, and the people of his faction, oppos'd it a long time; but at laſt, after a hard conteſt, we carried the point; now while this debate was a foot, Jeſus the ſon of Saphia, at the head of a ſcandalous crew of tarpaulins, and other ſcoundrel fellows, with the help of a band of ſeditious Galilæans, ſet fire to the palace royal, in expectation of a conſiderable booty; for he had obſerved the roofs of ſeveral of the rooms to be richly adorned with gold: and in effect they ſpoiled and carried off a great many things of value in deſpite of all we could do to hinder it. So ſoon as this conference with Capella and the governors of Tiberias was over, we betook ourſelves from Bethmaus into the Upper Galilee; at which time the faction of Jeſus put all the Greeks in Tiberias to the ſword, and all others likewiſe that had been enemies to them before the war. Upon the news of this outrage, I went in a great rage to Tiberias, to try what I could ſave of the king's goods upon this pillage; for there were ſeveral rich candleſticks of Corinthian work, precious tables, and a great deal of ſilver in the maſs; and, in fine, reſolving all this while to depoſite what goods ſoever I laid hold on, for the king's uſe: ſo that ſending for ten of the chief ſenators, and Capella the ſon of Antyllus, I deliver'd all the rich veſſels and other things of value into their cuſtody, with an expreſs charge not to part with them to any body but myſelf. I went from thence with my aſſociates to Giſchala, to inform myſelf what John intended to do; whom I found manifeſtly engaged in the promoting of an inſurrection, and ſetting up for himſelf. The emperor had ſeveral ſtorehouſes fill'd with corn in ſeveral parts of the Upper Galilee, and John would fain have had the exporting and vending of it, with an intent, he ſaid, to employ the profit in building walls and fortifications. I ſoon ſmelt what he would be at, and told him plainly, that it was a thing I would by no means conſent to; for being obliged by virtue of my commiſſion from Jeruſalem to take care of all things within that juriſdiction, I could not diſpoſe of thoſe ſtores any other way than either to the ſervice of the emperor, or the good of the province. When he found I was not to be prevailed upon, he applied himſelf to my aſſociates, who, betwixt want of foreſight and love of money, were brought over by bribes and fair words to comply with his demands; and being two to one, they muſt needs carry it.

it. John had no ſooner gained this point, but he bethought himſelf of another ſtratagem: The inhabitants of Cæſarea Philippi had made complaints to him, he ſaid, that they wanted pure virgin oil, and deſired him to ſupply them, the Greek oil being forbidden them, and the king's prohibition reſtraining them from going out of town to fetch it. Now this was done by him not ſo much out of a principle of generoſity, as ſelf-intereſt; for he knew that this oil bore forty times the price at Cæſarea that it did at Giſchala; ſo that he ſent away all the oil from one place to the other, under colour of my licence. Certain it is, I did thus far licence the tranſporting of it: I durſt not preſume to hinder it, for fear of being tore in pieces by the people; and ſo far only I yielded to it. This, in ſhort, was a wicked contrivance that John turned greatly to his advantage.

FROM this place I ſent my aſſociates back again to Jeruſalem; and after that, made it my whole buſineſs to arm, fortify, and in ſhort, to provide all that in me lay for the defence of my province. The Free-Booters, I found, were not to be reduced by force; and ſo I put the people upon trying what might be done by compoſition; whereupon we treated with ſeveral leading men among them to take them off by money; being all convinced, that the expence of the penſion would not amount to near the ſpoil they'd make by rapine and pillage. We came, in ſhort, to an agreement; and I took their oaths for performance of articles, and ſo we parted. The conditions were theſe, That they ſhould not offer any violence, either to Romans or Natives, nor ever ſet foot in our country, unleſs when invited, or elſe to receive their pay. But above all other things, it was my peculiar care to keep Galilee quiet; and in order thereto, I made choice of ſeventy of their moſt reputable men to attend me, whom I made uſe of as companions, counſellors, and aſſiſtants; nay, I govern'd myſelf in a great meaſure by their advice, ſaving an inviolable reſpect to integrity and juſtice; ſo that under the appearance of friends, they ſerved me likewiſe in the quality of hoſtages.

I was now in the thirtieth year of my life; an age wherein all the virtue and precaution in nature is not able to ſecure a man from the laſh of envy and detraction; eſpecially in a poſt of honour and power. But I can ſay this for myſelf however, that I was never charged with any miſdemeanor, either in relation to incontinency, or corruption. I wanted nothing, and I coveted nothing: nay, I was ſo far from taking any thing I had no legal right to, that I refuſed my very tenths, though properly my dues as a prieſt, even when they were offer'd me. As for the ſpoils taken from the Syrians upon the defeat I gave them, it is very true that I ſent part of that booty to my kindred at Jeruſalem; and ſo, after two overthrows given to the Sepphorites; four to the people of Tiberias; one to the Gadarenes; and John himſelf, after ſeveral treacherous practices againſt me, made my priſoner, I paſſed it all over without taking any revenge, either of the one or the other; and God who ſaw the innocence of my heart in this whole affair, was ſo gracious as to deliver me from the ſnares of my perfidious enemies; and not upon that occaſion only, but divers times afterwards, as will be ſeen in its proper place.

The modeſty and juſtice of Joſephus's adminiſtration.

THE people of Galilee had all of them ſuch a reſpect and veneration for me, that though they ſaw their towns deſtroy'd, and their wives and children hurried away into captivity, they had yet a much greater concern for my hazards and ſufferings, than for their own. John was already to burſt all this while with envy at the thought of my being ſo popular; and under the pretext of a preſent indiſpoſition, he wrote to me for leave to go to the hot baths of Tiberias for his health; which I not only granted him at firſt word, without ſo much as dreaming of any trick in the bottom of it, but gave him recommendatory letters alſo to the cities then under my adminiſtration to furniſh him and his train with meat, drink, lodging, and all other conveniencies, and to take care that they wanted nothing. I was at this time in a village of Galilee called Cana. John was no ſooner come to Tiberias, but he fell preſently to work upon debauching the inhabitants into a ſedition, and inveigling them to break off with me, and come over to his party. There were a great many among them forward and factious enough to hearken to any thing that tended towards the promoting of a change, and overjoy'd too of ſuch an occaſion: as among others, Juſtus, and his father Piſtus, who immediately cloſed with the propoſition, and join'd intereſts with John againſt me. But by my coming there the plot was ſeaſonably diſappointed; for Silas, my deputy-governor of Tiberias, diſpatched a meſſenger to me with an account of the whole ſtory, from point to point, and how the caſe ſtood at that time, and what they intended: adviſing me by all means to make what haſte I could thither, and prevent the miſchief before it was too late, or elſe the government would quickly be in other hands. Upon reading this intelligence, I poſted away for Tiberias with two hundred men, ſent a meſſenger before to inform my friends I was a-coming, and ſo travelled the whole night. The people, early in the morning came out of the town to meet me upon the way, and John himſelf among the reſt; but ſo out of countenance and confounded, that he betray'd his guilt in his face. Being now conſcious to himſelf that his neck was at ſtake, if he was diſcovered, he made a haſty reverence, and that inſtant withdrew to his lodging. In the mean time, I went directly to the publick place of exerciſes, where I diſcharged all my own train, except one perſon of note, and ten ſoldiers that I kept about me. After this, I mounted a lofty precipice, from whence I harangued the Tiberians upon the ſubject of good faith and allegiance; the honour of a generous conſtancy; and the actual baſeneſs, as well as dangerous conſequences of violating their faith; for one treachery, I told them, would moſt certainly be avenged upon the head of the traitor by another; and that after one act of perfidy, their credit would be loſt for ever. The words were hardly out of my mouth, but I heard ſome body call vehemently and earneſtly to me immediately to come down, and provide for my own ſecurity, for my enemies were juſt upon me; and that this was no time for ſpeeches. Now the truth of it was, that having me at an advantage in a place where I was little better than alone, John drew a ſelect number of men out of the thouſand that he commanded, with orders to kill me; and they were already advanced within a very little of executing their design; which they had certainly done, if I had not leaped down that very moment by the help of one of my own guards, whose name was Jacob, and one Herod of Tiberias, who conducted me safe to the lake; where, by divine providence, beyond all expectation, I found a vessel ready that carried me off to Tarichеæ, and out of the reach and power of my enemies. The people of the place were so incensed at the Tiberians upon this story of their barbarous treachery, that they immediately armed themselves, and importunately begged of me in a body, to march at the head of them against those perfidious traytors, that they might do me right upon them for so horrid a villainy. The report of this outrage was quickly spread all over Galilee, with an invitation to come in and join with them against Tiberias, and to submit themselves to the direction and conduct of their governor, to do whatever he should think fit. The Galilæans armed themselves presently in great numbers; and with great earnestness entreated me to assault Tiberias, and upon the taking of it, utterly to demolish it; and to expose the inhabitants with their whole families to sale for slaves at a publick outcry. Nor was this the sense of the Galilæans only, but my very friends who came to me out of Tiberias, gave me the same advice also: but I was so tender of making myself the author and abettor of a civil war, that I could by no means bring myself to resolve upon such desperate enterprizes; and therefore urged it as their own interest, not to fall to cutting one another's throats for a spectacle to the Romans, who were to stand looking on. By this means I appeased the rage of the Galilæans in the conclusion; though not without much difficulty. When John found that all his deceitful machinations against me still miscarried, it was high time now, he thought, to look to himself; so that taking what armed men he had about him, he left Tiberias, and went to Gischala, and from thence he wrote me an apologizing letter, wherein he excused himself of the fact; owning that it was indeed a very base action, but done without his knowledge or approbation. He begged of me that I would believe him, swearing by all that was good and sacred, that what he said was every word of it true to a tittle. But this did not satisfy the Galilæans at all; for they knew him too well for a perjur'd wretch, to believe one syllable he said, ever the more for his swearing it: so that they still importuned me to lead them on to the assault, that they might utterly destroy, at once, both him and Gischala, the place of his nativity. I gave them a thousand thanks for their demonstrations of respect and good-will, and assured them of all the best offices I could do them in requital; but at the same time I advised them by all means to be temperate and composed, and to give me leave to try a little, if the quarrel might not be decided without blood, and to their liking too, before any farther mischief ensued. The Galilæans consented, and we came soon after to Sepphoris. The inhabitants being resolved to continue their allegiance with the Romans, were not without some apprehension upon my advance, and so, for their own security, plotted how they might give me a diversion some other way. Jesus the captain of the Banditti, was at that time upon the borders of Ptolemais, with a body of eight hundred men under his command; and they could not do better, they thought, than presently to dispatch a messenger to him with the promise of a considerable sum of money to make war upon us. The temptation prevailed; and the way he pitched upon, was, to take us at unawares, and unprovided; and so to do the work by surprize. Upon this, he sent word to me by a messenger, that he should be glad if I would give him leave to make me a visit. I readily agreed to it; for I had not the least suspicion of any treacherous design: so that he took a troop of his robbers, and hastened his journey with all expedition. But the design miscarried; for upon his approach within a little of the town, a deserter from him, who came over to me, gave me intelligence of the whole contrivance. Upon this information, I went directly into the market-place, as if I had known nothing of a plot against me, attended with a numerous train of Galilæans in arms, and several Tiberians among them. I gave order then for the guard of the gates, and to the porters of the gates to let in only Jesus himself, with some few of his company, and then shut the gates upon the rest; and if they should offer to break in by violence, to repel them with blows. They punctually observed my orders, and admitted Jesus with a small number of his followers; and then shut the gates upon the rest. So soon as he was in, I bad him surrender his arms, or expect immediate death, which he did, finding himself surrounded with a guard of soldiers. Upon this, those of his men that were shut out, hearing how it was with their leader, betook themselves immediately to flight: So calling Jesus apart, I addressed him after this manner: "I have "you now in my hands, you see: I knew all "your contrivances, your counsels, and your "advisers; and yet after all these provoca-"tions, if you will pass your word now to "be an honest man, and never engage in any "design against me for the future, all that "you have hitherto done I will freely forgive "and forget." He promised he would; and so I dismissed him, giving him the liberty to rally his dispersed men again, whom but just before he had under his conduct. And for the Sepphorites, I only charged them to be quiet and peaceable for the future, at their peril.

THERE came to me, at the same time, two noblemen, and subjects of the king of Trachonitis, with men, horses, money, and arms. The Jews were absolutely against the receiving of them, unless they would consent to be circumcis'd; but I told them that every man was to worship God according to the dictates of his own conscience, not of another man's; and therefore I was utterly against the giving of them any trouble upon that account; besides, that it would be an inhospitable rigour, to make people that came to them for sanctuary in their distress, repent the good opinion they had of their charity. Upon debating the matter, my arguments were convincing to the multitude; and so I gave them an entertainment suitable to the circumstances and occasion.

KING Agrippa, in the mean time, sent Equus Modius with a considerable power, to take by force the castle of Magdala. He was not in a condition to besiege it in form, but all all that he could do, was to poſt guards upon the avenues, and ſo to block up Gamala. Ebutius, the Decadarch,* who had the command of the great plain, underſtanding that I was to come to Simonias, a village upon the confines of Galilee, and a matter of ſixty furlongs off from the place where he was, drew out a hundred horſe that he had then about him, near two hundred foot, and ſome auxiliary troops from Gaba, and marching them by night, came up to the village where I was; whereupon I fac'd him with a very ſtrong body of men, which he obſerving, would fain have drawn me into the open field, relying upon the ſtrength of his horſe; but my ſtrength conſiſting chiefly in foot, I found I ſhould have much the worſt of it, if I ventur'd myſelf upon that odds of ground, and ſo ſtirr'd not a foot from my ſtation. Ebutius did all he could to force me from my poſt; but when he ſaw his deſign impracticable with horſe, he ſounded a retreat, and march'd off to Gaba, having loſt only three men in the action. I follow'd immediately cloſe at his heels, with a body of two thouſand men; and when I came to Beſara, a town upon the confines of Ptolemais, and about twenty furlongs from Gaba, where Ebutius at that time was, I poſſeſs'd myſelf of all the paſſes about it, to ſecure my quarters from any ſudden attack of the enemy, and in the mean time carried off the wheat and other grain, to a prodigious quantity, which had been taken from the adjacent villages belonging to queen Bereniee, and was there laid up in ſtore. This proviſion I order'd to be carried to Galilee upon a great number of camels and aſſes which I had brought thither for that purpoſe. So ſoon as this work was over, I offer'd Ebutius battle; but when we ſaw he durſt not venture upon an engagement, being diſheartened at our reſolution, I bent my courſe toward Neapolitanus, who was then in garriſon with a body of horſe at Scythopolis, and committing ravage in the country about Tiberias. By this means I deliver'd Tiberias from any farther vexation from this enemy; and my whole care, in the next place, was how to provide for the ſettling of Galilee.

He quits his deſign, and marches to Gaba.

John enraged at the reputation and ſucceſſes of Joſephus.

Now John the ſon of Levi, being, as I ſaid before, at Giſchala, was gall'd to the very ſoul to ſee all my enterprizes attended with ſucceſs, and to find how much I was reſpected by my people, and fear'd by my enemies; and in the rancour of this envy, projecting with himſelf how he might turn the hearts of my ſubjects againſt me, he ſolicited the Tiberians and the Sepphorites to join in his deſign, flattering himſelf that he might gain over to his ſide the Gabarenes too; theſe being the moſt conſiderable people in galilee, repreſenting to them, how much eaſier their condition would be under his government than they found it in mine; and reckoning upon it all the while, that juſt ſo much advantage, or reputation as I got, he himſelf loſt. The Sepphorites were, in truth, neither for him, nor for me, but for the Romans. The Tiberians would not be prevailed upon to revolt, but promiſed however to maintain an amicable correſpondence with him; only the Gabarenes eſpouſed his intereſt, and came into his meaſures, at the inſtigation of Simon an eminent citizen, and a particular friend and companion of John's; and they were not altogether barefac'd neither, in the new alliance, for fear of the Galilæans, of whoſe friendſhip and reſpect to me, they had ſeen ſo many inſtances; but they never fail'd, however, of acting their part in any underhand practices againſt me; and it was very narrowly that I eſcaped them upon one particular inſtance. There was a party of Dabarittenians, a parcel of bold young fellows, who upon intelligence that the wife of Ptolemy, the king's intendant, was travelling with a pompous train of horſe and other equipage over the great plain, out of the king's juriſdiction, into a province of the Romans, way-laid, and ſet upon the company, forced the lady to ſhift for herſelf, and made prize of what ſhe had. This happened while I was at Taricheæ, and thither they brought four mules laden with rich cloaths, and other coſtly furniture, a vaſt number of ſilver veſſels, and five hundred pieces of gold. Now theſe being the goods of Ptolemy, a man of my own tribe, (and our law not admitting us ſo much as to rob our enemies,) I told the people who brought them, that they were by all means to be carefully preſerv'd, until they could be ſold to the beſt advantage, and the money thereof to be then laid out upon repairing the walls of Jeruſalem. Theſe ruffians laid it ſo to heart to be diſappointed of a booty, they thought themſelves as good as ſure of, that they currently reported it all about Tiberias, that I had a deſign in my head to betray the province to the Romans. I pretended indeed, they ſaid, to employ the profit of the purchaſe upon rebuilding the walls of Jeruſalem; but upon the whole matter, that my real intention was to reſtore it to the former maſter, and they were not much miſtaken in their opinion; for after the departure of the young men, I call'd two citizens to me of the firſt quality; that is to ſay, Daſſion and Jannæus, the ſon of Levi, both in great favour with the king, and order'd them to make reſtitution of the prize, and upon pain of death not to divulge the ſecret to any one living. The rumour was by this time ſpread all over Galilee, that I had form'd a deſign to deliver the country up to the Romans; and all people were tamper'd with againſt me to take a revenge. The men of Taricheæ among others, gave ſo much credit to the ſtory, that they dealt with ſeveral of my guards, and other ſoldiers, to ſteal away from me when aſleep, and come into the Circus to conſult there with other people concern'd, how to depoſe me, and diſpoſe of the government. When they came thither, they found a huge concourſe of people aſſembled together beforehand, all with one voice calling out for juſtice upon the traitor; but the ringleader of the tumult was Jeſus, the ſon of Saphias, who was at that time the chief magiſtrate of Tiberias, and one of the falſeſt, and moſt ſeditious wretches in nature. He preſented himſelf, with the two tables of Moſes in his hand, and preſſing into the middle of the crowd, addreſs'd them after this manner: "If ſo be, ſays he, that you are grown "careleſs and forgetful of your own good and "ſafety, let it be recommended to you, how-"ever, ſtill to preſerve a veneration for theſe

" holy laws, which that ſame Joſephus, your " governor, has made no ſcruple to betray, " and conſequently to render himſelf ſo odious " to all good men, that no puniſhment can be " too exemplary and ſevere." Theſe words of his were entertain'd with acclamations and applauſes, whereupon taking ſoldiers along with him, he hurried away immediately to my lodging, with a full determination to take away my life; and there lay I, quite tired, and faſt aſleep, without ſo much as the leaſt thought or apprehenſion of a tumult. But at laſt, all on a ſudden, Simon, one of my body guards, and the only man that ſtaid with me, upon the ſight of a crowd of people preſſing in upon me, rous'd me up, and awaken'd me, ſhewed me the danger I was in, and adviſed me in one word, rather, like a ſoldier and man of honour, bravely to ſuffer death from my own hand, than to die ſhamefully and ignominiouſly under the inſults, and at the will and pleaſure of an inſolent enemy. Upon this advice I committed myſelf to providence, chang'd my cloaths, diſguis'd myſelf in black, and hanging my ſword round my neck, out I went by a by-way, where I was ſure to meet none of my adverſaries, ſtrait to the multitude in the Circus; where when I was come, I fell proſtrate on my face, weeping and wailing in ſo moving a manner, that the generality of the people themſelves could not but pity me. When I found the temper of the people in ſome meaſure wrought upon and ſoften'd, I did what I could to divide them in their opinions of me, and of my condition, before the return of the ſoldiers from my lodgings. I told them I did not poſitively deny but that there was ſomewhat indeed of truth in the matter, wherewith I was charged: I deſir'd only that they would firſt rightly inform themſelves of the fact, and what uſe I intended to make of that booty; and then, if they thought me deſerving of death, let them take my life and welcome. The multitude were for hearing me, and bad me proceed, only the ſoldiers being juſt now return'd, were for cutting me to pieces immediately, without any more ado; but upon the clamour of the common people to the contrary, they were prevail'd upon to reſpite the execution, taking for granted, that after the diſcovery, and confeſſion of the treaſon, and that I did really intend to reſerve that money for the king, they ſhould have a better excuſe and pretence for going thorough with the work at laſt. Upon this they gave me the hearing, and ſilence being proclaim'd, that which I ſaid was ſhort, and to this effect.

" MEN and brethren, if it ſhall be your " opinion that I have deſerved to die, I freely ſubmit, provided I may but give you a " true ſtate of the caſe before I ſuffer; I have " ever look'd upon this city as a ſanctuary to " ſtrangers; and indeed the comforts and conveniences it affords to mankind, are ſo great " and general, and the manners and converſation of the inhabitants ſo taking and agreeable, that multitudes of ſtrangers have been " tempted to forſake their native ſoil, and " tranſplant themſelves hither, reſolving to " take the common fortune of the place, good " or bad. And what's my crime now, but " only a deſign to devote a ſum of money, out " of a zeal to the publick good, toward the " repairing of your walls? This is, in ſhort, " the whole ground of your diſpleaſure." The Tarichæans and foreigners, with infinite thanks encouraged me to go on, and fear nothing; but the Galilæans and Tiberians, on the other hand, continued as untractable and outragious, ſo that it came to a direct feud betwixt them; the one ſide aſſailing me with menaces and hard words, and the other engaging for my ſecurity and protection. But upon promiſing the Tiberians to do as much for them too, and ſo likewiſe for other towns, where the ſituation would bear it, they dropped the conteſt, took my word for the performance, and every man withdrew to his own home, one after another; after which unexpected and wonderful deliverance, I return'd with ſome friends, and a matter of twenty ſoldiers, to my own quarters. The ruffians and heads of this ſeditious tumult, apprehending themſelves now in ſome danger to be called to an account for what they had done, gather'd together about ſix hundred of them, and marched directly to the houſe where I lodged, with a reſolution to ſet fire to it. Being inform'd of their coming, and of their purpoſe, I thought it would look cowardly to fly before them; ſo that I rather choſe to ſhut the doors againſt them, and make the beſt of a bad game. Upon this I call'd to them out of my upper chamber window, that if money was what they made a rout about, they had no more to do then but to appoint any body they thought fit to receive it, and never give themſelves any farther trouble or uneaſineſs about the matter. So they ſent over a party to fetch the money; and upon their entring the houſe, finding one particular perſon to be more inſolent and troubleſome than the reſt of his companions, I order'd him to be ſeiz'd, whipt, one hand cut off, and hang'd about his neck, and ſo turn'd out again, to tell his tale to thoſe that employ'd him upon this errand. The whole company was ſo aſtoniſh'd at this treatment, that taking for granted I had a ſtrong guard in my houſe, they all ſcour'd off as hard as they could drive, for fear of being ſerv'd with the ſame ſauce; and by this ſtratagem I brought myſelf off for this bout. After this diſappointment, they had recourſe to another invention (as they would never be without ſome pretext or other to ſtir up the multitude.) They pick'd a quarrel with the two noblemen that apply'd themſelves in their diſtreſs to me for ſanctuary; alledging they were ſpies and poiſoners, in the intereſt of the Romans, and not to be protected in any place where they refus'd to conform to the faſhions of the country. This popular way of hint and inſinuation put the multitude in a ferment again; but upon hearing which way it wrought, I told them plainly that it was not either generous or diſcreet to ſeize and inſult people who caſt themſelves upon us for ſuccour; for we did not know how ſoon their caſe might come to be our own. And then to fancy their coming hither was with an intent to poiſon us, nothing could be more ridiculous; for what ſhould the Romans be at the charge for, of maintaining ſo many legions in arms, and in pay, if they thought they could ſubdue their enemies by ſpells or poiſon? This pacify'd them a little for the preſent; but their choller was up again immediately, inſomuch that away they they went with a band of deſperate ruffians together to Tarichеæ, to beſet the lodgings of theſe ſtrangers, and take away their lives. In the very inſtant of hearing what they were about, I got what men I could together, and ſo poſted away with all poſſible ſpeed to prevent the miſchief; for the ſufferance of ſo barbarous an inhumanity, would have made me odious to mankind. In ſhort, I made a ſhift to get up time enough to ſecure the door, and make good the houſe, till I could run a trench from the backſide into the lake there cloſe by, where I took a boat, and ſo croſs'd over to the borders of the Hippenians, with my two noble gueſts aboard, where I allow'd them the value of their horſes, which in ſuch a hurry they could not bring off with them; and at parting earneſtly beſought them to bear their preſent lot with conſtancy and honour; for I abhorr'd from the bottom of my heart, the very thoughts of doing a thing ſo like treachery, as to reſign up any man to the mercy of an enemy's country, who had caſt himſelf into my arms, in confidence of good faith and protection; but of the two, I rather choſe, how hazardous ſoever, to leave them to providence and the mercy of the Romans one way, than expoſe them to a certain deſtruction by the perfidy of my own people, the other. But after all this, they were preſerv'd at laſt; Agrippa pardon'd them; and this was the end of theſe broils.

The Tiberians entertaining ſome thoughts of going over to king Agrippa, offer'd him their ſervice by letter, provided he would furniſh them with troops ſufficient to protect them. Upon the firſt notice of this overture, I went to look after them, and upon my arrival, they put me in mind of my promiſe for the rebuilding of their walls, being inform'd, it ſeems, that I had been as good as my word at Tarichеæ already. I told them it ſhould be done, and gave orders for the providing of materials and workmen to ſet about it immediately. After three days ſtay there, I took a journey to Tarichеæ about thirty furlongs off; in which time it ſo fell out, that certain Roman troops being upon their march within ſight of Tiberias, the inhabitants taking them to be of Agrippa's party, fell preſently into the higheſt commendations imaginable of the king; and at the ſame time reflected upon me as bitterly and contemptuouſly as was poſſible. Soon after news was brought me by a meſſenger in great haſte, that the people were upon the very point of a revolt, which put me to my wits end what to do; for the ſabbath being now at hand, I had diſmiſs'd the ſoldiers from Tarichеæ, for the quieter celebration of the feſtival; beſides that, I ſeldom kept any life-guards about me in that place, in confidence of the known loyalty and good affection of the people; ſo that having but ſeven ſoldiers, and a few friends with me, I was in a great perplexity what courſe to take. It would have been to no purpoſe to recal my troops now in the evening, which I could have no uſe of at all the next day; ſuch a thing being forbid by our laws, though upon ever ſo neceſſary and emergent an occaſion;* and then for the people of Tarichеæ, ſtrangers and all, in caſe I could have engaged them to my aſſiſtance, as perhaps I might, by the hope and promiſe of pillage and booty, yet their ſtrength would have been too weak and inſufficient to have done my buſineſs; and there was no room for conſideration or delay, for fear of the enemies prepoſſeſſing themſelves of the city in the interim, and ſhutting me out; ſo that I bethought myſelf of this politic invention; I gave ſtrict orders to ſome of my very particular and truſty friends, to keep a watchful eye upon the gates, and not ſuffer any perſon to paſs out of the town; I likewiſe appointed the heads of the chief families in the city, every man to mount his boat, and put out into the lake, with only one mariner to every boat, and ſo to follow me, while I myſelf, with ſeven ſoldiers, and ſome few of my friends in another boat, ſtood away directly for Tiberias, where the people were by this time informed of their miſtake, and that there were no troops of the king's at hand, as they imagin'd. The inhabitants obſerving the lake, however, cover'd over with veſſels, and ſurmiſing nothing leſs than an army aboard, ready to break in upon the city, betook themſelves in this fright, upon ſecond thoughts, to other meaſures; for laying down their arms, they came out with their wives and children, and with all the ſubmiſſion in the world, welcom'd me at my arrival, wiſhing me ſucceſs in my undertakings, and inviting me into their city, not in the leaſt ſuſpecting all this while that the plot was diſcover'd. Upon drawing near the ſhore, I gave order for all my followers to come to an anchor ſo far from land, that the people might not diſcern this formidable fleet at ſuch a diſtance, to be only an amuſement of empty boats. In the mean time I came up myſelf to the very key, and ſeverely rebuked them for the wickedneſs and folly of their breach of faith. However, at laſt, I ſaid, I was content freely to pardon their miſdemeanor, provided they would promiſe to continue for the future more ſtedfaſt in their duty, and for ſecurity ſend me aboard ten of their firſt quality; which they conſenting to, I directly ſhipp'd them off for Tarichеæ, with orders for them to be kept there in cuſtody; and by this trick I got the whole ſenate into my hands, and by degrees a great part of their principal citizens too, one after another. The remainder of the multitude reflecting upon the condition they now were in, laid the blame wholly upon one Clitus, a bold, hot-headed, young fellow among them, as the chief incendiary, and deſir'd me that I would command juſtice to be done upon him. I could not in conſcience puniſh with death a man of my own tribe, and yet lying under an abſolute neceſſity of making an example of him ſome way or other, I commanded one Levi, a ſoldier in my guards, to cut off one of his hands. The fellow was afraid to venture upon it alone, for fear of the people; and I was as much afraid on the other ſide, leaſt the people ſhould take notice of his boggling at the execution; ſo that without any farther ceremony, I called out to Clitus myſelf. "Come, "ſaid I, thou vileſt of miſcreants, I do here "condemn thee to the loſs of both thy hands,

* The Jews were ſo religiouſly, not to ſay ſuperſtitiouſly, ſtrict in the obſervance of their ſabbath, that they ſuffer'd Jeruſalem to be taken twice, rather than fight on that day.

"for thy ingratitude and treachery, and as "much as in thee lies, to be thine own exe- "cutioner, wherefore be quick and diſpatch, "or it ſhall be worſe for thee." The man begg'd hard to be excus'd for one of them, and after ſome ſeeming difficulty having obtain'd it, he immediately with a ſword cut off his left hand with his right; and this put an end to the tumult: From hence I return'd to Taricheæ. The Tiberians coming afterwards to know the ſtratagem I had made uſe of, were in great admiration at my putting a ſtop to ſo furious an uproar, without blood-ſhed. Matters being now quiet, I ſent for the Tiberian priſoners to eat with me, Juſtus and his father Piſtus among the reſt. I was ſaying in the freedom of table diſcourſe, that I look'd upon the Romans as the moſt powerful people under the ſun; but yet in regard of the preſent faction I had to do withal, I reckon'd it good diſcretion to keep my thoughts to myſelf, and I told them I thought it would be well if they did ſo too, till times ſhould be better, adviſing them in the mean while to live quiet under my adminiſtration, for they ſhould never find any governor eaſier to them than myſelf; ſo I reminded Juſtus of the Galilæans cutting off the hands of his brother upon a pretence of forgery, before my coming from Jeruſalem; and likewiſe how the Gamalites upon a diſpute they had with the Babylonians after Philip's departure, put his near kinſman Chares to death; whereas I had not treated his brother in law Jeſus, I told him, at that barbarous rate. This was the ſubſtance of what paſs'd at ſupper, and the next morning early, I commanded Juſtus and his companions to be all diſcharg'd.

IT was a little before this, that Philip the ſon of Jacimus left Gamala upon this account. News being brought him of the revolt of Varus from Agrippa, and that Modius Equus, his very good friend, was put in his place, he inform'd Modius by letter, how it was with him, and of the preſent ſtate of his affairs, with a packet alſo for the king and queen, who were then at Berytus. Modius was overjoyed to find him in health, and in ſo good a condition, and ſent away the other packet according to the addreſs. So ſoon as the king underſtood by theſe letters, that the ſtory of Philip's putting himſelf at the head of the Jews againſt the Romans, was a falſe report, he ſent for him to court, by a party of horſe; and taking him into his arms upon his arrival with great honour and kindneſs, told the commanders about him, that this was the perſon they heard was gone off from the Romans. Soon after this he ſent him with ſome troops of horſe to the fort of Gamala, with orders to bring away all his family, reſettle the Babylonians in Batanæa, and to take all poſſible care to keep the people quiet. Philip had no ſooner receiv'd his inſtructions, but away he went immediately upon his commiſſion. About this time upſtarted a kind of a quack doctor, whoſe name was Joſeph, with a crew of deſperate young rogues at his heels, and not without ſome conſiderable citizens in the medley, for the better countenancing of the tumult. The buſineſs of this mountebank, was to debauch the people from their allegiance to the king, by encouraging them to take up arms, and with ſword in hand to aſſert their antient rights and liberties. The faction grew quickly to ſuch a head, that they put to death all who durſt oppoſe them, or ſpeak one word in contradiction to their proceedings; amongſt the reſt, they killed Chares, and his kinſman Jeſus, with the ſiſter of Juſtus of Tiberias, of whom we have ſpoken already. They wrote to me after this, to ſend them troops for a garriſon, and workmen to encompaſs the town with a wall, for its better ſecurity; both which I agreed to.

AT the ſame time the country of the Gaulanites revolted from Agrippa, as far as the village Solyma. I wall'd in Sogannis and Seleucia, two places of very great ſtrength by ſituation; and I fortified ſeveral towns in the Upper Galilee, as Jamnia, Amerytha, and Charabe, all ſituate among the rocky mountains. In Galilee I very ſtrongly fortified the towns alſo of Taricheæ, Tiberias, and Sepphoris, and the villages of the cave of Arbela, Berſobe, Selame, Jotapata, Capharath, Comoſogana, Næpapha, and the mount Itabyr. In theſe places I had my magazines of corn and arms.

THIS proſperous courſe of my affairs was ſo diſpleaſing to John, the ſon of Levi, that it increaſed his hatred towards me every day more and more; ſo that he fully determin'd with himſelf to work my deſtruction, let the conſequence be ever ſo fatal. To which end, after the walling in of Giſchala, he diſpatch'd his brother Simon with a hundred men, to Simon the ſon of Gamaliel at Jeruſalem, to try if he could get the council of the city to remove me from my government of Galilee, and to ſubſtitute John in my place. Now this Simon was a citizen of the firſt rank; by ſect, a Phariſee, and conſequently a more than ordinary ſtrict obſerver of the laws of his country; a perſon of extraordinary prudence, than whom no man was better qualified for the rectifying and compoſing any dangerous diſorders in the ſtate, by the wiſdom of his councils; and beſides, that he had been known for a long time to be John's particular friend, and at that juncture, my inveterate enemy. He was, in ſhort, ſo far wrought upon by ſolicitation and intreaty, that he ſuggeſted it to Ananus the high-prieſt, and Jeſus the ſon of Gamala, with others of the party, to cut me off betimes, whilſt they had it in their power, and to prevent me from arriving at the higheſt pitch of glory, to which I was aſpiring; beſides, it would be highly conducive to their intereſt, he ſaid, to have me turn'd out of the command of Galilee, and to ſee it done without delay too, before the deſign could take air; for fear of my preventing the execution of it, by falling in upon them with a powerful army. Ananus the high-prieſt told him on the other hand, that I had ſo many of the chief prieſts and heads of the people that could bear witneſs to the conduct and juſtice of my adminiſtration, that it would be a difficult matter to obtain a vote againſt me; and to paſs a definitive ſentence upon any man, without being able to aſſign his crime, was an unjuſt and wicked action. So Simon deſir'd them to take no notice at all of what had paſs'd, but leave it to him to lay a project for the diſplacing of me ſome other way. Upon this he applied himſelf to the brother of John, and propoſed the the diſtribution of money and preſents among the friends of Ananus, as the moſt likely courſe he could take for the obtaining his point. By this method, in ſhort, Simon compaſſed his end; for Ananus and his companions, upon the receiving of theſe bribes, laid their heads together immediately how they might depoſe me from my government, and with ſo much ſecrecy, as not to make any man beſide privy to the counſel. The way they pitched upon was to employ four agents upon the commiſſion; two of them noble, and the other two plebeians; but all four equally qualify'd for their learning, and skill in the laws, ſo there was Jonathan and Ananias, both phariſees, for two of them; Joazar, a man of a ſacerdotal family, and a pharaſee alſo, for a third; and then the fourth was Simon, of the pontifical line too, and the youngeſt of the four. Theſe men had their inſtructions given them to argue the matter at the next meeting of the Galilæans, with the members of the aſſembly, and to expoſtulate why they ſhould honour me with their choice before another. If they ſhould alledge, becauſe I am a native of Jeruſalem; it might be anſwered, ſo were they; and if for my knowledge of the laws, the ſame thing might be ſaid for them too; or if they ſhould ſay they did it out of a reſpect to the prieſthood, they might make anſwer that two of their number had the very ſame pretence. With this leſſon, and forty thouſand pieces of ſilver, taken out of the publick treaſury, Jonathan and his companions went away about their buſineſs.

The manner of the contrivance and the agents employed.

A plot againſt Joſephus.

About this time one Jeſus a Galilæan, came to Jeruſalem, with a band of ſix hundred ſoldiers; with him theſe commiſſioners agreed for three months pay advance, to follow Jonathan and his colleagues, and to act in obedience to them, and their orders. To theſe ſoldiers they joined three hundred citizens, whom they furniſhed with money ſufficient to defray the expence of their own journey, and that of all the reſt likewiſe. Thus equipped and provided for a march, the deputies ſet out, and the brother of John, with his company of an hundred men along with them. Their order was this; in caſe I ſhould voluntarily lay down my arms, to take me priſoner, and ſend me alive to Jeruſalem; but if I made any oppoſition, they were to kill me out of hand; and their commiſſion ſhould be a ſufficient warrant for ſo doing. From the ſame hands there were letters diſpatched away to John alſo to be in readineſs to make war upon me. And the Sephorites, the Gabarenes, and the Tiberians, were likewiſe engaged to fall in with the party. Now Jeſus the ſon of Gamala, one who wiſhed me well, and was privy to the whole contrivance, gave my father intelligence, from time to time, of every thing that paſſed; and from him I received a particular account of of the whole matter. It very ſenſibly affected me to conſider the ingratitude and malicious practices of a faction in the city againſt me; and my affliction was as great to find the trouble my father was in for my ſake, and with what earneſtneſs he preſſed me to come over to him, upon a ſuggeſtion that it was only to ſee me once more before he died. In this unhappy ſituation of my affairs, I communicated my intentions to my friends, and told them, that I was determined within the compaſs of three days, to lay down my command, and go back again into my own country. They all fell into tears and lamentations upon the hearing of it; begging and intreating of me, not to leave them upon any terms to the certainty of periſhing when I was gone. But my life being at ſtake on the one hand, againſt their prayers aud importunities on the other, I ſtill perſiſted in my purpoſe. The Galilæans were poſſeſſed with ſuch a terrible apprehenſion of being expoſed to the inſolence and oppreſſion of thieves and out-laws after my departure, that they immediately ſent notice up and down, through the whole province, that I was upon the point of leaving them. This news brought a great multitude of people together, with their wives and children, into the great plain of Aſoch, where I then was, to try if they could prevail with me to ſtay; not ſo much out of an affection to me, perhaps, as for fear of the danger they were in themſelves; for they reckoned all to be ſafe ſo long as I was among them.

Joſephus would have quitted Galilee, but the people would not part with him.

Joſephus' father ſends him intelligence of it.

It was a wonderful dream I had that very night: as I was in my bed, my head and my heart overwhelm'd with ſorrow, being extremely troubled upon the account of my father's letters, I ſaw, methought, the viſion of a man at my bed ſide, and a voice ſpeaking to me after this manner: "Ceaſe to diſquiet thy heart, "good man, and fear nothing; for all theſe ca"lamities will blow over, and only lead to "thy greater advantage and ſatisfaction; not "only for the preſent, but likewiſe for the "time to come; wherefore trouble not your"ſelf, but remember that you are to have a war "with the Romans." Upon waking out of this dream, I got up with an intent to go out into the plain, and I had no ſooner ſhew'd myſelf, but a world of the Galilæans, men, women, and children, caſt themſelves upon their faces at the very ſight of me, and with tears and ſupplications beſought me not to leave them in this extremity, expoſed to the inſults of their enemies. When they found prayers and importunities would do no good, they preſſed me with adjurations not to forſake them, caſting many a contumelious reproach upon the people of Jeruſalem, who would never let them be quiet. This to me was ſo ſad a hearing, and ſo rueful a ſpectacle, that it made my bowels yearn with compaſſion to conſider the diſtreſs of ſo many thouſands of miſerable creatures, and brought me over, in the end, to a reſolution of running any hazard whatſoever for the ſervice of ſo vaſt a multitude of forlorn harmleſs people: ſo that in the concluſion I was over-perſwaded to ſtay. Upon this, I bad them draw five thouſand men out of their whole number, and furniſh them with arms and victuals for a march, the reſt inſtantly to depart, every man to his own home. So ſoon as this five thouſand was ready, I joined them with three thouſand more that I had of my own, and eighty horſe; and ſo advanced with them to Chabolo, a village upon the borders of Ptolemais, where I took up my ſtation, as if my deſign had been to fall upon Placidus, whom Ceſtius Gallus had ſent into thoſe parts with a troop of horſe and two companies of foot, to ſet fire to the villages of the Galilæans thereabouts. Placidus intrenched himſelf not far from the walls of Ptolemais, while I lay at the ſame time a matter of ſixty furlongs toward Chabolo. We drew out our army ſeveral times on both ſides, as if we were for joining battle immediately; but there paſſed only ſome few skirmiſhes; for the more I preſſed the bringing of it to an engagement, the more the other declined it; not daring to ſhew his head out of the protection of the town.

WHILE matters were in this poſture, Jonathan with his companions came into thoſe parts; the ſame perſons, who as I told you before, were ſent from Jeruſalem by the faction of Simon, and Ananus the high-prieſt; and the plot was now how to compaſs their ends by treachery, which they durſt not attempt by downright force. To this purpoſe they laid their heads together, and ſent me this following letter.

Jonathan and his Deputy-Colleagues from the council at Jeruſalem to Joſephus, greeting:

Jonathan's letter to Joſephus.

"WHEREAS our principals at Jeruſalem "are given to underſtand that John of "Giſchala hath been engaged in ſeveral per-"fidious practices againſt your perſon, they "have ſent us in their name to give him a ſe-
"vere reprimand for ſo doing, and to require
"him for the future to pay all due reſpect
"and obedience to your commands. And to "the end that we may agree upon ſome bet"ter proviſion for the regulation of things
"hereafter, we make it our requeſt that you "will come hither to us with all ſpeed: the "village is but ſmall; and therefore we de-"ſire you will not bring any great train of "guards along with you, for fear of being
"ſcanted for room."

THIS letter was contrived on purpoſe to plunge me, as they thought, into a dangerous and inextricable difficulty: for if I truſted myſelf without a ſtrong guard, they could take me up, and uſe me as they pleaſed: and on the other hand, if I approached them with the formality of military troops, I might be liable to be proſecuted as a rebel. This letter was brought me by a horſeman; a bold young fellow, who had been formerly in the king's ſervice. It was now about the ſecond hour of the night, when being at ſupper with ſome of my friends, and ſeveral Galilæans of the firſt quality, word was brought me at the table by a ſervant, of a certain Jew on horſeback, who deſired to ſpeak with me: I ordered him to be called in; and accordingly he came, and without ſhewing any manner of deference or reſpect to the company, delivered me the letter, which he brought, he ſaid, from the Jeruſalem deputies, requiring me to return a ſpeedy anſwer; for that they had ſtrictly enjoined him to make all imaginable haſte back. The company were all amazed at the confidence of the ſoldier; but however, I invited him to ſit down, and take part of a ſupper with us, which he refuſed; and ſo keeping the letter in my hand, without opening it, I took occaſion to paſs away the time with my company in diſcourſes upon indifferent ſubjects, and going now and then out of the door, as in civility to wait on ſome of my gueſts that were going to bed, I took the opportunity, when I was out of ſight, to open the letter, and glance it over with my eye, ſo as to perceive the contents of it; and then inſtantly folding it up again, I held it ſtill in my hand, as before; without diſcovering that I had read it. The company was now all gone but four intimate friends, and a ſervant to fill the wine. I gave the ſoldier twenty drachmas* to bear his expences, and regale himſelf with, on his way back; for which he was ſo very wonderfully thankful that I found the love of money was his weak ſide, and ſo I reſolved to attack him on that quarter. "Come, ſaid I, if you will "drink with us, and do as we do, you ſhall "have a drachma for every cup you drink." The fellow readily accepted the terms, of the more wine the more money, and carouſed ſo immoderately, that he became too drunk to keep the ſecret any longer; ſo he blabbed the whole myſtery of the villainy, without any pumping at all; telling me of his own accord, that there was a ſnare laid for me, and a ſentence of death pronounced againſt me: Upon which diſcovery, I gave him the following anſwer to his letter.

The meſſenger diſcovers the treachery.

Joſephus to Jonathan and his Fellow-Deputies, Greeting:

Joſephus's anſwer to Jonathan.

"I AM very glad to hear that you are in "health, and that you are come into Ga"lilee; and the rather becauſe I am prepar"ing myſelf for a journey into my own coun"try, which I have an earneſt deſire to ſee,
"and have been thinking of a long time; and
"this will be a fair opportunity for my de"livering up the care of the publick admini"ſtration into your hands. I ſhould be very "willing to come, not only as far as Xallo
"to wait upon you, but a great deal farther,
"even without any other motive to invite me
"to it; but hope you'll be ſo good as to ex-
"cuſe me at preſent, ſince I am not now at "liberty for ſuch a journey, being forced to "ſtay at Chabolo to obſerve the motions of "Placidus, and keep him from breaking into "Galilee; and therefore I think it more ad"viſeable, upon the receipt of this letter, for "you to come hither; and ſo I bid you fare-
"wel.

THIS letter I delivered to the ſoldier, and appointed thirty perſons of the beſt quality among the Galilæans to go along with him, giving them orders only to do their reverence to the deputies, without entering into any other diſcourſe. With them I ſent a like number of my own ſoldiers that I could beſt confide in, whom I ſet as ſpies upon each of other, to watch them narrowly if they entertained any private converſation with Jonathan. After the departure of theſe people, the deputies finding that their plot did not take, wrote a ſecond letter to me to the following effect.

The meſſenger diſmiſſed, and thirty perſons of quality along with him. Joſephus makes one of them a ſpy upon the other.

* The Drachma [Attic.] was very near the ſame as the Roman Denier, which was about eight-pence half-penny farthing in our money, ſeven of them being made out of an ounce Troy weight in the time of Tiberias, as Celſus plainly informs us, B. v. c. 17. "Sciri volo, in uncia pondus denariorum ſeptem eſſe, i. e. I aſſure you, that there "is the weight of ſeven deniers in one ounce." And we read of no higher value either before or after that time, which alſo continued the legal weight in the time of Veſpaſian. See Plin. 33. 9 After this they weighed leſs, eight being made out of the ounce, which reduced them to ſeven-pence half-penny of our money; for whereas their libra before contained but eighty four, it now contained ninety-ſix of them. In the lower empire they ſcarce weighed half ſo much in pure ſilver

Jonathan and his Colleagues to Joſephus, greeting.

A peremptory ſummons to Joſephus to appear at Gabara.

" THIS is to require you to appear with" in three days from the date hereof, be" fore us at Gabara, without any guard of ſol-" diers to attend you, there to make good the " charge, which you have exhibited againſt
" John of Giſchala.

AFTER they had wrote this letter, and in an honourable and reſpectful manner diſmiſſed the Galilæans whom I had ſent, they went to Japha, one of the largeſt, ſtrongeſt, and moſt populous villages of Galilee. They were no ſooner entered the place, but the people were all up with open mouth, men, women, and children, crying out to them to be gone again, and to let them alone, while they were well; for Joſeph, they ſaid, was the beſt governor they could have, and no other would they own. This was the voice of the whole multitude, one and all. So that the deputies finding that was not a place for their turn, went away to Sepphoris, the faireſt city of all Galilee, and a people well affected to the Romans. Many of the citizens of the town went indeed to receive them; but without one word ſpeaking of me, either good or bad; and from thence they went to Aſoch, where they met with full as bad entertainment as they had before at Japha. Theſe contempts made them ſo outragious, that they ordered the ſoldiers to quiet them with clubs and cudgels: from thence they went forward to Gabara, where they were joined by John with a body of three thouſand men to ſecond them. Now being forwarned by letter, that they intended to practiſe open hoſtilities againſt me, I drew out three thouſand ſoldiers, and took them along with me to Jotapata, about forty furlongs from the place, to be within diſtance of communicating upon any occaſion with the reſt, whom I left behind me in the camp, under the command of a truſty friend. And from thence I wrote the deputies the following letter.

The people one and all, for Joſephus, and no other governor.

Joſephus to the deputies.

" IF you find it ſo abſolutely neceſſary for " me to come to you, there are four hun" dred cities and villages in Galilee, name a" ny one of the four hundred, and I will meet
" you there, ſaving only in Gabara and Giſ-
" chala; the one of them is the place of John's " nativity; and the other of his alliance.

The deputies plot the deſtruction of Joſephus.

THE deputies gave over writing, upon the receipt of this letter, and calling a cabal of their friends, entered into a conſultation, John himſelf being one of the council, how to do my buſineſs ſome other way. John was for ſending circulatory letters to all the towns and villages of Galilee, upon a preſumption of finding out of all of them, ſome one or more diſaffected to my intereſt, and that would be forward enough to do me any ill office, and eaſily brought over, when appealed to, to give judgment againſt me as a publick enemy: now there would need no more toward the gaining of the citizens of Jeruſalem over to the opinion of my being an enemy to the Galilæans, than to ſend them theſe atteſtations well certified, which would undoubtedly have ruined my credit with that people. The reſolution being taken, Sachæus, a deſerter, about the third hour* of the night, brought me a particular account of the whole tranſaction.

Sachæus informs Joſeph. of their plot.

I FOUND I had now no time to ſpare; ſo that I called for Jacob immediately (a brave man, and my true friend,) and ſent him away with two hundred men upon the ſcout, betwixt the roads of Gabra and Galilee, with inſtructions to take up all the paſſengers he could light of, and ſend them to me in cuſtody; eſpecially ſuch as had any letters about them: and at the ſame time I diſpatched Jeremy, (my very particular friend too,) with ſix hundred ſoldiers into the confines of Galilee leading to Jeruſalem to watch the paſſes: to him likewiſe I gave orders to ſeize all couriers, and to ſecure their perſons in chains upon the ſpot, and to bring me their papers. I ſent abroad my mandates alſo through the whole province of Galilee, requiring all perſons to attend me at Gabra the next morning, with their arms and three days proviſions. The ſoldiers I had about me I divided into four bodies, the moſt truſty of which, for ſecurity, I reſerved near my perſon, with a ſtrict order to the officers not ſo much as to admit a ſtrange face into their company. About eleven next day, coming to Gabara, I found the whole plain before the town, covered with armed troops out of Galilee, to my aſſiſtance; beſides a confuſed multitude of country people. Juſt as I was going to addreſs them, my mouth was ſtopped with ſuch acclamations of joy, that there was nothing to be heard but ſhouts, at the ſight of their benefactor and preſerver, as they were pleaſed to call me: And this was the unanimous voice of the whole company. I gave them my acknowledgments for this inſtance of their good-will and reſpect, but deſired them at the ſame time to make an innocent and temperate uſe of their power, without wronging any creature, either in their perſons, or their eſtates. They had proviſion enough, I told them, for the preſent occaſion; and there was nothing my heart was ſo much ſet upon, as to put an end to the tumult without blood.

Joſeph. ſummons the people to attend him at Gabra with their arms.

THE people I had employ'd to way-lay the roads, had the good fortune, the very firſt day they went out, to intercept Jonathan's meſſengers in their way toward Jeruſalem; together with their packets. They ſecured the men, according to my order, and brought me the letters; which I found upon the peruſal to be ſtuffed with opprobrious and ſcurrilous invectives againſt myſelf. I took no notice at all of the matter, but kept on march directly againſt them, as if nothing had been done. So ſoon as ever they underſtood I was marching that way, they retired every man of them, John and all, into the houſe of Jeſus; a large and a ſtrong place and built much after the manner of a citadel. They kept a party of ſoldiers privately in the houſe, all the gates ſhut but one, and the guards ordered, that upon my coming thither, (as they expected a viſit from me,) to take me in alone, and not to ſuffer any one man of my train to follow me: by which means they made no doubt of getting me abſolutely into their power with eaſe; but their expectations were fruſtrated; for having ſome jealouſy and miſtruſt of their deſigns, I went immediately upon my arrival, to a lodging over-againſt the houſe, as if to refreſh myſelf, pretending to be weary and ſleepy with the fatigues of the march. The deputies taking it for granted that I was faſt aſleep, went out into the plain, to try if they could alienate the affections of the multitude, and poſſeſs them with a hatred and abhorrence both of me and my adminiſtration. But their endeavours met with ſucceſs quite different to what they expected; for the Galilæans had no ſooner fixed their eyes upon them, but they fell to extolling me and my conduct up to the skies, and at the ſame time to reviling them with clamours and reproaches for diſturbing their publick peace and tranquillity, without any offence given or wrong done on their ſide, to provoke ſuch uſage; bidding them to be gone about their buſineſs, and meddle with their own affairs; for as for their governor, a very good one, they ſaid, they had already, and him and him only were they reſolved to accept. Being informed how matters went, I thought this a proper juncture to go down among them to hear what Jonathan and his companions had to ſay. The multitude had no ſooner ſet eye on me, but they came thronging about me with all the demonſtrations of Joy, ſatisfaction, and acknowledgments in their looks, words, and actions imaginable; enlarging upon the obligations I had laid upon them during my government, to ſuch a degree, that Jonathan and his confederates could not think themſelves ſafe under ſo violent a prejudice. They would gladly have gone off, I perceived; but upon my entreaty they ſtay'd, (that is to ſay, in truth, there was no getting off;) ſo there they ſtood in an amazement, without ſenſe or reaſon, and almoſt frighted out of their wits. Upon this I quieted the noiſe, ſet guards of the moſt truſty men I had upon all the avenues, for fear of any incurſion or ſurprize from John and his party; and ſo with my people about me in arms, I addreſſed myſelf to the deputies. I reminded them in the firſt place of a letter they had ſent me, pretending a commiſſion from Jeruſalem to hear and determine upon certain matters in controverſy betwixt John and myſelf, producing the letter at the ſame time in proof of my aſſertion. Now put the caſe, ſaid I to Jonathan, that you and your companions had any authority to call me to an account for the management of my government, upon John's information or complaint, would not you yourſelves pronounce me innocent, upon the clear teſtimony of two or three witneſſes of unqueſtionable probity, in my juſtification? but what will you ſay now if I appeal, not only to two or three competent vouchers, but to every ſoul that is here preſent, whether my behaviour in the exerciſe of my function has not been ſuch as became a perſon of honour and juſtice? "As "for you, good people of Galilee, ſpeak the "truth and the whole truth, I adjure you, as "if you were ſworn evidences in the cauſe, "and theſe men the judges. Pray tell them and "ſpare not, the worſt you know of me." The words were ſcarce out of my mouth; but the whole multitude with one voice and conſent made a frank and open declaration of the comforts and benefits they had enjoyed under my care and protection, as their benefactor and defender; and that they were ſo well ſatisfied with me for what was paſt, that they wiſhed no more than the continuance of the ſame goodneſs for the time to come: affirming alſo with oaths, that I had been as tender of either offering any violence to, or ſuffering any to be committed upon the perſons of their wives and daughters, as I had been of invading the common freedom and property of the ſubject. After this, I pulled out and read, in the hearing of a great many Galilæans, the two intercepted letters of Jonathan, that were brought me by my ſcouts. They were ſtuffed with ſcandalous and impudent calumnies, traducing me to the higheſt degree, and giving me the character of a tyrant rather than a governor, with a great deal of ſhameleſs ribaldry over and above. I was not willing to let my enemies know that I had their meſſengers in cuſtody, for fear it ſhould diſcourage them from ſending for the time to come; ſo I pretended they were brought to me voluntarily by the meſſengers themſelves. The inſolence and villainy of theſe two letters put the people into ſuch a violent outrage againſt Jonathan and his companions, that they were going to tear them to pieces; and had undoubtedly done execution upon them, if I had not in the very height of their rage prevented it; ſo I gave the deputies their pardon, and diſmiſſed them, upon condition they would repent and mend, and ſpeak no otherwiſe of me and my government when they came home, than as they found it, which they promiſed to do. Hereupon I gave them their diſcharge, and diſmiſſed them; but taking it for granted before-hand, that they would never do as they ſaid. The people were ſtill ſo implacably bent upon the ruin of theſe men, that all the skill and intereſt I had was little enough to prevent it. How did they beg of me, only to be turned looſe upon them! but when a ſedition is once begun, no body knows where it will ſtop, nor what miſchief it may do to the commonwealth; ſo that I did what I could to divert them: but in the rage of this impatience, they took up a joint reſolution, one and all, to fall upon Jonathan in his quarters.

WHEN I ſaw there was no reſtraining them I took horſe immediately, and bad them follow me to Sogane, a village of Arabia, at about forty furlongs diſtance; and by this artifice I took care to avoid the ſcandal and imputation of having made myſelf the author of a civil war. When we were advanced within a little of the place, I commanded my troops to make an halt; and after a few words of neceſſary precaution to them, not to be intemperate and vindictive, I made choice of an hundred of the beſt men for quality and underſtanding that I could pick out of the whole number, and bad them prepare themſelves for a journey to Jeruſalem, with a complaint againſt the ſeditious heads and ring-leaders of theſe broils. I gave them moreover in charge, that if they found the people well inclined and eaſy to me, they ſhould endeavour to procure me a new commiſſion for my continuance in the command of Galilee, and to get John recalled. With theſe orders I diſpatched them away on the third day after this meeting, allowing them five hundred ſoldiers for their convoy. I wrote alſo to my friends at Samaria to uſe their endeavours to procure my commiſſioners a ſafe and free paſſage through their country; for the city was at that time under the power of the Romans; and this was the ſhorteſt cut to make a three days journey of it to Jeruſalem. I conducted them myſelf to the frontiers of Galilee, and ſet ſuch diligent watches upon the way, that there was ſcarce any body knew of of this expedition: after which I made a ſhort ſtay at Japha.

Jonathan ſends John to Giſchala, and goes himſelf to Tiberias.

JONATHAN and his companions finding themſelves wholly diſappointed, ſent back John to Giſchala, and they themſelves went in the mean time to Tiberias, in hopes of making themſelves maſters of that place; for Jeſus being head magiſtrate there, had undertaken by letters to bring the people over to eſpouſe their intereſt. In confidence of having this made good to them, they undertook the journey; but Silas, my lieutenant there, ſent me a full account of all their proceedings by a meſſenger, and preſs'd me by all means to return with what ſpeed I could. I follow'd his counſel, and by ſo doing, fell into a ſtrait that had like to have coſt me my life.

Jonathan makes large profeſſions to Joſephus, but with a deſign to betray him.

JONATHAN and his companions having made a dangerous faction againſt me in Tiberias, were not a little ſtartled upon my coming thither, but gave me, however, the compliment of a viſit immediately, wiſhing me joy over and over of the reputation I had gotten in the world by the juſt conduct of my adminiſtration in Galilee; and not without aſſuming to themſelves ſome ſhare in the honour of it, both as their fellow-citizen, and in ſome ſort their diſciple; profeſſing all along that they entertained a much greater kindneſs for me than for John, adviſing me without any more ado, to go back again, and depend upon them for the delivering up of John into my hands very ſpeedily; and to convince me of the reality of their intentions, they bound themſelves with the moſt ſolemn and ſacred oaths and proteſtations for the performance of all this; ſo that I muſt have been the greateſt villain in the world not to have believed them. After which, they deſir'd me by all means to withdraw to ſome other place, ſuggeſting for the better countenance of the matter, that the morrow being the ſabbath, they ſhould be very ſorry to occaſion any diſturbance among the people on that day. Upon this pretence I went my way to Taricheæ, not ſuſpecting any thing; but yet for better ſecurity ſake, I planted my ſpies and informers up and down in the town, to obſerve and hearken out what was ſaid and done concerning me; and I had too ſo diſpos'd my agents all along the road from Taricheæ to Tiberias, as to be able to hand from one to another, with the greateſt expedition, the intelligence ſent me. On the day following, the people met together in the oratory, a place of publick worſhip, and large enough to hold a vaſt number of perſons; and thither came Jonathan among the reſt. "It "was a thouſand pities, he ſaid, that this ci- "ty had not better governors;" and there he ſtopp'd; for he durſt not encourage them to a downright rebellion at once; but Jeſus, the chief magiſtrate, urg'd the point a little cloſer home, and told them without farther ceremony, that it was infinitely better for them to put themſelves under the obedience of four rulers than one, eſpecially if they were men of honourable extraction and known prudence, as thoſe perſons were, pointing to Jonathan and his companions that ſtood by. Juſtus concurr'd in the ſame opinion too with Jeſus, and brought over a great many more to be of the ſame mind; but the common people ſhew'd a great diſlike and diſapprobation of their notions; ſo that without all doubt, their diſſent would have come to a deſperate tumult, if the hour of the day had not parted them; for it was now twelve at noon, which on ſabbath days is the hour for all our people to go to dinner; ſo the deputies adjourn'd the debate till the day following, without coming to any preſent iſſue. Upon the firſt notice of this proceeding, which was as early as hands could bring it, I immediately reſolv'd to ſet out the next morning by break of day for Tiberias. As ſoon as I came there, I found all the people aſſembled together in the foreſaid oratory, without ſo much as underſtanding the true reaſon or intent of their meeting. The deputies did ſo little expect to ſee me there at that time, that the ſurprize put them to a ſtand what to do next, till at laſt it came into their heads to raiſe a ſham ſtory of a body of Roman horſe, that were ſeen near Homonæa, about thirty furlongs from the city. This rumour was ſo induſtriouſly improv'd, that Jonathan and his adherents, who were the inventors of it themſelves, preſently fell to bawling and clamouring what an intolerable ſcandal it was to have their country burnt and deſtroyed under their noſes, and they to ſtand ſtill all the while looking on. Now the true intent of this ſtratagem was to draw me out of the town to engage the enemy, and in the mean time get poſſeſſion of it themſelves, by turning the hearts of the citizens againſt me. I perceived well enough what it was they aim'd at, and yet for fear of appearing leſs ſolicitous for the good of the Tiberians than I ought to be, in caſe I ſhould have declin'd the undertaking, I found myſelf under ſome kind of neceſſity to comply with the very deſign of my enemies; ſo that I poſted away immediately to look after theſe troops according to the intelligence. But diſcovering upon the place, that there was no ſuch body to be ſeen or heard of, I made all the haſte back again that was poſſible; and there did I find the ſenate and the people aſſembled in council, and the deputies virulently inveighing againſt me, as a man that minded my pleaſure more than buſineſs, and one who took no care at all for the defence of the publick. Upon this occaſion they produced four letters, writ to them as they pretended, from four of the moſt remote parts of Galilee, ſetting forth the danger they were in, and the neceſſity of a preſent and ſpeedy ſuccour; for that the Romans with a ſtrong body of horſe and foot, had form'd a deſign to enter and lay waſte their country in three days time at the fartheſt. The credulous Tiberians ſwallow'd the whole ſtory for current, and broke out unanimouſly into exclamations, that it was high time now to look about them, and to ſend a ſeaſonable relief to their countrymen. Upon this outcry (underſtanding the myſtery of the cheat) I told them that I was ready to make one which way ſoever the neceſſity of the war ſhould call me; but in regard, ſaid I, that your advice comes from four ſeveral places, and makes mention of four ſeveral incurſions, I am of opinion your army ſhould be divided into ſo many bodies; and the four deputies, to command every man his party; for it is the duty of good patriots and valiant men, to ſerve their country with their ſwords, and in their perſons, as well as with their conduct and counſel; and it is not for me to undertake upon

A falſe report given out, of a body of Roman horſe advancing toward the city.

The alarm of this rumour improv'd into an uproar.

Joſephus marches out to look after them, and no ſuch troops to be heard of.

Joſephus comes back immediately, and finds the deputies in an invective againſt himſelf.

Four counterfeit letters of news produced from four ſeveral places, and of as many incurſions.

Joſephus offers his ſervice, and propoſes a diviſion of the army into four bodies, and every deputy to command one.

on this diſtribution, the command of any more than one part of the army. The people were all abundantly ſatisfied with the reaſon of what I ſaid, and order'd the matter ſo, that the deputies were obliged to take upon them the office of command in the expedition, but were enraged at the ſame time beyond meaſure to find all their underhand perfidious practices by me defeated and countermin'd. One of theſe four deputies, whoſe name was Ananias, a man of a perfidious and miſchievous temper, propounded the proclaiming of a publick faſt for the next day, with a command, that we ſhould all meet at the ſame hour, and at the ſame place, without arms, to humble ourſelves before the Almighty, to acknowledge our own weakneſs, and implore his aſſiſtance, without whoſe aid the ſtrength of man, and the utmoſt efforts of human force were impotent and ineffectual. Now the real deſign and main drift of this propoſal, was under this pretext of piety, to diſarm me and my ſoldiers; and I was fain to comply again with this propoſal, that I might not ſeem to diſregard or ſlight ſo religious a motion.

A plot to be executed next morning.

IMMEDIATELY upon the breaking up of the aſſembly, Jonathan and his colleagues wrote in all haſte to John, to be ſure to be early with them next morning, with all the force he could make; for if they could but get me into their hands once, the buſineſs was done. The letter came ſafe, and John made no difficulty at all of complying with the orders. On the day following, I call'd out two of the truſtieſt and ſtouteſt fellows I had in the guards; accoutred myſelf with a cortlet and a good ſword, as ſecretly as I could, and bad the ſoldiers take each of them a ſhort ſword, privately too, and follow me. This I did that we might be in a condition to defend ourſelves, in caſe of an aſſault; and ſo to the oratory we went together, where I myſelf and my friends were admitted; but Jeſus having a guard at the door, would not ſuffer ſo much as any one of the reſt of my people to enter with me. Juſt as we were upon the point of beginning our devotions, after our manner of worſhip, Jeſus ſtood up, and ask'd me what was become of the rich furniture, and the maſs of ſilver, that was taken away upon the firing of the royal palace? where it was to be found? and who had it in keeping? Now theſe were only words to prolong time, till John came up with his army: I anſwer'd him, that it was all depoſited in the hands of Capella, and ten of the principal citizens of Tiberias; ſo that it was but asking them whether I ſpoke truth or not; whereupon Capella and the reſt acknowledged the having of it all in their cuſtody. They put it to me then, what I had done with the twenty pieces of gold that I receiv'd for the like value in ſilver bullion, that I diſpos'd of. I told them that I had given them to my envoys, whom I had ſent to Jeruſalem, to defray the expence of their journey. Jonathan and his colleagues replied, that it was very ill done, to pay my particular agents out of the publick treaſure. The common people perceiving them wholly actuated by malice and a ſpirit of contradiction, were tranſported to ſuch a degree of impatience and fury, that it fell little ſhort of a violent ſedition; and finding how it wrought, I could not do better, I thought, than help it forward.

Joſephus provides to encounter it.

Odious and captious queſtions put to Joſephus.

And ſo I went on, telling him, that if in truth it was ill done, as he was pleaſed to ſay it was, to gratify my meſſengers out of the publick ſtock, I bad him never give himſelf or me any farther trouble or uneaſineſs on that ſcore, for I myſelf would take care to ſee thoſe twenty pieces of gold repaid. The fairer matters appear'd on my ſide, the more outragious was the multitude upon it, when they found the whole ſtory from end to end, to have nothing more in it than ſpite and calumny. This fell out ſo contrary to expectation, that Jeſus commanded the place to be clear'd of all but the ſenators; for the buſineſs they were about was not to be done, he ſaid, in ſuch a hurry and confuſion; the people crying out on the other ſide, that they were reſolv'd, whatever came of it, not to leave Joſeph alone with them. While they were in the heat of this clamour, in came a meſſenger, and whiſper'd Jonathan in the ear, that John would be with him immediately with his party; ſo that Jonathan, upon this encouragement, breaking out into a moſt providential impatience, (for I had certainly been loſt elſe.) "Good men of "Tiberias, ſays he, let all debates concerning "the buſineſs of the gold drop; for I would "not have you imagine, that I adjudge Jo"ſeph worthy of death on that account, but "for oppreſſing and impoſing upon the com"mon people of Galilee, in the tyranical af"fectation and exerciſe of an arbitrary power." At that word, certain ruffians that were of the plot ſet upon me, and had without doubt deſtroyed me, if my friends there upon the place had not immediately drawn their ſwords, and kept them off, by threatening to cut them to pieces if they attempted any manner of violence. The common people at the ſame time alſo offering to ſtone Jonathan; ſo that betwixt them both, I was reſcued for that bout out of the hands of my enemies. Upon my withdrawing to make my eſcape, whom ſhould I meet upon the way, but John with his troops, upon their march to the aſſiſtance of Jonathan. The ſurprize ſtartled me, but I made a ſhift, however, to decline them, by taking a by-way, and ſo got to the lake, where taking boat, I preſently arriv'd at Taricheæ. A wonderful deliverance, and beyond all expectation.

THE firſt thing I did after my arrival, was to call a council of the chief men of the province, and give them a narrative of the barbarous treatment I had receiv'd from Jonathan and the Tiberians, and how narrowly I had eſcaped being aſſaſſinated by them, contrary to common faith, humanity, and Juſtice. This put the whole multitude of the Galilæans into ſuch a fury, that nothing would ſerve them, but immediately to declare war againſt John, Jonathan, and their companions, and utterly to confound them; which they themſelves, they ſaid, would undertake, if they might but have leave from me to enter upon the work. I did what I could by fair means, towards the compoſing of this impetuous humour; adviſing them for the preſent, rather to reſpite the matter a-while, till we might ſee what our deputies had done at Jeruſalem; for there was no reſolution to be taken without their approbation. With theſe words they were pacified, and John, after another baffle, return'd back again to Giſchala.

The deputies bring word from Jerusalem that great offence is taken at the insolences of Ananus and Simon.

Some few days after this, our deputies brought us an account from Jerusalem, that the government there was mightily offended with Ananus, and Simon the son of Gamaliel, for presuming, without any publick authority, to send their agents to remove me from my government of Galilee; and that the common people were so incensed at this proceeding, that they had like to have set fire to their houses. They brought letters also, by which the head men of Jerusalem, with the authority and consent of the people, confirmed me in my government, and commanded John and his associates instantly upon the notice of that order, to depart the place. Upon the receipt of these letters, I went to Arbela, where I had appointed an assembly of the Galilæans; at which meeting my deputies made a report of what passed at Jerusalem; how heinously the people resented the insolences of Jonathan; and thereupon sent me a commission ratified for the government of that province, with a command to Jonathan and his people immediately to resign their pretences, and depart the place. This order was sent them accordingly, with an express charge to the bearer, to observe their countenances upon the delivery of it. The surprize of this letter put them to such a plunge, that they presently called a cabinet to advise what was to be done, John himself and the chief men of Tiberias and Gabara being of the council. The Tiberians advised them to continue the power still in their own hands, at all adventures, and not to abandon a people who had resigned themselves up to their protection: especially against an enemy that threaten'd them with an invasion, as they falsely and maliciously pretended I had done. John was of the same opinion, with this addition, that it would be proper to send two of their deputies to Jerusalem, with a charge of male-administration against me: which, betwixt the credit of the accusers, and the variable humour of the men they had to do withal, could not fail, he said, of making an impression upon the common people, and working the effect they desired. The thing, in short, was agreed upon; and so they sent Jonathan and Ananias soon after to Jerusalem, upon the commission, with a guard of a hundred soldiers for their safe passage; the other two staying behind at Tiberias. The Tiberians fell to work immediately upon repairing their walls, armed all the men they had in the town, and sent to John, who was then at Gischala, for a considerable body of troops, to be in a readiness, if there should be any occasion, to assist them against me.

Joseph's out-guards intercept Jonathan upon the way.

Jonathan and his people being now upon their march, and advanced as far as Dabaritta, (a village situate on a large plain upon the utmost borders of Galilee,) fell about midnight into a party of my out-guards, who took away their arms, and kept them prisoners upon the place, according to my order. Levi, who commanded the party, gave me information of the encounter, which for about two days I made no words of; but sent messengers to Tiberias, to advise the people to lay down their arms, who sent me only ribbaldry and foul language back for answer, in confidence that Jonathan was by this time got to Jerusalem. This unhandsome usage did not at all discourage me from making any farther attempt upon them by art and stratagem; for I would not for the world have made myself the ring-leader of a civil war. It came into my head to try if I could inveigle them out of the town: and so I took to the number of about ten thousand choice men, and divided them into three bodies; part of them I planted privately in Dora; a thousand of them in another village upon the mountains; and some about four furlongs from Tiberias, with orders to be ready upon the first signal to make a sally. Upon this, I shewed myself out of the village within sight of the Tiberians, who presently made toward me with all the scoffs and reproaches imaginable: nay, to such an extravagant pitch did their insolence and vanity carry them, that they had provided a mock-funeral for me, and with a phantastical pomp of solemnity, exposed my body in the field, with my mourners about me, by way of derision: but it was my business to see and say nothing, and to leave them to the fate of their own folly. I had a great desire all this while to get Simon and Joazar into my hands; and the propereſt method I could think of, for the gaining my point, was to try if I could decoy them and their friends out of town, with what troops they themselves thought fit for their own security, under the pretence of an expedient I had thought of for the adjusting of all differences, by sharing the administration among us. Joazar, who was crafty and suspicious, kept himself at a distance for fear of a trick; but Simon being weak and covetous, swallowed the bait, and came over to me at first word, with his friends and his guards about him. I receiv'd him with all becoming respect and acknowledgment for the honour he had done me; and upon walking and discoursing together a pretty while, I contrived to draw him off a little farther from his company, as if it had been only to confer with him about something that required a little more privacy; when all on a sudden I caught him up by the middle, and sent him away by safe hands to the next village. I gave the signal at the same time for my men to come out to me, and so marched away with them directly for Tiberias. We had a very sharp encounter by the way, and the enemy maintained the fight with so much resolution, that they obliged my men at first to give ground; till animated by my encouragment they renewed the fight, assailed the Tiberians with fresh ardour, and at last, though with much difficulty and hazard, forced them within the walls of the town. I had now sent another party by the way of the lake, with orders to set the first house on fire they could come at, which being done just in the nick of time, the Tiberians giving it for granted that the city was taken by force, threw down their arms, and with their wives and children cast themselves at my feet for mercy, as a conquer'd people. Upon this submission, I put a stop to the fury of the soldiers, caused a retreat to be sounded, and it being toward evening, I withdrew to refresh myself, and sent for Simon to sup with me; with this comfortable assurance, that I would take care to send him safe back again to Jerusalem with all necessaries and conveniencies for his journey.

whom I immediately ordered into cuſtody, and ſent them all priſoners to Jotapata, ſaving only Jonathan and Ananias, whom I ſet at liberty, and ordered to be conducted to Jeruſalem, together with Simon and Joazar their aſſociates, under a convoy of five hundred ſoldiers, and a competent allowance for the expence of the journey. The people of Tiberias came to me now a ſecond time to beg my pardon, with the moſt ſolemn aſſurances that they would make me amends by their future fidelity and ſervices, for what they had hitherto done amiſs; intreating me withal, that the pillage, which the ſoldiers had taken, might be reſtored to the right owners. Hereupon I gave order for the whole booty to be forthwith brought in, and laid before me. The ſoldiers, I perceived, were not ſo forward in it as I could have wiſhed; inſomuch, that obſerving one of them in a finer dreſs than uſual, I put it to him how he came by that habit? The man acknowledged it to be part of the plunder, and ſo I cauſed him to be ſeverely whipt for detaining it, with the menace of a greater ſeverity upon any man who ſhould afterward dare to withhold any part of what he had taken. Upon this the whole booty was brought in, and every man claiming his own, had it reſtored to him again.

The pillage of the town reſtored to the right owners.

Joſeph. taxes Juſtus, and ſome other writers with partiality.

I MUST not paſs over this ſubject and occaſion without taking notice of Juſtus and ſome other writers, who have undertaken to give the world an hiſtory of that war, and have made no ſcruple, out of a partial affection to ſome, and prejudice to others, to depart from the truth, and groſly to miſrepreſent perſons and things, thereby tranſmitting to poſterity notorious falſities, wherein the quality of their crime equals, not to ſay exceeds, theirs who are guilty of forging writings, and deeds of land, and differs only in this, that it can be committed with impunity, and within the ſubterfuge of the law.

Now Juſtus taking upon him to deliver an hiſtorical account of that war, hath launch'd out into a great many extravagant falſities, not only to diſhonour me, but he has not ſpared his own country neither, and yet he values himſelf upon thoſe inventions, as the ornaments of his ſtory. So that I am now obliged in my own defence, to lay him open, by a diſcovery of certain privacies to the world, which I had hitherto forbore making mention of. And let it not be thought a wonder, after all, that I have defered it ſo long; for though I look upon it to be the peculiar province and indiſpenſible duty of an hiſtorian to tell nothing but the truth, yet there may be ſome bitter truths, which a grave and a modeſt author will make ſome difficulty to relate, even in the caſe of the worſt of men; not for their ſakes, but for the dignity of his profeſſion and office: but to come now to my point. "Say, Juſtus, you Reflections upon Juſtus.

"who are the greateſt pretender of all "men living, to the good faith of a candid "author; how was it poſſible for me and the "Galilæans to be the cauſe of the revolt of "your countrymen from their prince, and from "the Roman empire, when you yourſelf, Juſ-"tus, and your Tiberians, had already made "war upon the Decapolitans in Syria, and "burnt their villages? By the token that one "of your own ſervants fell in the action; and "all this before ever I received my commiſ-"ſion from Jeruſalem for the government of "Galilee? nor do I deliver this barely upon "my own credit, but refer the reader for his "better ſatisfaction, to the memorials and re-"cords of the emperor Veſpaſian; wherein it "will appear, that while the emperor was at "Ptolemais, the people of Decapolis were ſtill "preſſing him with reſtleſs importunities to do "them Juſtice upon you, as the principal pro-"moter of all their troubles; which he had "undoubtedly done, if king Agrippa, to whom "the care of the execution was committed, had "not given you your life upon the mediation "of his ſiſter Berenice; and this pardon did "not yet acquit you, but that you were ſtill "kept in priſon a long time after. Beſide, "that the whole courſe of your life was all of "a piece, as may be ſeen in your following "practices; for I ſhall make it evident to de-"monſtration, that it was at your inſtigation, "and by your perſuaſion, that your people "broke out into a rebellion againſt the Ro-"mans. I muſt now give the reader to un-"derſtand, that neither you yourſelf, nor the "reſt of the Tiberians were ever faithful, "either to Agrippa, or to the emperor.

"THE two faireſt cities in all Galilee, are "Sepphoris and Tiberias; the latter the place "of your nativity, Juſtus; the former ſeated "in the middle of the province, with ſeveral "villages depending upon it; and the people "ſo true to their maſters, that they did not "only refuſe me entrance into the place, but "by a publick edict prohibited all their citi-"zens from bearing arms for the Jews. And "for their better ſecurity, they trick'd me in-"to a promiſe to wall in their town for them; "which I had no ſooner done, but they turn'd "me off with contempt for my pains; ſub-"mitting alſo at the ſame time without any "difficulty, to a Roman garriſon under Ceſtius "Gallus, who was then governor of Syria; "and this too at a time when my power was "formidable, and I had the whole neigh-"bourhood in awe. Nay, ſo cautious were "they of giving the Romans the leaſt colour "for a ſuſpicion of their breaking faith with "them, that when the temple of Jeruſalem "was beſieg'd, and the common cauſe and "intereſt of our nation at ſtake upon that ac-"tion, they would not ſo much as contribute "in any ſort to their relief. But for your "country, Juſtus, conſidering the ſituation of "it, as it ſtands upon the border of the lake "of Genezareth, about thirty furlongs from "Hippos, ſixty from Gadara, and a hundred "and twenty from Scythopolis; places under "the king's juriſdiction, and none of the Jews "garriſons thereabouts, (over and above that "you wanted neither men nor arms,) you "might, one would have thought, under all "theſe advantages, if you had had a mind to "it, have continued loyal, and diſcharged "your duty to the Romans. But even ad-"mitting the matter to be as you ſay, and "that in reality I was at that time in ſome "meaſure the cauſe of the war, who was to "blame afterward, I beſeech you? for you "know very well that the Romans had got "me into their power before the ſiege was laid "to Jeruſalem; that Jotapata, and divers "other caſtles, were taken by aſſault, and great "numbers of the Galilæans deſtroyed in ſeve-"ral engagements. Now if it be true, as

" you ſuggeſt, that the war was undertaken " altogether againſt your will, and that you " were compelled to it by force, how came it " to paſs that you did not lay down your " arms, and make your ſubmiſſion to your " prince and the Romans, when that pretended " neceſſity was over? for you were now out " of danger of any hurt that I could do you. " But you were ſtill obſtinately reſolv'd to " ſtand it out, till Veſpaſian was advanced " with his whole army up to your very walls; " and it was then high time for you to call " for quarter, and lay down your arms for " fear of worſe conſequences; and that ſub- " miſſion would not have ſerved your turn " neither, or ſaved your city from being plun- " dered and levelled with the ground, had " not the king made interceſſion to Veſpaſian, " on your behalf, and by his intereſt obtain'd " the emperor's pardon for your madneſs and " folly; ſo that your enmity to the Romans " was purely out of the malice of your own " heart, without any fault of mine. How " many times have I got the better of you, " and had you at my mercy, without ſpilling " ſo much as one drop of your blood? where- " as it is notoriouſly known, that in the rage " of your inteſtine broils, not in the king's " cauſe, nor in the Romans, but out of a ſpi- " rit of animoſity and rancour one againſt an- " other, you put to death no leſs than a hun- " dred and eighty five citizens at a time, when I " was block'd up in Jotapata. Well! and " were there not two thouſand Tiberians kil- " led and taken at Jeruſalem? were you no " enemy, do you think, becauſe you had at " that time fled to the king? not out of love " or duty, but becauſe I frighted you thither. " If you will needs have me to be an ill man, " pray what was Juſtus then? a wretch that " Veſpaſian pronounced a ſentence of death " upon, though the execution of it was after- " wards remitted by king Agrippa; twice a " priſoner, as often an exile; once ſav'd from " the very gibbet, upon the mediation of Be- " renice, his ſiſter; and finally, after all this, " ſo falſe to the truſt of a ſecretary, which " he had the honour to have conferr'd upon " him, that his maſter baniſh'd him his pre- " ſence for ever. But Juſtus, without raking " any further into your miſdemeanors, I can- " not ſufficiently admire the impudence of " your ſetting up for the moſt perfect and ex- " act hiſtorian of this war, in contradiction to " all others; when effectually you are but a " mere ſtranger to the whole matter, even to " what has paſs'd in Galilee itſelf; for in the " time of that action, you were with the king " at Berytus; and ſo for the ſiege of Jota- " pata, how was it poſſible for you to make " any report of my conduct in that adventure, " when there was not one man left alive but " myſelf to tell you the ſtory; or you will " ſay, perhaps, that the relation you have " given of what paſs'd at Jeruſalem, may be " more correct. But it is a thing hardly to " be imagin'd, that you, who were neither " perſonally in the action, nor ever ſo much as " read Veſpaſian's commentaries upon that part " of the war, ſhould be ſo well informed in " the ſtory. Now I take for granted that you " never did read them, becauſe there are ſeve- " ral caſes wherein you do point-blank con- " tradict them; but if you are really poſſeſſed " with ſo vain and over-weening an opinion of " your own performances, as to fancy to your- " ſelf that you have in this relation out-done " all mankind, how happened it that the world " was not obliged with the ſight of this ad- " mirable piece, while Veſpaſian or Titus, the " generals themſelves, under whoſe conduct " the war was waged, were yet living? or in " the days of Agrippa and his relations, who " were all great maſters and criticks in the " Greek tongue? Why was the publication " of this hiſtory of yours ſo long ſuppreſſed, " (for it had been now finiſh'd a matter of " twenty years,) when you might have had " ſo many living and eye-witneſſes of the " fact, to vouch for the good faith and cre- " dit of the work? What reaſon, I ſay, can " we aſſign for ſuch proceedings as theſe? " but that you durſt not ſtand the teſt and " cenſure of the world, while ſo many people " were yet alive that were able to diſprove " you. Now I followed quite another me- " thod with my papers, and not fearing who " read them, I put them into the hands of the " emperors themſelves, who had the govern- " ment of the war; and this, while all the " particulars of it were ſtill freſh in every " body's memory; my conſcience, in fine, " acquitting me, that I deliver'd the truth " without adding or diminiſhing; upon which " account my writings have received as fa- " vourable an acceptance in the world as I " could deſire. Theſe memorials I communi- " cated to ſeveral perſons one after another, who " had born a part in the war; as king Agrippa " for one, and ſome certain relations of his: " Nay Titus himſelf gave ſuch a teſtimony in " approbation of this hiſtory of mine, that he " recommended it to the world as an authen- " tical record; and by an order under his " own hand, aſſign'd it a place in his library. " King Agrippa was ſo pleaſed with the inte- " grity and candour of it, that he wrote me " ſixty two letters in confirmation of the cre- " dit of it; two of them I have here ſubjoin'd, " to the end, Juſtus, that the matter may be " allow'd to ſpeak for itſelf."

King Agrippa to his deareſt friend Joſeph, greeting.

Agrippa's teſtimonial in favour of Joſephus.

" I HAVE read your book with very great " delight, and look upon it to be the moſt " exact account of any I have yet ſeen. Pray " ſend me the remainder, and ſo, my dear " friend, I bid you farewel."

King Agrippa to Joſeph, his deareſt friend, health.

Agrippa to Joſephus.

" UPON the peruſal of your writings, " I perceive you have little need of any " thing further that I can tell you; only " when we meet next, I may, perhaps, ſug- " geſt ſome certain paſſages to your conſidera- " tion that have eſcaped your knowledge."

" THIS was the teſtimony that king Agrippa " gave to the truth of my hiſtory; not out of " flattery, for that was below him; nor in a " way of mockery or banter, for he was a man " of too much honour and candour, to be guil- " ty of ſo ill-natur'd a levity; but purely out " of a deſire to recommend the authority of " my writings to poſterity, upon the credit of " ſo authentick a certificate.

THIS

THIS is all I have to say to Juſtus, and it is no more than what I found abſolutely neceſſary in my own defence; ſo that I ſhall now reſume my diſcourſe, and purſue the ſubject again where I broke off.

AFTER the quieting of Tiberias, I called a council of my friends, to conſult upon the buſineſs of John, and to reſolve what courſe was to be taken with him. They were all of opinion for drawing the whole ſtrength of Galilee into a body, and falling upon him, as the principal head and author of the whole broil and confuſion. But my judgment was utterly againſt all ſanguinary proceedings; and rather to make trial of ſome other way for compoſing the tumult without ſhedding of blood. Upon bethinking myſelf, this expedient came into my head: I gave orders for an exact liſt to be procur'd of John's faction; and having gotten the names of the whole party, I publiſh'd an act of grace to all who ſhould come in within twenty days, and laying down their arms, return to their duty; with an aſſurance of indemnity for what was paſt, upon their compliance with this edict; but for thoſe who ſhould obſtinately continue in arms beyond that time, they were to expect all the extremities of fire, ſword, and pillage. This invitation and menace together, wrought ſo effectually upon John's followers, as well by fear, as otherwiſe, that four thouſand of them threw down their arms immediately, and came over to me; only his fellow citizens of Giſchala abode by him, and fifteen hundred mercenaries of Tyre. This way of proceeding kept John under ſuch an awe, that he durſt not ſhew his head after it out of his own country.

Four thouſand of John's followers brought over by an act of oblivion.

SEPPHORIS was a well-wall'd town, ſtrongly fortified, and the inhabitants a bold reſolute ſort of people; ſo that betwixt their confidence in the ſtrength of the place, and the thought of my having my hands full elſewhere, they laid hold of this opportunity to take up arms, ſending to Ceſtius Gallus, who was then governor of Syria, either to come preſently, and take poſſeſſion of the city himſelf, or to put in a garriſon ſufficient to protect them. Gallus ſent them word back again, that he would come, but did not ſay when. Upon the intelligence of what had paſs'd betwixt them, I march'd directly up to the place, attack'd, and carried it. The Galilæans were willing to improve this advantage, and adjudging the time was now come for the taking of a thorough revenge upon the Sepphorites, whom they mortally hated, they took up an outragious reſolution of deſtroying both men and city, in one common ruin. The people had quitted their habitations, and withdrawn into the caſtle for protection, while the ſoldiers ſet fire to the empty houſes, plundering and rifling whatever they could lay hand on, without any regard or diſtinction, whether friends, kindred, or ſtrangers. It wounded me to the very heart to ſee theſe barbarous violences; inſomuch that I call'd out to the ſoldiers to give over for ſhame, that inhuman and unnatural way of proceeding againſt men of their own tribe and profeſſion. At this rate I went on, doing all I could, both by intreaty, and by authority, to reſtrain them; but when I found their fury ſo implacable, that neither the one nor the other had any effect upon them, I betook myſelf to this ſtratagem. I gave it in charge to ſome of my particular friends, to get a report ſpread about, as if the Romans had enter'd another quarter of the town with a mighty army, which I did with an intent that ſuch a rumour might turn the thoughts of the Galilæans another way, and ſo preſerve the city. This ſtratagem ſucceeded to my wiſh; for the alarm of an aſſault immediately frighted the Galilæans from their plunder, to ſhift for themſelves; and their apprehenſion was ſo much the greater, when they ſaw that I myſelf ran away too for company.

Sepphoris a ſtrong place, and a bold reſolute people.

The Sepphorites ſend to Ceſtius Gallus, to take them into protection.

Joſeph. upon this, takes the place by aſſault.

The Galilæans burn, kill, and pillage without mercy.

Joſeph. diverts them by a ſtratagem.

BY this means the people of Sepphoris were deliver'd contrary to their hopes and expectations; and Tiberias afterward eſcaped, being plundered every jot as narrowly as the other. Some of the chief ſenators and citizens of the place applied themſelves by letter to the king, that he would do them the honour to come thither in perſon, and take them and the city into his royal protection; who ſent them word in writing, that he would be with them out of hand, and ſo diſpatch'd away one Criſpus, a Jew by extraction, and a gentleman of his bed-chamber, to the Tiberians, with his anſwer. The Galilæans having the good luck to meet Criſpus upon the way, and knowing the perſon of the man, took him into cuſtody, and brought him over to me to be examin'd. So ſoon as ever they came to underſtand the contents of his letters, and the buſineſs he was going about, the whole multitude immediately betook themſelves to their arms. I was at that time at Aſoch, where the day following a prodigious multitude of people aſſembled from all quarters, were, with clamours and outcries, exclaiming againſt the Tiberians for being traitors, and of the king's faction. They were, in ſhort, ſo furious, that nothing leſs than the demoliſhing of the city, and my giving way to it, would quiet them. The Tiberians, they ſaid, were as bad, if not worſe than the very Sepphorites, and full as deſerving of their chaſtiſement. The rage of the people I found was raiſed to an extravagant pitch; and as there was no good to be done upon them by reaſon, ſo they were too many to be dealt withal by force, therefore how to ſave the city from their fury, I could not deviſe. As for the letters, and the ſubject-matter of them, there was no denying, or palliating of any thing; for the king's anſwer gave demonſtrative proof of the truth of it. After I had been a good while turning my thoughts from one thing to another, and contriving which way the people might be fairly appeaſed, and the place preſerv'd, it came into my head at laſt to take a middle courſe betwixt oppoſing and complying with them; and ſo I reaſon'd the caſe with them after this manner: "The "Tiberians, ſaid I, are highly guilty, and "you ſhall have my conſent with all my heart, "to plunder and deſtroy their city; but then "you ought to go about theſe things with "judgment and diſcretion; for upon a fur-"ther ſcrutiny we ſhall find a faction among "the nobility of the Galilæans as deep in this "plot upon our liberties, as the Tiberians "themſelves; and therefore I am clearly for "a little patience, till I can get a thorough "diſcovery of our enemies; and then, when "we have them all in the toil together, we "may deal with them according to their de-"ſerts."

Tiberias eſcapes as narrowly as Sepphoris.

" ſerts." The multitude was ſo well ſatisfied with the fairneſs of the propoſal, that they diſpers'd upon it, without any further diſturbance, and went their way in peace.

CRISPUS, the king's meſſenger, being all this while in priſon, I made a pretence, ſome few days after, of a little buſineſs that call'd me out of town; and in the mean while, I ſent privately for him, and ſuggeſted to him to fuddle his keeper, and to try if he could give him the ſlip, and make his eſcape away to the king. This was the ſecond time that Tiberias was ſav'd from utter ruin by my policy.

WHILST affairs were in this poſture, Juſtus, the ſon of Piſtus, ſtole away to the king unknown to me; and the true reaſon of his going was this: Upon the breaking out of the Jewiſh war, the Tiberians had determin'd with themſelves to ſtand firm to the king and the Romans. Juſtus, on the other hand, debauch'd them into a revolt, in the hope and proſpect in the hurry of thoſe confuſions, of making himſelf maſter of the government. But his project was fruſtrated; for the Galilæans had contracted ſuch an averſion to the Tiberians, for the injuries they had ſuffer'd from them before the war, that they would not by any means let Juſtus eſtabliſh himſelf in his pretenſions; and truly I myſelf, when the people of Jeruſalem had conſtituted me in the government of Galilee, was many times provok'd to ſuch a degree, by the wicked practices of this turbulent man, that I had very much ado to forbear putting him to extremities. Juſtus was ſo well aware of the danger he was in, that for fear of the worſt, and not knowing how far paſſion and affronts might tranſport a man under my circumſtances, he thought it his beſt and ſafeſt courſe to withdraw, and betake himſelf to the king.

THE late deliverance of the Sepphorites was very extraordinary, and even beyond their expectations; and yet the danger was no ſooner over, but they again ſolicit Ceſtius Gallus, either to come immediately in perſon, and take poſſeſſion of the town, or elſe to furniſh them with a force ſufficient to ſecure it againſt the inroads of the enemy. Upon their importunities, Gallus ſent them a conſiderable body of horſe and foot, which they received into the city by night. The Roman horſe made ſuch havock in the adjacent country, that I was fain to incamp near Garizim, about twenty furlongs from Sepphoris. In the dead of the night I gave an aſſault to the walls of the town, which a good many of my men mounted, and took poſſeſſion of them; ſo that we were for a while maſters of a conſiderable part of the city; but for want of knowing the ſtreets and paſſages, we were forc'd to quit what we had got, without purſuing the advantage any farther than the killing of twelve of the Roman foot, two of their horſe, and ſome few of the Sepphorites, with the loſs only of one man on our ſide. Soon after this, we had a ſharp encounter with the Roman horſe in an open plain, and fought it very bravely for a long time, till coming in the end to be overpower'd with numbers, my guards ſurrounded by the enemy, and myſelf in the middle of them, my ſoldiers, frighted and diſcouraged at the danger I was in, retreated in confuſion. In this action I loſt Juſtus, one of my guards, and formerly one of the king's.

The Sepphorites ſend a ſecond invitation to Ceſtius Gallus; who puts a body of horſe and foot into the town by night.

Joſeph. takes Sepphoris, and quits it again.

MUCH about the ſame time there came a body of the king's horſe and foot, under the command of Silas, the captain of his guards, who encamped within a matter of five furlongs of Julias, having poſted ſtrong parties at all the avenues that led to Cana, and the caſtle of Gamala, to cut off all relief from the inhabitants of thoſe places. Upon this I ſent out Jeremiah at the head of two thouſand men to the bank of the river Jordan, about a furlong from Julias, where they paſs'd only ſome ſlight skirmiſhes, till I join'd them with three thouſand more myſelf. On the day following, after planting a ſtrong ambuſh in a bottom, at a convenient diſtance from the enemy, I proffer'd the king's troops battle, with orders to my men to turn their backs upon the firſt charge, and ſo to fly before the enemy till they had drawn them within reach of the ambuſcade. This was done accordingly; and Silas taking it for a rout in earneſt, followed us ſo far, that the ambuſh fell upon his rear, and put the king's troops in ſo great a diſorder, that upon my facing about, and charging them in the front, they were ſo abſolutely broken, that if it had not been for one ſpiteful unlucky accident, I had got the cleareſt victory under the ſun; but my horſe coming over with me in a bog, the fall put my wriſt out of joint; ſo that I was forced to be carried off to Cepharnome, a village near at hand, for relief. Upon this diſaſter my people, fearing the matter might be worſe with me than in truth it was, gave over the purſuit, and applied themſelves wholly to provide ſurgeons to take care of my hand. After one day's ſtay there, and falling into a fever too, I was removed at night by the doctor's advice to Taricheæ. Upon the intelligence of this misfortune, Silas and the king's friends took heart again, and hearing that our out-guards were looſe and careleſs, they ſent away a troop of horſe by night beyond Jordan, to lie in wait there for the opportunity of a ſurprize, daring us early the next morning to come to a battle. My people accepted the challenge; but upon coming into the plain to fight them, they fell into the enemy's ambuſh, by whom they were charged, vanquiſh'd, and put to flight, with the loſs only of ſix of our men; for the enemy, upon information that ſome troops were paſſing the lake from Taricheæ to Julias, founded a retreat, without daring to purſue the victory any farther.

Joſephus draws Silas into an ambuſh, and gives him an abſolute rout.

Joſephus's horſe falling with him, puts a ſtop to the purſuit.

Joſeph's people fall into an ambuſh of the enemy's horſe.

SOON after this Veſpaſian, accompanied with king Agrippa, came to Tyre, where he was ſaluted with the violent exclamations of the people againſt their king. They ſaid, he was an enemy and a traitor, both to the Tyrians and the Romans, and that it was by his command that his general, Philip, betray'd both the Roman gariſon, and the royal palace at Jeruſalem. Veſpaſian gave the Tyrians a ſevere reprimand, for preſuming to calumniate one who was both a king and a friend to the Romans; but adviſed Agrippa, however, to ſend Philip to Rome, to account for his conduct before the emperor: he was ſent accordingly upon that deſign; but finding Nero miſerably harraſs'd by reaſon of his civil wars, he return'd without ſeeing the face of the emperor.

NOT long after this, upon Veſpaſian's coming to Ptolemais, the principals of Decapolis came thronging to him with grievous complaints

Veſpaſian comes to Tyre with Agrippa.

The people charge Agrippa with treachery, in Philip's giving up the royal palace at Jeruſalem and the Roman garriſon there.

Veſpaſian chides them for their inſolence, and adviſes Agrippa to ſend Philip to the emperor to clear himſelf.

Complaints are brought to Veſpaſian at Ptolemais againſt Juſtus.

againſt Juſtus, for burning their country, who deliver'd him up to Agrippa to have him ſeverely puniſhed for the injuries done his ſubjects. The king upon this made him priſoner, without conſulting the emperor, as has been already obſerv'd.

Veſpaſian appoints the Sepphorites a gariſon.

THE Sepphorites went likewiſe to pay their compliments to Veſpaſian, who at their requeſt appointed them a gariſon under the command of Placidus, who was the man I had to deal with, till the emperor himſelf came into Galilee; of whoſe arrival, the manner of his coming, my retreat to Jotapata, after the firſt engagement I had at Tarichеæ; what I did in defence of the place, how I came after a long ſiege to be taken priſoner; how afterwards to be ſet at liberty; and how I behaved, in ſhort, through the whole courſe of the Jewiſh war. Theſe, I ſay, are points I have handled ſo very particularly in their proper places, that there remains nothing more to be ſaid on this ſubject, than to relate a few privacies of my own life.

Joſeph. made a priſoner by the Romans.

UPON the Romans reducing Jotapata, I was taken priſoner, and kept under a ſtrict guard; notwithſtanding which, I was treated very honourably by Veſpaſian; upon whoſe perſuaſion I married a virgin of Cæſarea, who was at that time my fellow priſoner: but we were ſoon ſeparated; for after I was ſet at liberty, I liſted myſelf in the train of Veſpaſian, who was then going to Alexandria, and ſhe retired another way. After this I married again at Alexandria, from whence I was ſent with Titus to Jeruſalem, where my life was often in danger, both from the malice of my countrymen, who labour'd to deſtroy me; and the violence of the Romans, who charged all their miſcarriages to my treaſonable practices, and were continually ſoliciting the emperor to put me to death as a traitor; but Titus, who was then declared emperor, was too well acquainted with the humours of men, and the inſtability of fortune, to give ear to the clamourous importunities of an impetuous multitude; and ſuch was his benevolence towards me, that after the deſtruction of Jeruſalem, he order'd me to take whatever I thought worthy my acceptance, out of the general ruins of the city; but alas! in the calamity of that inconſolable loſs and deſolation, I could find nothing worth asking for, but the liberty of my friends, and the poſſeſſion of the holy bible, which the emperor immediately granted; my brother and above fifty of my neareſt relations being ſoon after ſet at liberty. After this, by the emperor's permiſſion, I enter'd the temple, where I found a vaſt multitude of women and children; and among the reſt, to the number of one hundred and ninety of my own friends and familiars, who at my requeſt were all abſolutely ſet free, and reſtor'd to their former condition, without any manner of ranſom.

Joſeph. liſts in the train of Veſpaſian.

Joſeph. greatly favoured by Titus.

Titus ſends Joſephus to Thecoa with Cerealis.

I was then ſent by Titus with Cerealis and a thouſand horſe to a village call'd Thecoa, to take a view of the ſituation and diſpoſition of the place for the forming of a camp there. At my coming back I ſaw a great many priſoners crucified upon the way, and among others, three of my old intimate acquaintance. I was ſo affected with this piercing ſpectacle, that I went preſently with tears in my eyes to Titus, and told him the ſtory. Upon which he immediately order'd the bodies to be taken down, and all poſſible means uſed for their recovery; but two of them died under the ſurgeon's hand, and the third recover'd, and ſurviv'd the miſeries he had undergone in the crucifixion.

WHEN Titus had ſettled the affairs of Judæa, in a ſtate of order and peace, he appointed me a portion of lands at a diſtance, in exchange for others I had in the neighbourhood of Jeruſalem. This he did out of kindneſs and reſpect; for he knew it would be very inconvenient for me to have my habitation in the middle of the Roman troops, that were of neceſſity to be quarter'd about Jeruſalem, for the ſecurity of the province. The emperor Veſpaſian did me the honour alſo upon his return to Rome, to take me into the ſame veſſel with him for a companion, and upon our arrival there, he was graciouſly pleaſed to treat me after the moſt favourable and friendly manner. In the firſt place, he made me free of the city, and then lodg'd me in the ſame palace that he himſelf had liv'd in before he was emperor. He ſettled upon me a yearly penſion, and continued his bounty and goodneſs to me, without diminution or abatement, ſo long as he liv'd, which expoſed me to no ſmall danger, by drawing upon me the mortal envy and hatred of ſome of my own nation; for there was a certain Jew, Jonathan by name, who raiſed a ſedition, and got together a body of two thouſand men of the inhabitants of Cyrene; but they were all cut off. This Jonathan being taken, and ſent to the emperor in chains, by the governor of the province, poſitively affirmed that I had aſſiſted him towards this tumult, with money and arms; but Veſpaſian, without giving any credit to the calumny, order'd him to be put to death, for the treaſon of which he was juſtly condemned. After this, there were ſeveral other falſe practices, and envious ſubornations advanced againſt me; but by God's providence I eſcap'd them all; and had a fair eſtabliſhment allotted me in Judæa, by the bounty of Veſpaſian. About this time, my wife and I could not agree. I did not like her ways, and ſo I put her away, having had three children by her, two of them dead, and only Hyrcanus living. After this divorce, I took another wife, by birth a Candian, but by deſcent a Jew, a woman of the moſt noble parentage of any in that country, and one whoſe exemplary honour and virtue, as I found by cohabiting with her, exceeded the generality of her ſex. By her I had two ſons; Juſtus the elder, and Simonides, ſirnamed Agrippa, the other. Thus it ſtood with me and my family; beſide that I was ſo happy as to be continually in favour with the Cæſars. For after the death of Veſpaſian, Titus his ſucceſſor ſhew'd the ſame kindneſs and reſpect to me as his father, and never gave ear to any accuſation that my enemies brought againſt me. Domitian conferr'd upon me ſtill greater honours. He put to death ſeveral Jews who were my accuſers, and order'd an eunuch ſlave, whom I employ'd for my ſon's tutor, to be ſeverely puniſh'd for a falſe information againſt me. And, which is yet a more honourable mark of his ſingular goodneſs toward me, he hath been pleaſed to grant me the privilege of an exemption from all taxes and duties for the eſtate that I am poſſeſs'd of in Judæa. Neither have my obligations been leſs in proportion to Domitia, the wife of Cæſar, than to the emperor himſelf. This, in ſhort, is the hiſtory of my life; and the world by this may judge of my abilities.

Containing the Hiſtory of 2230 Years from the Creation.

CHAP. I.

The INTRODUCTION: ſhewing the Nature and Deſign of the Work.

Authors have divers reaſons for writing hiſtories.

THOSE people who take upon them the office of hiſtorians, do not all write, I obſerve, with one and the ſame thought and deſign; but ſeveral authors have their ſeveral reaſons for the ſame undertaking; and all thoſe motives, at laſt, widely differing one from another. There are ſome indeed, who write out of an affectation of vain-glory and popular applauſe, and an itch of vanity to diſplay their eloquence and ſhew their parts; and there are ſome again, that make it their chief aim to exalt ſuch of the actors in the ſtory they treat of, as they have a mind to oblige, and ſpare for no ſtudy and pains to do them honour, and diſplay their merit: but there are others now, who having been actually engaged in the management of the tranſactions they relate, look upon themſelves obliged, from the very nature of the thing itſelf, to communicate what they know of the matter before them; and there are yet others, in ſhort, who enter upon this province out of a generous impatience to ſee great and glorious atchievements buried in ſilence, which ſo well deſerve to be made publick for the common benefit of mankind.

What moved Joſephus to write his hiſtory.

IT is upon the two laſt of theſe four conſiderations that I have now put pen to paper; for having been a party myſelf in the war betwixt us and the Romans, a witneſs to my coſt of what paſſed on both ſides in it, and conſequently privy to the main iſſue of that conteſt, I looked upon it as my duty to ſet forth the juſt matter of fact, and vindicate the truth from the falſities and corruptions which had crept into the ſtory. And I had yet a farther encouragement to this undertaking, from a confident aſſurance that it would prove an acceptable work to the Greeks themſelves, when they ſhould find the antiquities of our nation, and the form of our government tranſlated out of Hebrew into their own language.

AT my firſt entrance upon the hiſtory of the war, I propoſed to ſpeak of the original of the Jews, their various fortunes, and their excellent law-giver, who trained them up to the love and practice of ſo much piety and virtue; to give an account of their wars for ſo many ages, and eſpecially that of the laſt, which they were compelled, how unwillingly ſoever, to maintain againſt the Romans. But upon ſecond thoughts, finding the ſubject too large and copious for my preſent purpoſe, I choſe rather to make another diſpoſition of the matter, and to divide it.

AFTER ſome ſhort time ſpent upon the eſſay, it fared with me in this, as it does commonly with other people who have formed great deſigns in their heads; the proſpect of ſo vaſt and and voluminous a tract of hiſtory, and that in a foreign language too, made me ſo heavy and dead-hearted, that it almoſt repented me of my purpoſe: but betwixt the importunities of men, (curious to know the particulars of that famous revolution) who preſſed me to go forward with what I had begun, and the encouragements of Epaphroditus above the reſt, who was a paſſionate lover of all ſorts of polite learning, and of hiſtory particularly, being a perſon who had executed ſeveral eminent commiſſions, and ſtood all fortunes with an extraordinary conduct, and an immoveable firmneſs and dignity of mind, and without the leaſt blemiſh to his virtue: betwixt the one and the other I was prevailed upon, partly out of obedience and reſpect to the advice and authority of ſo illuſtrious a patron and benefactor to all well-wiſhers to the publick, and partly out of mere ſhame rather to lie at my eaſe, indolent and unactive, than undergo the pains of perfecting ſo glorious a work: Theſe circumſtances, I ſay, prevailed unpon me to proſecute my firſt project, and I ſet about it more chearfully, when I conſider'd how freely our anceſtors imparted ſuch matters to ſtrangers, and how affectionately inquiſitive ſeveral of the Greeks themſelves had been of our affairs. We read of king Ptolemy the ſecond (a prince that purchas'd books and encourag'd arts and ſcience at any rate,) how ſolicitous he was to get our laws, cuſtoms, and ways of living, tranſlated into Greek: and Eleazar the high-prieſt, (a perſon not inferior to any other of the holy order) did not think fit to deny him that ſatisfaction; which, undoubtedly he would have done, if we had not been taught and warranted by the example of our forefathers, not to reſerve or conceal any thing that may be of publick and univerſal advantage. Now I thought it might very well become me to conform to the practice and precedent of our high-prieſt; not doubting but that the ſame virtuous inclinations to the love of learning, which were then ſo remarkable in Ptolemy, might at this time be found alſo in others. Let it not be underſtood that this great king had all the copies giving him entire; but only ſuch of them as reſpect our laws, and were delivered to him at Alexandria by the interpreters who were ſent with them thither to that purpoſe. For theſe ſacred writings muſt of neceſſity contain an infinite variety of things, being an entire hiſtory of five thouſand years, full of ſurprizing accidents, various chances of war, mighty atchievements of famous commanders, ſtrange turns of ſtate, and an abundance of publick and extraordinary revolutions.

Epaphroditus, a generous encourager of learning.

A hiſtory of 5000 years.

But upon the main, there is one thing that the reader will take notice of in a more particular manner upon the peruſal of this hiſtory; which is, that all things ſucceed happily, even beyond belief, to thoſe who reſign themſelves to the good pleaſure of Almighty God, and ſtrictly obſerve his commandments, beſides tranſcendant bleſſings promiſed them for a reward: whereas, on the other hand, the diſobedient, inſtead of proſpering in their ways, how fair and plauſible ſoever, fall into all ſorts of miſery and diſtreſs, and without end or remedy. Wherefore I earneſtly exhort and adviſe the reader of theſe volumes to lead his life in conformity to the will of God, and carefully to obſerve and attend to what Moſes our lawgiver ſays of the divine nature; the agreement of all his works one with another; and how clear and exempt his whole narration is from the levity of thoſe fictions which we meet with in other relations. Not but that, conſidering the circumſtances of time and antiquity, he might have impoſed upon us what he would, without danger of contradiction; for our ſtory begins above two thouſand years before the fables of the poets were ever heard of; and the Pagans themſelves never had the confidence to look ſo far backward, either for the date of their Gods, the actions of their heroes, or the ordinances of their lawgivers. I ſhall ſpeak of this in what follows, and (according to my promiſe) of every thing in its proper place, without adding or diminiſhing.

The Antiquity of the ſtory.

But in regard, however, that the credit of the whole ſtory depends in a great meaſure upon the authority of what Moſes in his great wiſdom thought fit to deliver, ſomewhat ought to be ſaid previouſly of Moſes himſelf, to prevent exceptions and cavils; for people will be apt to wonder at the ſight of a book, which pretends only to fact and hiſtory in the title, and yet launches out into ſo many digreſſions upon natural philoſophy in the text. Be it known therefore, that this excellent and extraordinary perſon laid it down as a thing abſolutely neceſſary for any man who would live virtuouſly himſelf, or perſcribe laws to others, to apply his mind in the firſt place to the knowledge of God; and then upon a due conſideration of his works, ſo far as in him lies, to follow and imitate that perfect model. Without this care and intention, 'tis impoſſible for a lawgiver to anſwer the character of his profeſſion, neither can he make other people the better for his writings, without inſtructing them in the firſt place, that God is the Father and Lord of all things, that nothing is hid from his ſight, that he confers his bleſſing on thoſe who ſerve him, and inflicteth the greateſt miſeries on thoſe who wander from the paths of virtue and righteouſneſs. This was Moſes's method of training up his people. He did not begin after the manner of other rulers, with proviſion for liberty and property, ſtipulations, contracts, and the like; but with a lecture upon the power of God in the creation of the world, and the excellency of man above other earthly creatures. And when he had once poſſeſſed them with a reverence for piety, they became the more eaſily ſuſceptible of all other laudable impreſſions. As for thoſe lawgivers who have only fabulous traditions for their pattern and guide, they take a freedom to impute to their Gods the lewdneſs of the moſt infamous of men, and ſo to authorize and encourage others in all manner of wickedneſs after their example. But our legiſlator, having firſt ſet forth that God is virtue and purity itſelf, he tells us afterwards that men ſhould do all they can to make themſelves partakers of the holineſs, in ſome degree at leaſt, of that divine original; concluding the caution with a ſevere ſentence upon thoſe who will neither believe nor underſtand theſe truths.

A rule for magiſtrates and lawgivers.

Moſes's way of training up his people.

Whoever examines this work according to theſe meaſures (as I wiſh every reader may) will find nothing in it unreaſonable, nor, I hope, derogatory to God's majeſty and goodneſs. He will ſee every thing proportioned to the matters that are there handled by our lawgiver; ſome ſome things only touch'd upon, or ſlightly hinted, others illuſtrated by proper allegories; and for thoſe paſſages that we are moſt concern'd to have a perfect underſtanding of, they are as plain and clear as words can make them. It would, indeed, require a deep ſpeculation to enter into the particular reaſons of theſe different ways of writing; but if God gives me life and health to complete what I am now upon, I determine to make that my next buſineſs; but for the preſent, I ſhall proceed to my hiſtory, beginning with what Moſes tells us concerning the creation of the world, as we find it in holy writ.

Gen. i. 1. IN the beginning God created the heaven and the earth; but the earth was not as

Ver. 2. yet viſible, by reaſon of a thick darkneſs that

Ver. 3. cover'd it. After this the ſpirit of God moving over it, God commanded that there ſhould

Ver. 4. be light; which no ſooner appear'd, but upon the view of the maſs, he ſeparated the light from the darkneſs; and the darkneſs he called

Ver. 5. night, and the light day. The beginning of the day he called morning, and the end of it (or the time of reſt) evening; and theſe two terms completed the firſt day. Moſes calls it one day, or a day, and not the firſt day; for which I could give a ſufficient reaſon, but having promiſed an explanation of theſe niceties in a ſeparate tract, I lie under ſome ſort of neceſſity to refer thoſe notes to their proper time and place.

Ver. 6. ON the ſecond day God created the heaven or the firmament, gave it the higheſt place of the univerſe, divided it from the reſt, encompaſſed it, as it were, with chryſtal, and temper'd the air with ſo gentle a mixture of humidity, as might naturally diſſolve into ſhowers, for the watering and refreſhing of the earth, to make it fruitful.

Ver. 9, &c. ON the third day God ſettled the earth, ſurrounding it with the ſea; and the ſame day it brought forth plants with their ſeeds, after their reſpective kinds.

Ver. 14. ON the fourth day he placed the ſun, the moon, and the other ſtars for an ornament in the heavens; regulating their motions, and their courſes, in ſuch a manner, as to mark out times and ſeaſons.

Ver. 20. ON the fifth day he created the fiſh that ſwim in the water, and the birds that fly in the air, and ſent them forth in couples, that they might increaſe and multiply, every creature according to its kind.

Ver. 24. ON the ſixth day God created all ſorts of four-footed beaſts, male and female; and the ſame day alſo he made man; ſo that according Ver. 26. to Moſes, in ſix days God made the world, and all that therein is.

Gen. ii. 2. GOD reſted on the ſeventh day, and ceaſed from his labours. This is the reaſon that we do no work upon that day; but give it the name of ſabbath, which word in the Hebrew language betokens reſt.

MOSES, after the ſeventh day, employ'd his thoughts in explaining the works and offices of nature; beginning with the creation of man, after this manner; "God, ſays he, formed Ver. 7. "man of the duſt of the ground, and breathed "into him the breath of life; ſo that he be- "came a living ſoul." He ſays further, that this man was call'd Adam, which in Hebrew ſignifies * red, becauſe the earth which he was made of, in the virginal perfection of it, is of that colour.

AFTER this, God commanded all living Ver. 19. creatures, male and female, to appear before Adam, who called them all by diſtinct names; and the names he gave them at that time they bear to this day.

ADAM was all this while alone, and uneaſy Ver. 21. in that condition, for want of a ſuitable companion; there being none as yet provided for him, when all the reſt of the creatures enjoyed themſelves in pairs; ſo that caſting him into a deep ſleep, God took a rib out of him, and made a woman of it, which he no ſooner ſaw afterward, but he knew, and acknowledged her to be part of himſelf. Now in the Hebrew they call a woman Iſſa, but this woman was called Eva, that is to ſay, the mother Chap. iii. 20. of all living.

MOSES ſays further alſo, that God planted The planting to the caſtward a moſt delicious garden, abound- of paradiſe, ing with all ſorts of fruit-trees; and among Ver. 8. the reſt, the tree of life, and the tree of knowledge of good and evil.

IN this garden he placed Adam and Eve, Adam put and committed the keeping and dreſſing of it into it, ibid. to their care. It was watered and encompaſſed by a large river that divided itſelf into The four riſour ſtreams or channels. The name of the firſt vers of paraiſ Piſon, (which ſignifies fulneſs or inunda- diſe, Ver. 10. tion;) the Greeks call it Ganges, and it takes its courſe into India, and ſo empties itſelf into the ſea. The ſecond and the third are Euphrates and Tigris; the former in our tongue is Phora, (that is to ſay, diſperſion, or a flower,) the other we call Diglath, (which ſignifies as much as narrow and rapid,) and theſe two diſcharge themſelves into the Red-ſea. The name of the fourth is Gihon, which divides Egypt. The Greeks call it Nile, and it ſignifies in our language, coming from the eaſt.

Now Adam and Eve had liberty to eat of The forbidall the fruits of the garden, ſave only that of den fruit, the tree of knowledge, which God command- Ver. 17. ed them not to taſte of, upon pain of death. There was, as yet, a perfect harmony among all the creatures; and the ſerpent liv'd in a kind of familiarity with Adam and Eve; but out of an envy to the bleſſed ſtate of their condition, in caſe of their continuing obedient to God's command, and knowing full well on the other hand the miſery which would befal them in caſe of their diſobedience, he tempted the woman to a taſte of the forbidden The ſerpent fruit; and to enflame her curioſity, told her tempts the that it had a ſecret inherent virtue, to endue woman to her, upon the eating of it, with the knowledge diſobedience, of good and evil, and to make her as happy Gen. iii. 5. as God himſelf. Thus the ſerpent ſeduced the woman into a violation of God's command; and the woman was ſo well pleaſed with the delicious taſte of the fruit, that ſhe did not only eat of it herſelf, but recommended it to her husband too, who yielded to her perſuaſion. By this time they perceived that they were both naked, the virtue of this fruit having open'd their underſtanding, and ſeeking for a covering, they wove fig-leaves together, to hide their nakedneſs, accounting themſelves happier than before, by this new diſcovery of what they wanted.

Adam hides himſelf, ver. 8.

AFTER this, God enter'd into the garden, when Adam, who had free acceſs to him before his tranſgreſſion, out of a conſciouſneſs of his ſin, withdrew, and hid himſelf. So God call'd to Adam, and asked him, "How it came to paſs, "that he, who had taken ſo much delight but "lately, to preſent himſelf before his maker, "ſhould now run away and hide himſelf from "him in ſuch a confuſion?" Adam's guilt left him not one word to ſay for himſelf, and ſo God went on ſpeaking to him after this manner; "There was not any thing that your "heart could deſire, to make your life free, "eaſy, pleaſant, and happy, that I had not "provided for you ready to your hand, both "for uſe and delight, and without any care "or labour on your part, or the inconvenien-"cies of old age to interrupt your enjoyments. "But ſince you have ſlighted my commands, "and that your conſcience leaves you nothing "to ſay for yourſelf, your days ſhall be cut "ſhort, and old age ſhall come upon you ſpec-"dily." Adam palliated the matter as well as he could, begg'd pardon, and laid the blame upon his wife, alledging it was ſhe that miſled him: and the woman caſt it upon the ſerpent. Whereupon, as a puniſhment for Adam's ſuffering his wife to impoſe upon him, God curſed the ground, declaring, that from that time forward, it ſhould never bring forth fruit more, but what men ſhould extort from it by labour, and the ſweat of their brows, and that it ſhould not always anſwer their expectations neither. As for Eve's being firſt deluded by the ſerpent, and afterwards drawing Adam into the ſame ſnare, her ſentence was, "In ſorrow "to bring forth children;" and for the puniſhment of the ſerpent's malice, God took from him the benefit of ſpeech, put venom under his tongue, condemn'd him to the loſs of his feet, to crawl upon his belly, and declared him the enemy of mankind; and commanded Eve alſo to tread upon his head, both as the fountain of all our woes, and as the part where he moſt eaſily receives a mortal wound. After the pronouncing of theſe penalties, God remov'd Adam and Eve out of the garden into another place.

Of Cain and Abel, Gen. iv. 1.

ADAM and Eve had two ſons; the name of the elder was Cain, which word by interpretation ſignifies poſſeſſion or acquiſition. The ſecond was Abel, which ſignifies affliction or mourning. They had daughters alſo: The two brothers were of quite different humours; for Abel was a righteous man, and a keeper of ſheep, who led a virtuous life, and in all his actions and intentions had God in his eye. But Cain, on the contrary, was a wicked and profligate man, the firſt who applied himſelf to tillage and agriculture; and was, in ſhort, ſo full of avarice and malice, that upon the following account he murder'd his own brother. The two brethren having agreed upon a ſacrifice to the Lord, Cain brought an offering of the fruits of the ground; but Abel's offering was of the milk and firſtlings of his flock: The latter, as it conſiſted of the pure bounty and voluntary production of nature, was moſt acceptable to God, becauſe it ſeem'd to proceed from a natural ſincerity and unfeigned obedience to his divine will; whereas the other, being forced by art and induſtry, carried with it the appearance of a mercenary oblation, rather than a homage of good-will. Whereupon Cain, being highly provoked at the preference which the divine creator had given to his younger brother's offering, fell upon him, and ſlew him, and buried the body, in hopes of concealing the murder; but God, from whom nothing can be hid, came upon this to Cain, inquired after his brother, where he was, and why for ſeveral days paſt they had not been ſeen together, ſince it was uſual for them conſtantly to be converſant with one another. This ſtruck Cain with confuſion and amazement, inſomuch that at firſt he did not know what to ſay, but recollecting himſelf, he anſwer'd, that his brother, indeed, had been a ſtranger to him for ſome time, and that he was at a loſs how to account for the reaſon of his abſence. Upon this God urged the matter ſtill cloſer to him; to which he had the inſolence to reply, that he was neither his brother's keeper, nor of his council. Upon this expoſtulation and affront, God was pleaſed to charge him downright with his brother's murder, telling him how wonderful a thing it was, that he ſhould not be able to give any account of the perſon whom he had inhumanly murdered. The fact was no longer to be denied, but yet upon Cain's ſacrifice and ſubmiſſion, God was ſo far pacified, as to remit the immediate juſtice of blood for blood; but he was pleaſed, however, to pronounce him and his poſterity accurſed to the ſeventh generation, and to baniſh him and his wife out of their native land into the wide world. Cain was not a little terrified at this ſentence, for fear of the miſchiefs which might befal him in his wanderings; but to ſecure him from all danger, both from man or beaſt, God ſet a mark upon him to know him by, and ſo commanded him to be gone.

CAIN and his wife departed accordingly, and after a tedious travel through ſeveral countries, they at length arrived at Nais, where they ſettled their abode, and had divers children; but ſo far was this chaſtiſement from reforming Cain, that he rather grew more and more wicked, abandoning himſelf to his luſts, and all manner of villainy, without any regard to common juſtice. He enriched himſelf by rapine and violence, and made choice of the vileſt and moſt profligate monſters of mankind for his companions, of whom he became ring-leader, inſtructing them in the very myſtery of their own profeſſion. He corrupted the ſimplicity and and plain-dealing of former times with a novel invention of weights and meaſures, and exchanged the innocence of that primitive generoſity and candour for the new tricks of policy and craft. He was the firſt that invaded the common liberties of mankind by bounds and incloſures; the firſt that built a city, fortified and peopled it, with his domeſticks and dependants, whom he confined to live together in a body, which city was called Enoch, after the name of his eldeſt ſon.

Cain the inventor of weights and meaſures, and the firſt encloſer.

Gen. iv. 13. Now Enoch begot Irad, Irad begot Mehujael, Mehujael begot Methuſael, and Methuſael begot Lemech, who had ſeventy ſeven children by two wives, Zillah and Adah. By Adah he had Jabal, the firſt who dwelt in tents, and pleaſed himſelf with a paſtoral life and employment. Jubal, his brother, gave up his mind to muſick; inſomuch that the Pſaltery and Harp were of his invention. By his wife Zillah, he had Tubalcain, a valiant captain, and a great warrior, who by his military reputation was enabled to live both in pleaſure and plenty. He was the firſt that wrought in braſs, and had a daughter whoſe name was Naamah. As for Lemech, who ſaw as far as any man into the courſe and methods of divine juſtice, he could not but find himſelf concerned in the proſpect of that dreadful judgment which threaten'd the whole family for the murder of Abel, and under that apprehenſion, he diſcloſed his ſentiments to his two wives.

Jubal, v. 21.

Tubalcain, ver. 22.

Ver. 23.

WHILE Adam was yet living the curſed race of Cain grew every day more and more wicked, and made it their glory, not only to imitate the fouleſt examples of paſt ages, but alſo to outdo them. Their delight was in war and ſpoil, or where any of them happen'd not to be polluted with the guilt of human blood, they excelled in pride, avarice, or ſome other vice of as black a nature.

BUT to return to the ſubject in hand: After the murder of Abel and the baniſhment of Cain, Adam, who was now two hundred and thirty years of age, out of an earneſt deſire of iſſue, applied himſelf to the peopling of the world. He lived ſeven hundred years after this, and ſo died, leaving many children behind him, and one among the reſt whom he called Seth. It would be too tedious to go through all the family, beſides foreign to my purpoſe, ſo that I ſhall only have occaſion to mention Seth. This Seth was brought up under the tuition of his father, and ſo ſoon as ever he was able to diſtinguiſh betwixt good and evil, he delivered himſelf up wholly to the ſtudy of virtue. He proved a wonderful man, and his children were the lively images of ſo excellent a father. They were all of them well bred, and well diſpoſed. They lived happily and peaceably with reſpect to the publick, and in perfect harmony one with another. Theſe were the firſt who made their obſervations upon the motions of the heavens, the courſes and influences of the ſtars, and having been foretold by Adam of an univerſal deluge and conflagration to come, they erected two pillars, one of brick and the other of ſtone, which they were ſure would be a proof, one or the other of them, againſt either fire or water. Upon theſe pillars they engraved the memorials of their diſcoveries and inventions, there to remain for the benefit of ages to come; and leſt the tradition of the ſcience itſelf ſhould be loſt for want of a record, this they did, and their foreſight was not in vain; for it is reported that the ſtone pillar is yet to be ſeen in Syria to this very day.

The Wickedneſs of the World, and God's Judgment upon it. Noah's Ark. The ten Generations from Adam to the Flood. The Beginning and Progreſs of the Flood. Beroſus, Damaſcen, &c. write of the Ark and Deluge. Noah's Prayer. God's Covenant with Noah. The Rainbow a Token of it.

FOR ſeven generations men lived in the exerciſe of virtue, and in the love and fear of one God the Lord of all things; but from thence forward they degenerated from the ways of their fore-fathers, leading their lives without any reverence or regard either to religious duties, or human juſtice, and taking more pains to tranſcend one another in wickedneſs, than they had formerly done to make themſelves eminent for goodneſs. This abominable impiety drew down the wrath of heaven upon them, and the angels* of God mixing with the women, begot an inſolent race, not much unlike that of the Giants in the Greek fables, contemners of all good, and overbearing right with power. Noah took thoſe impious extravagancies ſo to heart, that after ſeveral trials, both by his counſel and authority, to bring them to a reformation of their lives, and an amendment of their manners, and no good to be done at laſt upon a generation ſo incorrigibly obſtinate, and abandon'd to their luſts, and finding himſelf and family in manifeſt danger of ſome mortal violence for his good-will, he departed out of the land himſelf and all his people. This good man was highly in the favour of the Lord for his righteouſneſs; but the corruption and iniquity of the age cried out ſo loud to Heaven for vengeance, that God determined within himſelf, utterly to deſtroy that generation of mankind, and to ſupply another and a better race of men in their ſtead; but ſo as to ſhorten the term of man's life from what it was before, and to bring it within the compaſs of one hundred and twenty years. The earth after this was covered with water, and the dry land turned effectually into a ſea, which ſwallowed up all fleſh living; Noah alone excepted, who eſcaped the univerſal deluge by making uſe of the means which God had expreſly directed and appointed him for his preſervation; that is to ſay, God having precautioned him of this terrible judgment to come, order'd him to build an ark of four ſtories, the length of it three hundred cubits, the breadth fifty, and the height of it thirty; which he did accordingly, and ſo went into it with his wife and children, and their wives; taking along with him of all living creatures by two and two, in pairs, male, and female, and of ſome ſeven couples for the conſervation of the kind, having firſt laid in all proviſions neceſſary for the ſubſiſtence of himſelf and them. der was to take care that the roof, and the ſides of it ſhould be made ſtrong enough to reſiſt the violence of the approaching tempeſt; which was alſo done: and by this contrivance he and his family were ſaved. Now Noah was the tenth in ſucceſſion by a direct line from Adam, being the ſon of Lamech, Lamech of Methuſelah, Methuſelah of Enoch, Enoch of Jared, Jared of Maleleel, (who had divers brothers,) Maleleel of Cainan, Cainan of Enos, Enos of Seth, and Seth the ſon of Adam.

Noah's genealogy, Gen. vi.

THIS deluge happened in the ſecond month, which the Macedonians call Dius, the Hebrews Marſonane, according to the Egyptian diviſion of the year. Moſes in his computation makes Niſan, which is Xanthicus, the firſt month, becauſe it was in this that he brought the Iſraelites out of Egypt, and he obſerves the ſame account in the dating of all things which concern the worſhip of God. But for the matter of fairs and markets, trade, and civil buſineſs, he left the account as he found it, without making any alteration. Noah was ſix hundred years of age at the time of this inundation. Moſes reckons that the firſt fall of rain toward the drowning of the world, began on the 27th day of the month beforeſaid, and in the year of the world 1656. This is according to the calculation of holy writ, which gives a very exact account of the birth and death of the illuſtrious men of thoſe times.

The time of the deluge.

Gen. viii. 6.

ADAM was nine hundred and thirty years old when he died, and one hundred and thirty when he begot Seth. Seth was one hundred and five when he begot Enos, who departed this life at the age of nine hundred and twelve, leaving all to the care of his ſon Cainan, whom he had begotten in the nintieth year of his age, and he lived to the age of nine hundred and ten, and was ſucceeded by his ſon Maleleel whom he begot at the age of ſeventy: this Maleleel died at eight hundred and ninety five, and he left his ſon Jared to ſucceed him, whom he begot at the age of ſixty five, and at nine hundred and ſixty nine he departed this life. He was ſucceeded by his ſon Enoch, who was born when his father was one hundred and ſixty two years old, and after three hundred and ſixty five years he went to God, and was no more ſeen, which is the reaſon that there is no record extant of what became of him. Methuſalah was born to Enoch in the ſixty fifth year of his age, and at the age of one hundred and ſeven he had a ſon born, which he called Lamech, to whom he delivered up the government, which he had held for nine hundred and ſixty nine years. But when Lamech had been ſeven hundred and ſeven years in the exerciſe of that power, he transferred his commiſſion to his ſon Noah, who was born to Lamech at the age of one hundred and eighty two, and was nine hundred and fifty years in the adminiſtration. So that putting all theſe together, computing upon Noah's age of ſix hundred years at the time of the deluge, it amounts to the juſt number of one thouſand ſix hundred and fifty ſix.* But we are not ſo much to conſider the end of theſe men, as the birth of them; for they lived to ſee many generations out of their own Loins.

The line of the parriarchs Gen. v.

THE time being now come, and the ſignal given, God commanded the clouds to pour forth their waters, which they did in a violent rain of forty days continuance; till they were fifteen cubits deep above the higheſt parts of the earth, and no place left for any poſſibilty of ſafety or retreat. The waters after this began by little and little to abate, and in one hundred and fifty days more, on the 27th day of the ſeventh month, the ark was left aground upon the top of a certain mountain in Armenia. Noah perceiving this, open'd a window and perceiving the appearance of land in ſeveral places round about him, found his heart a little more at eaſe, in hopes that the worſt was now paſt. The water ſtill decreaſing more and more, Noah ſent out a raven ſome few days after, to learn the ſtate of the deluge in other places, whether or no he might ſafely venture himſelf upon the ground; but the raven finding all in a flood ſtill, returned to the ark. Whereupon Noah reſpited his enquiry for ſeven days, and then ſent out a dove to diſcover what condition things were in abroad, which ſoon after returned to him again all dirty, and with an olive-branch in her mouth, giving to underſtand that the danger was now over. So that at the end of ſeven days more he turned out all the creatures, went forth himſelf with his wife and children, and after ſacrificing to the Lord, made merry and rejoiced with his family. The Armenians called this place Apobaterion, or the place of deſcent. We read of this deluge and the ark, in all the writers of Barbarian hiſtories, as in Beroſus the Chaldæan for one, who, ſpeaking of this flood, writes to this effect: "They ſay that there "are ſome remainders of this veſſel to be ſeen "upon the mountains of the Cordyæans in "Armenia to this very day, and that ſeveral "people living upon the place ſcrape the pitch "off from the planks as a rarity, and carry it "about them for an amulet." Hieronymus the Egyptian, in his Phœnician Antiquities, Manaſeas, and a great many others ſay ſomewhat of this matter too: But Nicolaus of Damaſcus, in v. 96. of his hiſtory, ſpeaks to this purpoſe: "In the province of Minyas in Armenia, there "is a high mountain, called Baris, to which "place there fled a great many people, as the "ſtory goes, in the time of a deluge for ſanc-"tuary. There is a tradition alſo of a certain "man in a veſſel that ſtruck upon the top of "this mountain, and that ſeveral pieces of "the timber were to be ſeen there a long time "after." This perhaps might be the man that Moſes makes mention of.

Now Noah in a perſuaſion that God had doomed mankind to deſtruction, lay under a dreadful apprehenſion, for fear of the ſame judgment over again; and that it would actually end in an anniverſary inundation: ſo that he preſented himſelf before the Lord with ſacrifices and prayers: "Humbly beſeeching "God in Mercy to preſerve the order of the "world in its firſt frame; to puniſh the guil-"ty, and ſpare the lives of the innocent, and "not to proceed with rigour for the wic-"kedneſs of ſome particular perſons to the "deſtruction of the whole; for otherwiſe, the

ELEVATION OF THE TOWER OF BABEL.

John Harris Sculp

" ſurvivors of this calamity would be more " wretched than thoſe who were waſhed away " in a common ruin; if after having ſuffer'd " horror of thought, and the terror of ſo diſ- " mal a ſpectacle, they ſhould only be deli- " vered from one calamity to be confounded " by another. Wherefore he earneſtly beſought " God to receive his prayers, and his ſacrifice; " to turn away his wrath from the earth, and " the inhabitants thereof, that they might " till it, and reap the fruits of his bounty as " formerly; build cities, and entertain them- " ſelves with all the comforts and conveniен- " cies they enjoyed before the flood." He pray'd alſo for length of days to himſelf and his poſterity; and that the children to come might live up to the Age of their anceſtors.

THE piety and righteouſneſs of this good man prevail'd ſo far with Almighty God, that he hearkened to his requeſt, and told him, that it was the wickedneſs of the world which drew that judgment upon their own heads, and that he himſelf was not in reality the author of it; for he would never have given them life at firſt, with a deſign or deſire to take it away again; and it were much better not to give it at all, than to give only to take again. But, ſays he, they have forced me upon a vengeance by a violation of all the holy duties they owe me; and yet to ſhew you that I am not inexorable, eſpecially upon your mediation, I promiſe you that I will never deal with ſinners ſo ſeverely again for the future; and therefore what ſtorms and tempeſts ſoever may be raiſed, ſet your heart at reſt, for you are out of danger of another deluge. One thing I poſitively require and command, keep your hands clear of human blood, and puniſh murder with the utmoſt ſeverity, wherever you find it. As for other creatures, whether they live upon the earth, or ſwim in the water, or fly in the air, you are the lords and maſters of them, and may diſpoſe of them as you think fit, ſaving only as to the blood, for in the blood is the life of the creature; and for your ſecurity now, that the arrows of my diſpleaſure ſhall never ſtrike mankind again in the like dreadful manner, I will ſet my bow in the air for a token of my covenant. Now the rainbow with them is taken for God's bow. After theſe commands and promiſes God departed.

The rainbow a token of it, c. ix. 13.

NOAH liv'd in happineſs and at eaſe three hundred and fifty years after the flood, ſo that he was nine hundred and fifty when he died. Let not the vaſt difference betwixt the ordinary term of a man's life before the deluge, and the narrow ſcantling we find it reduced to at this day, be made uſe of as an argument to bring the credit of the tradition in queſtion, as if becauſe we ourſelves are ſhort-liv'd, our fore-fathers muſt of neceſſity have been ſo too. In the infancy of the world, when men liv'd in obedience to their maker, it pleaſed Almighty God to beſtow the bleſſing of * long life upon the work of his own hands; beſides that, the wholſomeneſs of their food, and their moderation in eating and drinking, did very much conduce to that end; and, moreover, providence found it neceſſary for the ſtudy and advancement of virtue, and for the improvement of geometry and aſtronomy, which required at leaſt ſix hundred years, (according to the computation of the great year,) for the making and perfecting of obſervations. I have for my juſtification, the concurrent teſtimonies of all the great antiquaries that ever meddled in hiſtory, either Greek or Barbarian, as Manetho in his Egyptian chronicle, Beroſus in the hiſtory of Chaldæa, † Mochus, Heſtiæus, Hieronymus the Egyptian, that have given us the ſtory of Phœnicia; and ſo for Heſiod, Hecatæus, Hellanicus, Acuſilaus, Ephorus, and Nicolaus, they do all agree, that in the primitive ſtate of the world ſome men liv'd to the age even of a thouſand years. But every man is at liberty to think of this matter as he pleaſes.

The great year.

CHAP. V.

Noah's three Sons, Shem, Japheth, and Ham, plant in Sennaar. Deſign to build a Tower, which was ruined by a Confuſion of Tongues.

NOAH had three ſons, Shem, Japheth, and Ham, who were born about an hundred years before the flood. Theſe were the firſt who had courage enough to venture from the mountains to inhabit the plains, and brought their offspring along with them, who, till they were animated by the example of their fathers, durſt not quit the hills, for fear of a ſecond deluge. They gave the name of Sennaar to the firſt place they planted in: but God in his wiſdom ordered them to ſpread and divide themſelves into colonies, as the moſt proper method both for peopling the world, and preſerving men in peace one with another; and to the end likewiſe that they might take their poſſeſſions at large, and enjoy more abundantly the fruits of the earth. Now theſe people being an ignorant and a ſtubborn generation, diſregarded the divine appointment, and continued ſtill in the ſame place, till they were overtaken by a judgment from Heaven, that made them ſufficiently ſenſible of their error by their puniſhment. They came in proceſs of time to be numerous and ſtrong, and God once again admoniſhed and directed them as before, to diſperſe themſelves into ſeveral plantations; but they perſevered nevertheleſs in their diſobedience, not only forgetting the author of all the bleſſings and good things they were made partakers of, but aſſuming to themſelves the glory of their ſucceſſes in all the greatneſs they had acquired; and which was worſt of all, interpreting the advice of ſeparating themſelves to be rather a ſnare than a favour, and a mere trick of common policy, firſt to diſunite and weaken them, and then to bring them under the yoke of an oppreſſion.

Noah's three ſons, Gen. x. 1.

They plant in Sennaar, xi. 2.

THE chief incendiary that animated the people to this proud and inſolent contempt of God, was Nimrod, the grandſon of Ham, who was the ſon of Noah, a man fierce and valiant, but of ſo extravagant a vanity, that he would be often boaſting, that he lay under no obligation at all to the goodneſs of God for the dignity of his preſent ſtate and reputation, but to the power of his own courage and virtue. This was his way of insinuating himself into a tyranny, not in the least doubting but the people might be easily brought to apostatize from God, if they could but first be prevailed upon to chuse him for their governor. And left the dread of another inundation should deter them from it, he had an expedient in his head, he said, that would secure them from any damage of that nature. His project was the erecting a tower to such a height, that it should be impossible for the waters ever to reach the top of it: beside the revenge he meditated over and above, for the loss of those who perished in the flood.

The multitude came so unanimously into this scheme of Nimrod, that they began to look upon it as a thing below the dignity of men, to live in subjection to God; and upon this they immediately apply'd themselves to work, and prosecuted their design with the utmost vigour and resolution. The height of it was to be prodigious, and the infinite number of labourers advanced it, even beyond imagination. The breadth and thickness of it, being wonderfully firm and strong, appeared of such prodigious bulk, that it made the height of it seem less. The materials were burnt brick, cemented in the joints with a pitchy matter to make it proof against the waters. The madness of these people was highly provoking, especially considering the warning they had had in the example of their forefathers, who were all swallowed up in an universal flood for their wickedness. But God was graciously pleased however, not to proceed to the extremity of extinguishing mankind any more, for their contemptuous trangressions, but chose rather to punish them with such a confusion of tongues, that they should not be able to understand one another. The place where this tower was erected, is at this day called Babylon, from the confusion of tongues, as aforesaid; Babel in Hebrew signifying as much as confusion. Now as to this tower, and this confusion of tongues, the Sibyl speaks in the following manner. "* At a certain time, says she, when the "whole world spake the same language, the "people of those days gathered together, "and raised a mighty tower, which they car-"ried up to so extravagant a height, that it "looked as if they had proposed the scaling "of heaven from the top of it: but the Gods "let a hurricane of winds loose upon it, which "with a violent blast beat it down to the "ground; the builders being also judicially "struck with an utter forgetfulness of their "native tongue, and a new unknown lan-"guage substituted instead of it, wherein not "one man of them understood his fellow." As to Sennaar itself, Hestiæus gives this hint; "The priests who survived the general deso-"lation, preserved the holy things and orna-"ments that were dedicated to the worship "and service of Jupiter the Conqueror, and "carried them off to Sennaar of Babylon."

* This we have in the Sibylline Oracles now extant. See Dr. Beveridge's Codex, Can. Vindic. c. 14.

CHAP. VI.

The Sons of Noah disperse themselves all over the Face of the Earth.

The peopling the world, Gen. ii. 9.

UPON this diversity of tongues, the people were forced to disperse themselves up and down into colonies, and so to plant and inhabit, some upon the sea-coasts, others in the continent; some in one place, some in another, according to the lot which God in his wisdom and providence had assigned them; for the whole world, in short, was to be more or less peopled. Men afterwards came by degrees to the use and knowledge of navigation, so far at least as to make boats, and transport themselves into islands: they gave appellations to the places where they liv'd, many of them retaining to this very day the names of their first planters. Some, 'tis true, are alter'd, others only disguised under Greek derivations, to make them more familiar and intelligible to the people thereabouts; for the Greeks being possess'd of those countries, drew to themselves in succeeding ages, as the first founders and proprietors, the honour of that primitive greatness, imposing upon them, as they thought fit, not only names but laws also, and customs, and manners to their own liking.

Several places bear the names of the first planters.

CHAP. VII.

Several Nations took their Names from their several Founders. The Race of Noah down to Jacob, and the Places they inhabited.

The sons of Noah, Gen. x. Japheth.

NOW the sons of Noah had children, who, for the honour of their memory, call'd the people, wherever they got possession, by their own names; as Japheth the son of Noah had seven sons, who planted themselves in Asia, from the mountains of Taurus and Amanus, to the river Tanais; in Europe, to Gades: and the places being not as yet peopled, wherever they got footing, as aforesaid, they called the countries after their own names. Gomar was the founder of those that were Gomarites, called by the Greeks at this day † Galatians, or Gauls. Magog was the head of the Magogians, by the Greeks Scythians; Javan and Madæus were two other sons of Japheth; from the latter came the Madæans, or the Medes; from the other the Ionians, and the whole race of Greeks. Thobel was the founder of the Thobelians, (at this day the Iberians or Spaniards;) from Mesches the Meschinians, called afterwards Cappadocians, but not without some footsteps yet of their original in the town of Mazaca, which comes near the antient name. Thires was the head and governor of the Thiræans, so called from his own name, which the Greeks changed afterwards for Thracians. These are the nations that were first planted by the seven sons of Japheth.

† See the Diatriba de Noæ in Italiam adventu, by E. Dickinson.

Gomar again had three sons: Aschanaxes, from whom came the Aschanaxians, (by the Greeks now called Rheginians:) Riphates, the head of the Riphateans, (now Paphlagonians;) and Thygrammes, from whom came the Thygrammeans, (whom the Greeks call Phrygians.) Gen. x. 3.

Javan also, the son of Japheth, had ‡ three sons: Alisas the first, from whom the Alisæans (now called Æolians) derive both their name and original. So in like manner from Tharsus the Tharsians, (afterwards called Cilicians,) as appears by the celebrating of the city Tarsus with a mark of preference above all others, only turning the first letter Θ into a T. The island that we at this day call Cyprus, was at first called Chethima, from Chethimus the first possessor ſeſſor of it. From hence it is that not only all iſlands, but all places bordering upon the ſea, are by the Hebrews called Chethim; and there is a town in the iſle of Cyprus, which at this day is called Citium by thoſe that for the ſound ſake will make Greek of every thing; and it ſeems to have ſome affinity with Chethim; all theſe nations had the deſcendants of Japheth for their heads. But I have one thing yet to ſay before I proceed any further, which perhaps the Greeks take no notice of; that is to ſay, they have got a way of changing names to pleaſe the ear, and make the word ſound with a leſs harſh and more agreeable cadence; but for our people they neither allow nor practice any ſuch thing. The Greeks have turned Noe into Nochos; but we keep ſteddy to the ſame form and ſyllables, without ſo much as varying the very termination.

Gen. x. 6. THE ſons of Ham ſettled themſelves in Syria, and the country adjoining to the mountains of Amanus and Libanus; ſtretching the bounds of their juriſdiction as far as the ſea-coaſt, and calling all the places under their dominions by what names they pleaſed; but a great many of them are to us utterly loſt and forgot, and others ſo corrupted and tranſformed, that they are no longer to be known; only the Ethiopians have ſtood the ſtreſs of time and accidents, without any alteration. Chus, one of the four ſons of Ham was their founder and governor, and they bear the name of Chuſians to this day, not only among themſelves, but all Aſia over. The Meſreans alſo yet keep their old name; for Egypt, quite through the country, is called Meſrim ſtill, and the Egyptians, Meſreans. Phutes governed in Libya, and gave the whole nation the name of Phutians. And divers Greek hiſtorians give us an account of a river in Mauritania of this name, and of a country bordering upon it which is called Phute; but the name has been ſince changed by Libys, one of the ſons of Meſraim. How it came to be called Africa we ſhall ſhew hereafter. Chanaan, the fourth ſon of Ham, gave his name to the country of the Chanaanites, ſince called by the name of Judea.

Ver. 7. THEY had all children; but Chus, the eldeſt ſon of Ham, had ſix ſons: Sabas the head of the Sabeans. Evilas, of the Evilcans now called Getulians. Sabbathes of the Sabbathenians, with the Greeks Aſtabarrians. Sabactas, of the Sabactenians. Romus was prince of the Romeans, and had two ſons, Judadas and Sabas. The former gave the name and original to the Judadeans in the Weſtern part of Ethiopia, the other tranſmitted his name to the Sabeans. As for Nimrod, the ſixth ſon of Chus, he continued among the Babylonians, ſeiz'd the government by force, and moſt tyrannically oppreſſed the people, as is already ſet forth.

MESRAIM was the father of eight ſons, who made themſelves maſters of the whole tract of land betwixt Gaza and Egypt. Philiſtim was one of the eight, and left his name to his country, that part of it at leaſt which the Greeks call Paleſtine. Labim conſtituted a colony, and gave it the name of Libya: but for the other ſix, that is to ſay, Ludim, Anamim, Nedem, Phetroſim, Cheſlem, and Chepthorim, we know little more of them than their names, their cities and plantations having been deſtroyed in the Ethiopick war, of which in its proper place.

CANAAN was the father of eleven ſons. Sidon built a city in Phœnicia, which the Greeks call Sidon, after his name. Amath was the founder of Amathe, a place yet in being, and by the inhabitants called Amathine; though the Macedonians have changed it for Epiphania, from one of their kings. Arudeus took poſſeſſion of the iſland Aradus. Arucæus had the town of Arce upon mount Libanus. As for the other ſeven, Euæus, Chetæus, Jebuſæus, [Eudæus,] Sinæus, Samaræus, and Gergeſæus, we have nothing more of them in the holy ſcriptures than their names; the Hebrews having razed all their cities for the reaſons following: Ver. 15, 16, 17, 18

So ſoon as the earth began to return to its former condition again after the flood, Noah fell to cultivating the ground, planting a vineyard, and gathering and preſſing his grapes in their due ſeaſon; whereby he became the firſt inventor of the uſe of wine: but one day after an oblation to God of the firſt-fruits of his vineyard, he drank ſo liberally of the juice, that he laid himſelf down quite ſenſeleſs, and fell aſleep, with his nakedneſs in a very indecent manner uncovered. His youngeſt ſon ſeeing his father thus ſhamefully expoſed, called his brothers in deriſion to make ſport with the ſpectacle; but they, out of a pious reverence to a parent, caſt a covering over him. Noah came ſoon after to be ſenſible of what had paſſed, and bleſſed his other children for the good office they had done him; but with a bitter imprecation upon the poſterity of Ham; and this malediction was followed upon them with a divine vengeance; but of this hereafter, only I muſt obſerve, that Ham in his own perſon eſcaped the curſe out of Noah's tenderneſs and reſpect to the nearneſs of his blood.

SHEM, another of the three ſons of Noah, had five ſons, and the whole tract of Aſia was theirs, from Euphrates to the Indian ſea. From Elam came the Elamites, and from them the Perſians derive their original. Aſſur was the founder of Ninive, and thence came the Aſſyrians, a rich and a powerful people. From Arphaxed came the Arphaxadeans, or our Chaldeans. From Aram came the Arameans, whom the Greeks call Syrians. And from Lud came the Luddians, or our Lydians.

The poſterity of Shem, Gen. x. 22.

ARAM had four ſons; Uz was the founder of Trachonitis, and Damaſcus, which lies betwixt Paleſtine and Cœle-Syria: Hull had Armenia: Gether was prince of the Bactrians; and Meſas of the Meſoneans, whoſe whole country at preſent bears the name of the camp of Paſinus.

Aram, ver. 3.

SALES the ſon of Arphaxad was the father of Heber, according to whoſe name the Jews were antiently called Hebrews. Heber begot Jucta and Phalec: The latter was born at the time of dividing the land, (Phalec in Hebrew ſignifying Partition.) Jucta the ſon of Heber had children; Elmodad, Saleph, Azermoth, Eiraes, Edoram, Uzal, Declas, Ebal, Abiamel, Sabeus, Ophir, Euilath, Jobab. gat Thares the father of Abraham, the tenth generation from Noah. He was born about two hundred ninety two years after the flood. Thares was in the seventieth year of his age when he begat Abraham, Nachor one hundred and twenty when he begat Thares, Serug about a hundred thirty two when he begat Nachor, Ragaus one hundred and thirty when he begat Serug, and Phalec about the same age when he begat Ragaus, Heber one hundred thirty four when he begat Phalec, Sales one hundred and thirty when he begat Heber, Arphaxad one hundred thirty five when he had Sales. And this Arphaxad the son of Shem, and the grandson of Noah, was born * two years after the flood.

Nachor and Aran, Abraham's brothers, ver. 27.

ABRAHAM had two brothers, Nachor and Haran, the latter died at Ur in Chaldæa, where there is to be seen at this day a sepulchral monument erected in honour of his memory. He left behind him his son Lot, and two daughters, Sarah and Melcha: Nachor took the latter to wife, and Abraham took Sarah.

Thares the father of Abraham, ver. 32.

THARES the father of Abraham had contracted such an aversion to Chaldæa, for the loss of his son Haran, that he went away and all his family with him to Charran in Mesopotamia, where Thares died, and was buried after he had lived two hundred and fifty years †. The life of man was now shortened, and God soon after reduced it to the scantling of a hundred and twenty years, which was the precise age of Moses himself.

The children of Nachor.

NACHOR had by his wife Melcha eight sons, Uz, Baux, Camuel, Chazad, Azaus, Pheldas, Jadelphas, and Bethuel. These were all the legitimate sons of Nachor; but Tabæus and Gaham, Tavaus and Machas, he had by Ruma his concubine. Bathuel had a daughter and a son, Rebecca and Laban.

CHAP. VIII.

Abraham goes into Canaan, Gen. xii. 5.

ABRAHAM having no legitimate issue of his own, adopted Lot, the son of his brother Aram, and the brother of his wife Sarah. In the seventy fifth year of his age he quit Chaldæa, and removed with his family and all that appertained unto him, into the land of Chanaan, as God had commanded him, where he took up his habitation, and in God's good time left it to his posterity. He was a man his piety, resolution and wisdom.

equally wise and eloquent, of a piercing judgment, and an universal knowledge. He had the reputation of an understanding beyond other men; and as he wanted no skill, so he had the courage also to attack the most daring iniquities of the times, and by dint of his authority, as well as of his reason, to tear up false opinions in religion by the roots, and to terrify wicked men into the love and fear of that God whom they had despised. Abraham was the first who adventured to preach up the doctrine of One God, the Almighty Creator of all things in heaven and earth; and that it is to his infinite goodness, not to any power in ourselves, that we stand indebted for all the comforts and conveniencies we enjoy in this world. This he argued from the orderly course of things both at sea and land in their times and seasons, and from his observation upon the motions and influences of the sun, moon, and stars; insomuch that without an over-ruling and an administring providence to preserve and keep up the order of things, the whole frame of the universe must drop into confusion; and consequently that all we have to trust to, for matters either of pleasure, profit, or necessity, depends singly upon the good-will and bounty of the first mover: so that it is to him alone that we are to render all honour and thanksgiving, without assuming any thing to ourselves.

THE people of Chaldæa and Mesopotamia were highly enraged at him for this doctrine; so that by God's order and assistance, he convey'd himself out of Chaldæa into Chanaan, where settling his abode, he erected an altar to God, worshipped and offered sacrifice. Berosus hath a passage concerning our father Abraham, though without naming him: "In the "tenth generation (says he) after the flood "there was among the Chaldæans a certain "great and just man, and one who was fa-"mous for his celestial observations." Hecatæus hath gone further yet, in an historical discourse writ expresly upon his affairs. Nicolaus of Damascus in the fourth book of his history does also make mention of him: "Abraham "(says he) though a stranger commanded in "Damascus, to which place he came with a "numerous train from a country beyond Ba-"bylon, called Chaldæa; from whence he re-"mov'd after a short time with all his people, "and went to Chananea, now called Judea, "where he settled himself, and had a very "numerous offspring, of whom I shall speak "further in another book." But at Damascus the very name of Abraham is to this day had in great veneration; and there is a village too that yet bears the name of Abraham's habitation.

Hecatæus, and Nicolaus of Damascus.

CHAP. IX.

Upon a Famine in Chanaan, Abraham removes into Egypt; and takes Sarah along with him, where he stays a while, and then returns.

A famine in Chanaan, Gen. xii. 10. Abraham goes into Egypt, ibid.

THERE happen'd in those days a miserable famine in Chanaan; and Abraham understanding that at the same time there was a great plenty in Egypt, resolved upon a journey thither, partly to get a share in their abundance, and partly to inform himself in the opinions and sentiments of their priests, about divine matters; with an impartial desire and disposition to find out the truth, and either to give or to receive satisfaction, according to the right and reason of the subject in question. Abraham taking Sarah along with him, who was a very beautiful woman, and being informed of the unbridled lusts of the Egyptians, fell into an apprehension that the king might probably put him to death upon the account of his wife; wherefore he bethought himself of an evasion, in case of any difficulty, and to say she was his sister. Upon concerting the point betwixt themſelves, and the preſent neceſſity conſidered, they concluded to agree in the ſame tale. At his coming into Egypt, it fell out as he foreboded; for the fame of his handſome wife was preſently ſpread about, till it came to the ear of Pharaoh, the king of Egypt, who was immediately inflamed with an impatience to ſee and to enjoy this miracle of a woman that he had heard ſuch wonders of, never queſtioning but he ſhould be able to gain his foul ends upon her. But in the mean while God put a check to the progreſs of his lewd appetite, by viſiting this laſcivious prince with a plague and a ſedition both at once. In this diſtreſs Pharaoh had recourſe to his prieſts for counſel and direction, and to know what might be the ſin that brought this judgment upon him, and what the remedy. The prieſts upon ſacrificing returned him anſwer, that Heaven was diſpleaſed with him for the violence and abuſe he deſigned upon the wife of a ſtranger. This ſentence and reſolution put the king into ſuch a fright, that he immediately diſcours'd Sarah upon it with all frankneſs and reſpect, what ſhe herſelf was, and what the man was who brought her thither. She told him in ſhort the whole and the plain truth of the ſtory; whereupon Pharaoh excuſed himſelf to Abraham, that he took her for his ſiſter, not for his wife, and only deſired a fair alliance, without the leaſt thought of any ſcandalous indignity to her perſon. He made Abraham a preſent after this of a conſiderable ſum of money, and gave him a liberty of aſſociating and conferring with the moſt famous and learned men in his dominions, by which means he became better known, and conſequently more eſteemed for his excellent qualities and virtue. By the allowance of this freedom of conference and communication, Abraham had the means of obſerving all their diviſions about rites, ceremonies, and opinions, their factions and animoſities, and their reciprocal contempt and hatred one of another, and their diſagreement about religion; ſo that upon the whole matter, he made no difficulty to demonſtrate by dint of reaſon and argument, that their religion was vain and erroneous, a contradiction to itſelf, and without any foundation of truth to bottom upon. By theſe diſcourſes he gained himſelf infinite credit, not only for the ſolidity of his judgment, and an admirable felicity of elocution, but for this inſtructive talent alſo of informing and convincing his auditory both at once. He likewiſe inſtructed them in aſtronomy and arithmetick, which ſciences the Egyptians underſtood nothing of till Abraham brought them from Chaldæa into Egypt, and from thence they paſſed to the Greeks.

Abraham gave Lot the choice, contenting himſelf with what the other left, and took up his habitation in the city of Hebron, which was ſeven years older than Tanis in Egypt. Lot planted himſelf in the fields and plains that bordered upon the river Jordan, not far from Sodom; which Sodom was at that time a glorious city, but ſince laid in aſhes by divine vengeance, and ſo totally ruined, that the very memory of it is deſtroyed from off the earth. But of this we ſhall give the reaſons in their proper place.

WHILE the empire of Aſia was in the hands of the Aſſyrians, and Sodom in a condition ſo rich and populous, that five kings, viz. Ballas, Barſas, Senabar, Symobar, and the king of the Ballinians, had the adminiſtration of the government, and every king abſolute in his own territory; in thoſe days, I ſay, the Aſſyrians took the field with a mighty army, and marched againſt Sodom in four ſtrong bodies, well diſciplin'd, and commanded by brave and experienc'd officers, who after a bloody fight utterly defeated them; hereupon they impoſed a tribute upon the kings of Sodom, which they paid for twelve years; but the year following they fail'd, and forfeited. The Aſſyrians upon this advanced againſt them a ſecond time with another army as before, under the command of Amraphel, Arioch, Chodollogomor,* and Thabal; ravaged all Syria, ſubdued the race of the giants, and ſo enter'd the land of Sodom, encamping in the valley among the brimſtone-pits, which in thoſe days were very common thereabouts; but ſince the deſtruction of Sodom, that valley is turned into a lake called Aſphaltites, of which hereafter. This battle betwixt the Aſſyrians and the Sodomites was a terrible engagement; for the Sodomites were all either kill'd, or taken priſoners, of which latter number was Lot, who came to the relief of the place.

ABRAHAM had no ſooner heard the news of the Sodomites defeat, ſo many of his neighbours and friends killed and taken, and his kinſman Lot made a priſoner, but he poſted away immediately after the Aſſyrians, and the fifth night after his ſetting out, ſurprized them in their quarters near Dan, one of the heads of the river Jordan, where he found them in all the confuſion imaginable, ſome without their arms, others in bed, without the leaſt thought of an enemy; ſome drunk, ſome aſleep, and moſt of them in ſuch a condition, that they could neither fight nor fly. In this diſorder, Abraham put as many to the ſword as he could, and the next day purſued the reſt as far as Soba of Damaſcus. This therefore may ſerve for an inſtance, that it is not ſo much the number and multitude, as the valour of the combatants that gains the victory; for Abraham had but barely three hundred and eighteen of his own domesticks, and three auxiliary friends, when he routed this numerous army; and those few of the enemy that escap'd, were fain to fly home with shame and confusion. Thus Abraham return'd to his people again with victory and peace, having rescued, and set Lot and the rest of the prisoners at liberty again.

Abraham rescues Lot and his fellow-prisoners, Gen. xiv. 16.

As Abraham was upon his return home, the king of Sodom met him at a place called the Royal Plain, to congratulate his success, and there he was received by Melchisedech the king of Solyma, now called Jerusalem. Melchisedech is as much as to say, a righteous king, which certainly this prince was, having been accounted worthy by common consent to serve at the altar as a priest of the most high God. This Melchisedech treated Abraham's followers and soldiers with great bounty, hospitality, and all sorts of refreshments; inviting Abraham himself to his table, and extolling him up to the skies for so noble an atchievement, and glorifying God's holy name for the blessing of so signal a victory, in a way of thanksgiving worthy of his sacred character. Abraham also on the other hand presented Melchisedech with the tenth of the spoils he had taken, which he accepted of. Abraham made an offer of part of the booty to the king of Sodom also, whose answer was, that he only desired to have his own people again, who had been taken prisoners by the Assyrians, and were now rescued out of their hands; and for the rest, Abraham might do with it as he pleased. But Abraham excused himself from dealing upon those conditions, declaring that he was absolutely resolved to accept no share of the booty himself, more than was sufficient to supply his men with provisions, and to reward Eschol, Enner, and Mambres, his three friends, who had stood the shock of the battle.

Melchisedech treats Abraham, Ver. 18.

Abraham presents him with the tenth of the spoil, Ver. 20.

God was so well pleased with the generous sincerity of Abraham, that he assured him these good deeds of his should never pass unrewarded. "And what, good Lord, says this holy "man then, will all thy bounties and rewards "to come avail a person who hath never a "child to leave them to, or an heir to succeed "him." (Abraham being as yet childless.) Whereupon God not only promised him a son, but the blessing also of a posterity, which should be, "As the stars of the Heaven for number." Upon the hearing of these words, Abraham overjoy'd, offer'd up a sacrifice according to the express command and direction of Almighty God. He took a heifer, a goat, and a ram, of three years old each, a turtle-dove, and a pigeon; the birds he kept whole, dividing the rest into halves, according to his order. While the altar was making ready, and birds of prey hovering up and down over the place, waiting for the blood of the carcasses, a voice was heard from Heaven, foretelling the bondage that the posterity of Abraham should suffer in Egypt from malicious enemies, for the space of four hundred years, at the end of which term they should over-run the whole territory of the Chanaanites, and make themselves masters of all their cities and dominions, from Egypt as far as Sidon.

The Egyptian bondage foretold, Ver. 13.

ABRAHAM at this time dwelt near the oak of Ogyge, as they called it, a place not far from Hebron, where he passed his days very uncomfortably in the thought of his wife's barrenness, and the want of issue; but still continuing to solicit Almighty God with daily prayers and supplications for a male child. Upon these importunities, God not only continued his former promise to him of a child, but gave him repeated assurances, that he should receive all the other good things also which he promised him upon his quitting Mesopotamia. Gen. xvi.

WHILE things were at this pass, Sarah by a particular direction from Heaven brought Hagar, an Egyptian servant in the family, to bed to her husband, in hopes he might have children by her. This maid proving with child, behaved herself insolently to her mistress upon a vain presumption, that the child she had in her belly would in course be next heir to the government. Abraham was no sooner aware of this ingratitude, but he immediately delivered her up into Sarah's hand, to chastise her as she thought fit, which to the maid was so insupportable a mortification, that she resolved to fly the place upon it, calling upon God still to pity her in that miserable condition. As she was upon the way in her flight, and passing through a desart, an Angel from Heaven met her, and ordered her back again to the place from whence she came; adding, that this affliction had befallen her, only as a punishment for her arrogance and unthankfulness; denouncing at the same time present destruction upon her, if she continued obstinate, and contemn'd the commandments of God; but in case she obey'd the admonition, and returned back again, she should live to be the mother of a child, that in time should come to have the dominion of that country. She obeyed the voice of the Angel, went back to her mistress, begged her pardon, and obtain'd it; and some time after this, she was delivered of Ishmael, (which signifies prevail'd upon,) God having heard and granted the prayers of the mother.

ABRAHAM was eighty six when he begot Ishmael, and at the age of ninety nine, God appeared to him, and told him that his wife Sarah should bear him a son, with a command to call him Isaac, foretelling also that mighty kings and nations should come out of him, and make themselves masters by force of arms of the whole land of Chanaan, from Sidon to Egypt. And God commanded farther for distinction sake, betwixt the race of Abraham and other nations, with whom there was to be no intermixture, that all his posterity should be circumcised on their privities at eight days old, not only for the distinction aforesaid, but for some other reasons also hereafter to be declared. Abraham then consulted God about the life of Ishmael, and received answer that he should live long, and be the father of many great and famous nations; whereupon Abraham gave God thanks, and was immediately circumcised with his whole family, and likewise Ishmael, who was now thirteen years of age, and Abraham about ninety nine.

CHAP. XII.

The Deſtruction of Sodom by the juſt Judgment of God, for the execrable Wickedneſs of the People.

The wickedneſs of Sodom, Gen. xviii. and xix.

ABOUT this time the people of Sodom were ſo puffed up with pride in the contemplation of their prodigious wealth and plenty, that they behaved with unparallel'd inſolence towards men, and irreverence towards God. They were ungrateful for benefits received to the higheſt degree, inhoſpitable to ſtrangers, and burnt in unnatural luſts one towards another. By theſe provoking and abominable ſins, the wrath of God was ſo highly incenſed againſt them, that he took up a determination to avenge himſelf upon them for their arrogance and pride, and to deſtroy their cities, and lay their whole country waſte, that for the time to come, the ground there ſhould produce no more graſs, nor any plant or fruit for the uſe of man.

THIS reſolution being taken, and the ſentence paſſed upon the Sodomites, as Abraham was ſitting one day at his tent door under the oak of Mambre, he ſaw three angels coming towards him, who to him ſeemed ſtrangers or travellers. He roſe up to meet them, and ſo after the firſt ſalutation and embrace, he gave them a fair invitation to the beſt entertainment his roof could afford. They accepted of his civility, and ſo his ſervants were preſently appointed to bake him a cake, and a calf was alſo killed and dreſſed; which being made ready, the treat was ſet before the angels under the oak where they lay. They gave him thanks, and in appearance fed upon it. But while the meat was yet before them, they enquired of Abraham where his wife Sarah was, who made anſwer, that ſhe was within there in the tent. Upon this they ſtood up as to go their way, telling Abraham that it would not be long before they ſhould come that way again, and that by that time they ſhould find Sarah a mother. Upon theſe words Sarah was called in, and could not forbear ſmiling to hear them ſpeak of her having a child at that time of the day, for ſhe herſelf was ninety years of age, and her husband a hundred. When they had proceeded thus far, the angels caſt off their diſguiſe, owned who they were, and gave up an account of their commiſſion. One of them, they ſaid, was ſent to bring Abraham the tidings of a ſon that was to be born, and the other two were employ'd for the deſtruction of Sodom. The latter ſtruck Abraham with grief and concern, for the ſake of the Sodomites; inſomuch, that he got up and begged of God that he would be pleaſed not to deſtroy the innocent together with the guilty. God gave him for anſwer, that they were all alike, and that if there were but ten righteous men in the whole city, he would ſpare all the reſt for that ten's ſake. After this declaration, Abraham urged not one word more in their behalf.

And foretel the deſtruction of Sodom, Ver. 17, &c.

THE two Angels departed, and went into Sodom, and Lot obſerving them, invited them to a lodging in his houſe. Now Lot was naturally humane, and courteous to ſtrangers, and the very counterpart of Abraham for piety and good-nature. But ſo it fell out, that the inhabitants of the town taking notice that two beautiful graceful perſons entered into Lot's houſe, preſſed hard upon Lot to force their way into his lodgings, with a deſign of attempting ſome violent act of brutality upon their perſons. Lot ſaid all that was poſſible upon the ſubject of continence and hoſpitality, to divert them from ſuch an outrageous act of lewdneſs; nay, and rather than fail, offered them his two daughters in exchange for the two ſtrangers; but this would not ſatisfy them neither. God being provok'd at their diabolical impudence and inſolence, ſtruck them upon the very place with ſo judicial a blindneſs, that they could not find the way into the houſe, the whole people of Sodom being at the ſame time doomed to an exemplary perdition.

Two of the angels are Lot's gueſts, Gen. xix. 1.

NOW Lot who had been forewarned of this approaching calamity, withdrew out of the city, with his wife and two maidens, her contracted daughters. The perſons to whom they were eſpouſed, were alſo earneſtly invited to accompany them out, but they turned all his admonitions into ridicule, looking upon them as the effects of a diſtemper'd brain, and ſo ſtaid behind, and ſhared the common fate in the general conflagration. Then it was that God diſcharged the fierce arrows of his wrath and vengeance upon this impious generation, conſuming not only the city itſelf, and every living ſoul in it, but deſtroying alſo the whole country thereabouts with the ſame irreparable deſolation, as may alſo be ſeen in my commentaries upon the wars of the Jews. The wife of Lot who went out with her husband, whether out of curioſity or tenderneſs, could not forbear looking behind her, to ſurvey the deſtruction of the city, though directly contrary to the command of God, and was turned into a pillar of ſalt.* I have view'd it myſelf, and it remains to this day.

Sodom conſumed with fire, Ver. 24.

Lot's wife turned into a pillar of ſalt, Ver. 26.

LOT and his daughters after this terrible judgment, in order to ſave themſelves, fled into a little corner of the country call'd Zoar, (in Hebrew, Small,) the only place which this devouring fire had ſpar'd. In this retreat they led a ſolitary uneaſy life, for want both of converſation and proviſion. The daughters looked upon themſelves in that ſolitude, as in effect the only ſurvivors of mankind, and therefore ſo far conſulted common convenience in this extremity, as to reckon any thing warrantable that they found neceſſary, eſpecially where the conſervation of the whole race of mankind was the queſtion. On this conſideration they contrived the putting of a trick upon their father, by ſtealing to bed to him at a time when he knew not what he did; upon which they both proved with child of boys. The ſon of the elder was call'd Moab, (in Hebrew, of my father,) that of the younger was Ammon, (or of my race.) The one was the father of the Moabites, a mighty people yet in being; the other of the Ammonites, and they both inhabit Cœle-Syria. Thus it was that Lot made his eſcape from the fire of Sodom.

Of Abimelech, and likewiſe of Iſhmael the Son of Abraham, and the Arabians his Poſterity.

Abraham withdraws with Sarah to Gerar, Gen. xx. 1.

AS for Abraham, he withdrew himſelf to Gerar in Paleſtine, and took Sarah along with him, ſtill under colour of his ſiſter, as before, for fear of Abimelech the king of the place. Now this Abimelech did afterwards fall in love with her, and would have corrupted her, or attempted it at leaſt, if the hand of God had not, in the heat of his appetite and deſign, prevented him by a deſperate fit of ſickneſs. So ill he was, that the phyſicians deſpaired of his life; and in the height of his diſtemper he had a caution given him in a dream, not to offer any violence to Sarah, for ſhe was the ſtranger's wife, not his ſiſter. Abimelech ſome ſhort time after, finding himſelf in a hopeful way of recovery, called his friends about him, and told them of his paſſion, and of his dream, and every thing that had paſſed, with this inference upon the whole, that his preſent ſickneſs was a judgment upon him for an inordinate love. Upon this, by the advice of the people about him, he ſent for Abraham, and gave him all aſſurance that his wife's honour was ſafe, for God had ſupported and protected her, and he did now reſtore her to him as unſpotted as he found her, appealing to God and her own conſcience for the truth of what he ſaid, and proteſting that if he had but known her to have been his wife, he would never have attempted her, deſiring him likewiſe to paſs it all over, and to remember him in his prayers to Almighty God to forgive him. He told him further, that if he had a mind to ſtay, he ſhould be welcome, and ſufficiently provided for; or if he had rather depart, he ſhould have guides and carriages to attend him, and all manner of conveniences along with him, which he might have any occaſion for when he came into that country. Abraham, in return to what Abimelech had ſaid, did in ſome ſort juſtify the calling of Sarah his ſiſter, being the daughter of his brother, and ſo of the kindred; and that he had made uſe of this pretence as a ſecurity to him in his travels. Neither could he charge himſelf, he ſaid, as the cauſe of Abimelech's ſickneſs; but in concluſion he wiſhed him well with all his heart, and ſhould be glad to continue with him. Matters being thus reconciled, the king very generouſly gave Abraham a portion both of lands and money, contracted an alliance with him upon condition of a fair correſpondence betwixt them, without fraud or guile, and the league was ſtruck and ratified at a certain well called Berſube, (or the well of the oath,) which is the name it beareth to this very day.

SOME little time after this, Sarah brought Abraham a ſon, (as God had foretold,) and they named him Iſaac, (in Hebrew, laughter,) alluding to Sarah's ſmiling at the improbability of her having a child at thoſe years, as the angel had foretold; ſhe herſelf being ninety years of age, and her huſband a hundred when Iſaac was born. Upon the eighth day he was circumciſed, and the Jews obſerve the ſame time and ſolemnity of circumciſion unto this day. The Arabians indeed are not circumciſed till the thirteenth year, as Iſhmael was, the ſon of Abraham by his concubine, and the perſon from whom they derive their original. But of him more particularly in what I am about to ſay.

The birth of Iſaac, Ver. 2, 3.

SARAH had at firſt as tender an affection for Iſhmael the ſon of her handmaid Hagar, as if he had been her own fleſh and blood; beſides, that he was alſo trained up and educated with infinite care and reſpect, as the preſumptive heir of the government. But when Iſaac came to be born, Sarah did not think it ſecure or reaſonable to have the two children brought up together, for Iſhmael was ſo much the elder, that in caſe of Abraham's death, he might find himſelf under ſome temptation, perhaps, to ſupplant the other; ſo that Sarah for fear of this, employed all the power ſhe had with Abraham, to have both mother and child ſent away and diſpoſed of in ſome remote country. Abraham at the firſt motion was utterly againſt it, as a barbarous cruelty to expoſe an innocent helpleſs child, and a neceſſitous mother to the wide world at that inhuman rate; but Abraham at length being over-ruled by God's command, hearken'd to the voice of his wife, and delivered the boy, who was not yet big enough to ſhift for himſelf, into the arms of his mother; gave her a proportion of water and bread for a ſubſiſtence, and ſo turned them looſe to ſeek their fortunes. They had not travelled far before their proviſions failed them, the water was all ſpent, the child ready to periſh for want of drink, and the woman in ſhort at her wits end. In this diſtreſs ſhe laid the boy down at the foot of a fir-tree, and went off herſelf to ſome diſtance, that ſhe might not ſee ſo diſmal a ſpectacle as that would have been, of her poor child in his laſt agonies. While Hagar was in this anxiety and deſpair, there came an angel to her, which ſhewed her a fountain hard by, and bad her be ſure to look carefully to her charge, for it was a matter of great moment, and her own happineſs depended in a great meaſure upon the ſafety of that child. This conſolation put the woman ſomewhat in heart again, ſo that ſhe continued wandering on ſtill, till by providence ſhe fell into the company of ſhepherds, who contributed very much to her relief.

CHAP. XIV.

God commands Abraham to ſacrifice his beloved Son Iſaac. Iſaac's Faith and Obedience, and the Bleſſing that attended it.

ISAAC was the only begotten ſon of Abraham, ſent him by God as the bleſſing of his age, and infinitely dear to him upon that account. But in the mean time, this tender affection of the parents was both anſwered and juſtified by the early piety, virtue, and reverence (towards God and man) of a child that deſerved it. When Abraham found himſelf ſecured in the proſpect of ſo excellent a ſucceſſor, he was no longer ſolicitous for his own life, or the things of this world, but placed his whole truſt upon the hope of his next heir, with a chearful diſpoſition to reſign his authority and poſſeſſions to his beloved ſon, and his very being to God and his good pleaſure. But it pleaſed the Lord ſtill after all this, to make a further trial of his integrity, and ſo enumerating to him the great things he had already done for him, the victories, the wealth, the happineſs, and the child, all which he had received from his bounty, he demanded, in fine, his dear and only ſon Iſaac for a ſacrifice, and to be offered on a mountain of Moriah, upon an altar there, as the utmoſt proof of his faith and obedience. Now Abraham, who lov'd and honour'd God without any conditions or reſerve, made no difficulty of reſolving without the leaſt ſcruple to deliver up the life of his ſon to the will of his maker, and the author of life itſelf; ſo that without one word ſpeaking to his wife, or any of his people, either of the command, or of his purpoſe, leſt peradventure they might oppoſe him in it, he took his ſon Iſaac with two of his ſervants, and an aſs laden with neceſſaries for the ſacrifice, and with them ſet forward two days journey towards the mountain. But approaching on the third day within ſight of the mountain, where David afterwards built a temple, he took Iſaac alone with him up into it, and left his ſervants below in the field. Iſaac was now twenty five years of age, and taking notice as he was preparing for the altar, that all things were ready for the ſacrifice, but no ſacrifice to be ſeen, he asked his father what offering he intended, for he ſaw none? Abraham made anſwer, that God would provide one, in whoſe power it was to give to thoſe that want, and to take away from thoſe that have abundance, and all for the beſt to them who put their truſt in God; wherefore he might take it for granted, that God would find the ſacrifice, if he ſhould vouchſafe to accept of an oblation.

Abraham's diſcourſe to Iſaac before the altar, Ver. 8.

ISAAC attended to all that had been ſaid, with a conſtancy and reſignation becoming the ſon of ſo great a father; declaring, that if he ſhould not frankly deliver up that life to God and his father, which they themſelves had given him, he had better never have been born; nay, that it was at the devotion even of his father alone, if he ſhould require it. With theſe words Iſaac advanced up to the altar, and preſented himſelf to the ſlaughter; but upon the very point of doing the execution, God Almighty called aloud to Abraham, and prevented it. "He bad him hold his hand, "and ſpare his ſon; for, ſays he, I did not "require it of you out of any delight I take "in human blood, or that I would make a "father the aſſaſſin of that very child which "I myſelf had given him, but to ſee how far "you would ſubmit to your God, in a ſelf-"denial to your inclination and nature. But "now ſince I find your piety to be proof "againſt all temptations, I do here confirm "over again to you all my former promiſes. "I do accept of your ſacrifice, and for your-"ſelf and your poſterity, my providence ſhall "never forſake you. I will bleſs your ſon "Iſaac with long life, and make his offspring "illuſtrious, by a numerous ſucceſſion of great "and virtuous men. His poſterity ſhall give "laws to many nations; they ſhall ſubdue "the land of Chanaan by the ſword, and their "wealth and renown ſhall make them the en-"vy of the reſt of the world."

A voice from Heaven bids Abraham hold his hand, Ver. 12.

So ſoon as God had made an end of ſpeaking, there appeared moſt unexpectedly a ram for a ſacrifice. Upon this ſurprize the father and the ſon, in a tranſport of joy, exchanged all ſorts of endearments; bleſſing God for his gracious promiſes and infinite goodneſs, and thereupon offering a up their ſacrifice. That duty being over, they returned to Sarah, and lived happily after it; for God's bleſſing went along with them in whatever they did.

The age and death of Sarah.

The age and death of Sarah, Gen. xxiii, 1, 2.

NOT long after this Sarah died, being a hundred twenty and seven years of age. She was buried in Hebron, and the Chanaanites would have given her the solemnity of an interment, but Abraham chose rather to buy a burying-place for himself and his family, which he did of one Ephraim, an inhabitant of Hebron, at the price of four hundred shekels*, where the monuments of himself and divers of his posterity are yet to be seen.

Of Abraham and his wife Chetura, and their posterity the Troglodytes. Isaac marries Rebecca.

Abraham's children by Chetura, and their offspring.

AFTER the death of Sarah, Abraham took to wife Chetura, by whom he had six sons, men of industry and wisdom; their names were † Zembran, Jazar, Madan, Madian, Jozubac, and Suus.

Suus had two Sons, Sabathan and Dadan, who had Latusim, Assur, and Luom. Madian had five sons, Epha, Opher, Enoch, Ebidas, and Eldas.

These people, upon Abraham's advice, dispersed themselves into colonies; and took possession of the country of the Troglodytes, and that part of Arabia Felix which lies towards the Red-Sea. There is a report that it was this same Opher who entered Libya with a powerful army, and over-ran the country. His successors held it after him, and gave it the name of Aphrica. Alexander Polyhistor is of this opinion, when he says that Cleodemus the prophet, otherwise called Malchus, in a history of the Jews, which he has written after the manner of Moses their Law-giver, makes mention of several children that Abraham had by Chetura, and three by name, i. e. Apheran, Surim, and Japhran; the Syrians taking their names from Surim, and the city of Aphra and Aphrica theirs from Japhran and Apheran. These are the people who are said to have fought against Libya and Antæus under the command of Hercules. And the story goes, that this Hercules married the daughter of Aphra, and had by her Dedor the father of Sophon, from whence the barbarous Sophaces derived their name.

Abraham propounds a match for his son Isaac with Rebecca the grand-daughter to Nachor, Gen. xxiv. 4.

Isaac was at this time about forty years of age, when his father had some thoughts of marrying him to Rebecca the grand-daughter of his brother Nachor. The resolution being taken to attempt that match, he sends the most approved and trusty servant he had on the errand; but first gives him his oath in form, to be true to his trust, which was performed by putting his hand under his thigh, according to the custom of the country. This being done, he gives him his commission and instruction, with full power and authority to treat and conclude; and having furnished him with choice and rich presents, such as were seldom or never seen in that country, and accommodated him with necessaries suitable for his journey, he sends him forward. His way lay thorough Mesopotamia, which, betwixt dirt in the winter, want of water in the summer, and the inevitable danger of robbers, if people be not very cautious, is a very troublesome and incommodious passage for travellers. But yet after all these difficulties, he came at last to Charran, where, upon entering the suburbs, he saw a great many young maiden women going to the wells for water: Upon which sight, he put up a mental prayer to God Almighty, desiring, that if heaven approved of the match he came about, he might find Rebecca in that company; and further, that he might know which which was she, by her giving him water upon his desiring it, and the rest refusing. This thought ran in his head till he came to the well, where the virgins being gotten together, he begged of them one by one to bestow the charity of a draught of water upon him. One said, she had taken a great deal of pains to get it, and could not part with it so easily; another, that she drew water for herself and not for other people; some made one excuse, some another, but all upon the negative, till at last, one single virgin chid her companions for want of good nature and civility to a stranger, and asking them whether they had been educated among reasonable creatures or brutes, that could deny a stranger the common rights of hospitality for so small a matter: whereupon she herself, with great courtesy and freeness gave the stranger to drink. This was as auspicious an entrance upon his business as he could have wished: but yet for sureness sake, after the prologue of a decent respect to the person of the virgin, and a declaration how much he was obliged to her for her civilities to a stranger, he came by degrees to the more necessary point of enquiring into her family and extraction, blessing the happy parents of so gracious a daughter, with a thousand prayers that they might live to bestow her where she would enjoy all the comforts of a married state, in the love of a kind and virtuous husband, and a numerous stock of obedient children. Rebecca, without any ceremony at all, courteously answer'd his question; "My father's name (says "she) was Bathuel; but he died a long time "since, and left my mother and myself, with "the whole family and fortune, under the "care of a brother of mine yet living, whose "name is Laban, and mine is Rebecca." The Man was overjoy'd at what he had heard and seen, being now fully assured that God would prosper his journey. Upon this he took out a chain, and some other ornamental curiosities, that women of Rebecca's age are commonly well enough pleased with, and made the virgin a present of them; both as an instance of his esteem for her singular goodness, and as an acknowledgment of the particular obligation she had laid upon him. He made it his request then, that for that night he might be permitted to lodge with the family of her relations; for it was grown late, and would

The maid reply'd, that he was much in the right to think well of the humanity of her relations; but ſhe deſired him however to have a better opinion of their generoſity, for it ſhould coſt him nothing: but ſhe would nevertheleſs, ſhe ſaid, ask her brother's leave to introduce him. Which was ſoon granted, and done accordingly. He was no ſooner brought in, but Laban's ſervants were ordered to look to his camels, and himſelf invited into ſupper with the maſter of the houſe. When ſupper was over, the gueſt addreſſed himſelf to the ſon, and the mother of the family after this manner: "I am come hither "from Abraham, the ſon of Thares, and your "kinſman; for Nachor (addreſſing himſelf "to Rebecca's mother) the grandfather of "your children, was Abraham's brother by the "ſame father and mother. This propoſal was ſo advantageous and deſirable in itſelf, and ſo manifeſtly conſentaneous to the will of God, that Rebecca was delivered up to the ſervant upon the conditions of the treaty, who carry'd her home with him to Iſaac, being now the lord and maſter of Abraham's poſſeſſions; for the children that Abraham had by Chetura were gone to plant in other provinces.

The death of Abraham.

The death, age, and burial of Abraham, Gen. xxv. Ver. 7, 8, 9.

ABRAHAM lived but a ſhort time after the marriage of Iſaac: A man conſpicuous for his piety and virtue, and beloved both of God and man. His age was one hundred and ſeventy five years when he died. He was buried at Hebron, and laid by his wife Sarah; Iſaac and Iſhmael taking upon them the care of his burial.

The birth of Eſau and Jacob. Eſau's Wives. Iſaac ſends Eſau a hunting; but being in years, and dim-ſighted, Jacob perſonates and ſupplants him; and the father bleſſes one for the other.

SOON after the deceaſe of Abraham, Iſaac's wife was found to be with child: and her bigneſs ſo extraordinary, that Iſaac under a great concern, beſought God to reveal unto him the meaning of it. He received for anſwer that ſhe ſhould bring forth twins; and that from thoſe two twins, two nations ſhould deſcend of their own name; and that in proceſs of time, the younger ſhould be the greater of the two. This fell out accordingly not long after; for Rebecca had twins, the elder of them all hairy from head to foot, and the other catching him by the heel as he was coming into the world. The elder was the father's darling, and his name Eſau or Seir, (which word in Hebrew ſignifies Hair,) and the younger, whoſe name was Jacob, the mother's.

THERE happened in thoſe days to be a terrible famine in the land of Chanaan, and at the ſame time great plenty of every thing in Egypt, whither Iſaac fully purpoſed to have gone; but God diverted him, and ſo he went to Gerar. King Abimelech treated him there with all the appearance of reſpect imaginable, at firſt, upon the account of that antient league of friendſhip and alliance which had formerly paſſed betwixt himſelf and Abraham; but this was not likely to continue long in a man who ſacrificed all other conſiderations to his envy. He found that Iſaac was more in God's favour than himſelf, and ſo turned him off. Iſaac perceived that this change of humour proceeded only from envy, and ſo withdrew to a place called the valley, not far from Gerar. And as he was there digging for water, Abimelech's ſhepherds aſſaulted him in a violent and outrageous manner, and ſtopt his proceeding. He had no mind to contend, ſo that the ſhepherds ſeemed to have the better of him. Upon this he went a little further, and digged a ſecond time, and was again interrupted by Abimelech's ſhepherds, as before: whereupon he thought it good diſcretion to leave off there too, and wait the providence of a more favourable occaſion. After this he made a third attempt, and the king then gave him leave to dig, and he gave the place the name of *Roobath, (as much as to ſay, Large or Spacious.) And for the other places before-mentioned, the former he called Eſcon (or Contention;) and the other Sitenna, which ſignifies Enmity.

Iſaac goes to Gerar, ibid. Abimelech kind to him at firſt, and then breaks with him, Ver. 11 to 16.

ISAAC's power, intereſt, and reputation encreaſing daily, Abimelech had an eye upon him, as a growing adverſary; for he was conſcious of his own inſincerity, and not without ſome apprehenſion that the countenance he ſhewed at firſt, compared with his unfriendly dealing afterward, might provoke him to a revenge; beſide that he would not willingly have ſuch a man his enemy. Theſe things premiſed and conſidered, Abimelech went directly to Iſaac, with a motion to renew an alliance with him; taking one of his great officers and friends along with him for a party to the treaty. Iſaac's good-good-nature was eaſily prevailed upon to lay aſide all former animoſities, out of a reverence to the memory of the former friendſhips and good offices, which had paſſed betwixt Abimelech and his father; and ſo all things were brought to an amicable accommodation.

Eſau's wives, Gen. xxviii. 9.

ESAU, the beloved ſon of his father Iſaac, at forty years of age married two wives, Adah the daughter of Elon, and * Alibama the daughter of †Esbion, perſons of quality and diſtinction among the Chanaanites. Now this he did upon his own head and fancy, without ever conſulting his father; or if he had, he would hardly have given his conſent; having taken up a firm reſolution never to enter into any ſort of alliance with that people. But, however, the thing being done, could not be undone, and Iſaac thought it his beſt courſe rather to paſs it over in ſilence, without noiſe, than to put it to the extremity of making him turn the women away.

ISAAC was now grown old, and very dimſighted, if not quite blind. In this condition he call'd his ſon Eſau to him; and prefacing what he had to ſay with ſomewhat of reflection upon his age and infirmity, he fell to lamenting his condition, that he was not able to ſerve God with that vigour of devotion now, as he had done formerly; and after this, he order'd his ſon Eſau to go out a hunting, and provide him ſome good thing for his ſupper, ſaying, that he would afterwards give him his prayers and his bleſſing, and beſeech God to be his comforter and protector to his life's end. "My diſſolution, ſays he, I am very "ſenſible is not far off; the time uncertain, "and I cannot ſpend the remainder of my life "better, than in prayers to God for thy wel-"fare." Eſau went preſently out to ſee what he could catch, and in the mean while Rebecca bethought herſelf of a way to transfer the bleſſing to Jacob that was intended for Eſau, out of a partiality of affection to the one, rather than the other; ſo ſhe bad Jacob (but without the privity, and againſt the very deſign of Iſaac) go out and kill a kid, and have it dreſſed ready for ſupper. Jacob very punctually put his mother's commands in execution, without delay; and when ſupper was ready, having put kids skins over his arms and hands, that he might ſeem hairy, (the twins being in every other particular ſo alike that there was no diſtinguiſhing betwixt them,) he ſet it before his father; but with a thouſand difficulties in his head, for fear of being detected in the impoſture, and drawing a curſe upon himſelf inſtead of a bleſſing. Iſaac, it ſeems, taking notice of ſomewhat very particular in his ſon's voice, bad him come to him; and upon finding his hands all hairy, paſſed this reflection upon it; "The voice, ſays he, is Jacob's "voice, but the hands are the hands of Eſau." And ſo without any further ſuſpicion, he went to ſupper; and after that offered up a prayer ſuitable to the occaſion, in words to this effect. "Eternal God, the creator of all "things that are made, thou that haſt been ſo "gracious and bountiful to my father, to my-"ſelf, and to our offſpring; not only promi-"ſing, but alſo beſtowing on us all good "things, and giving us aſſurances of greater "bleſſings ſtill to come; Lord, make thy words "good to us by effects, and do not deſpiſe thy "ſervant for his preſent infirmities, which make "him the more ſenſible of his need of thy "ſupport; preſerve this child from all evil, "in thy mercy and infinite goodneſs; give "him a long and a happy life; bleſs him "with all worldly enjoyments that may be for "his good; make him a terror to his enemies, "and an honour and a comfort to his friends."

ISAAC had no ſooner ended his prayer for Eſau, as he thought, and intended it, but Eſau himſelf returned from the chace, which gave Iſaac to underſtand his miſtake; but he did not think fit to make any words of it. When Eſau came to be informed of what had paſſed, he beſought his father only to beſtow the ſame bleſſing upon himſelf over again, which he had pronounced upon his brother. But Iſaac excuſed himſelf, that he could not either tranſfer, or take away the benediction he had already conferred. This diſappointment drew tears from Eſau, and his ſorrow ſo far wrought upon the tenderneſs of his father, that all the bleſſings he had left, he gave him; that is to ſay, he declared to him, that he ſhould be a famous hunter, and a great man at arms; and that he himſelf and his poſterity ſhould gain immortal honour by their exploits that way; but in the cloſe, that he muſt be ſubject to his younger brother.

Eſau's diſappointment, Ver. 34, &c.

JACOB was exceedingly afraid, leſt his brother ſhould revenge the injury, and Rebecca no leſs conſcious of the provoking affront that was put upon him; ſo that ſhe bethought herſelf of this way to divert the danger of it. She prevail'd with Iſaac to diſpatch Jacob away into Meſopotamia, to take a wife out of her alliance there. Eſau finding how he had diſobliged his father and relations, by matching with the Chanaanites, (whom they utterly abhorred,) had now taken to wife Baſſemath, the daughter of Iſhmael, whom he lov'd the beſt of all his wives.

CHAP. XIX.

Jacob ſent into Meſopotamia to treat about a match with Rachel, Laban's daughter. His viſions upon the way. He treats with Laban, who impoſes upon him.

BY the advice of Rebecca, and at her inſtigation, and with the conſent of Iſaac too, Jacob was ſent away into Meſopotamia, to treat about a match there with the daughter of Rebecca's brother Laban. But the animoſities being at that time ſo fierce and violent betwixt his family and the Chanaanites, and Jacob's way lying through the land of Chanaan, he durſt not venture himſelf in any of their houſes upon his journey, but took up his lodging in the open air, and made uſe of an heap of ſtones to lay his head upon, inſtead of a pillow. As he lay thus at reſt, he had one night in his ſleep this viſion; he dreamt that he ſaw a ladder ſtanding upon the earth, and the upper end of it reaching the Heavens, with certain glorious figures, that to his view ſeemed more than human, deſcending by the rounds of it; and from the top, God himſelf manifeſtly appearing, and ſpeaking to Jacob Jacob comes to Charran, Gen. xxix. 4.

UPON this he purſued his journey to Meſopotamia, and after a tedious paſſage, he came to Charran, where he found ſeveral ſhepherds, young men and maidens, about a well, and drawing of water; he join'd the company, deſired a little drink of them, and ſo by little and little fell to diſcourſe with them, whether they knew one Laban thereabouts, or no; and if he were yet living. They all ſaid they knew him, and ſo muſt every body, for he was a perſon of conſiderable note; his daughter and they fed their ſheep together; and it was a wonder ſhe was not come yet; that when ſhe came, ſhe could reſolve him in whatever he wanted to know. The words were no ſooner out of their mouths, but the daughter herſelf approached them, accompanied with her ſhepherds. They told Jacob, that was ſhe, and then acquainted the virgin how that ſtranger there had been inquiring about her father. The maiden upon the ſight of Jacob, with the gaiety of an innocent young creature, began to ask him queſtions, who he was, whence he came, and what was his buſineſs, demanding of him in a very obliging way, if there was any thing they could ſerve him in. Jacob was ſo mightily taken, both with the kinſwoman and the gracefulneſs of her deportment, eſpecially with the charms of her incomparable beauty, that at firſt ſight he fell directly in love with her, and thus accoſted her; "There hath been, ſays he, a great "friendſhip betwixt our two families, at leaſt "(if you are indeed the daughter of Laban) "of a date long before either you or I were "born; for Abraham, Aran, and Nachor, were "the ſons of Thares; and Bathuel, your "grandfather, was Nachor's ſon; Iſaac is my "father, begotten by Abraham upon Sarah the "daughter of Aran; and we are nearer yet "ſtill; for Rebecca my mother is the ſiſter "of your father Laban, by the ſame father "and mother; ſo that in the degrees of affi-"nity, you and I are firſt couſins; and I am "now come to greet you with all the offices "of a friend and a kinſman toward the re-"newing of that kind agreement of ancient "date." This brought into the mind of the virgin, what ſhe had often heard her father ſay of Rebecca; and taking for granted how glad her parents would be to hear any tidings of that excellent perſon, the paſſion ſhe had for the pleaſing of her father, tranſported her to ſuch a degree, that ſhe burſt out into tears, took Jacob about the neck, and kiſſed him, and then holding him in her arms, ſpake to him after this manner; "You are, ſays ſhe, the bearer "of the moſt agreeable news to my father "and the whole family, that ever came under "our roof. Good man! he was hardly ever "well but when he was ſpeaking of your mo-"ther; and I dare ſay, he would not exchange "the felicity you have now brought him for "any other happineſs under the ſun; where-"fore, ſays ſhe, not to deprive him any longer "of the joy you are to carry him, follow me "immediately." With theſe words ſhe introduced him to Laban, where he was made known to his uncle, ſafe in the hands of his friends, and thoſe friends of his overjoy'd at the providence of ſo unexpected a ſurprize. They had not been many days together, when Laban made an open profeſſion of the ſatiſfaction he had in his converſation, and that it was ſo great, he wanted words to expreſs it. After this declaration, his curioſity made him a little inquiſitive how he came to leave his father and mother in their extreme age, and when they could worſt ſpare him; but aſſuring him withal, that whatever he could do in the world for him was at his ſervice. Jacob, upon this, to ſatisfy his enquiry, gave him in ſhort the whole hiſtory of their family. "My "mother Rebecca, ſays he, had two twin "ſons, Eſau and myſelf. Eſau being diſap-"pointed of our father's bleſſing by an arti-"fice of my mother's, to put me in my bro-"ther's place to receive it, he looks upon me "for this as a ſupplanter of him in his right, "as well to his father's vows and prayers, as "to a kingdom and an inheritance which God "had aſſign'd him; and for this circumven-"tion he reſolved to take away my life. Now "to avoid this danger, and in obedience to "my mother's command, I am come hither "for ſanctuary, as to the neareſt relation ſhe "hath in the world; and next under God, I "depend upon yourſelf for my ſecurity." Laban promiſed him all ſorts of aſſiſtance and reſpects; not only for his own ſake, but as the ſon likewiſe of his dear ſiſter, whom he lov'd tenderly, at what diſtance ſoever. Laban told him further, that he would at preſent ſet him over his flocks, and give him authority over all the keepers of his ſheep; and that if any time hereafter he ſhould have a mind to return, he might aſſure himſelf of a conſideration and reward anſwerable to the merit of ſuch a kinſman. tent to undergo the labour, provided he might continue in the family; and he told Laban as much, upon condition he might have Rachel in marriage for his service; a person that he loved not only for her singular worth and virtue, but as the providential instrument of introducing him into the family; professing that it was only his excess of love that made him speak what he did. Upon this proser, Laban immediately concluded the match, with all imaginable chearfulness; solemnly protesting, that there was not a man in the world whom he would chuse for a son-in-law so soon as himself; only he must have patience to stay a while; for he should be loth to send his daughter so far as Chanaan; and truly he had almost repented sometimes of sending his sister thither too. Jacob submitted to wait, and so bound himself to his father-in-law for seven years, to shew that he had no other views in what he did, than that of love, generosity, and justice.

Jacob serves seven years for Rachel, Gen. xxix. 20.

AT the end of the term, and upon the precise day, Laban prepares the wedding-feast, and late at night, unperceived by Jacob, privately convey'd the elder sister to his bed instead of the younger; and so they lay together, wine and darkness contributing to complete the mistake. When Jacob came to awake in the morning, and find how he was imposed upon, he fell to expostulating the matter with Laban, as a violation of common faith and justice: Laban only excusing himself under the pretence of a necessity, without any malice at all, it being the custom of the country, he said, not to marry the younger sister before the elder: but this, says he, shall be no obstacle to your marrying of Rachel; for after seven years more, you shall have her bare-faced, and by day-light, when you may see and know what you do. Jacob, who was under the influence of a very strong and violent passion, could not but comply with his proposals, and so bound himself for the other seven years; after the expiration of which he had Rachel given him to wife.

Leah put upon Jacob for Rachel, ver. 23.

THESE two sisters had two maidens allow'd them by Laban: *Zelphah was with Leah, and †Bala with Rachel; not in the quality of servants, but yet in subjection to them. Leah underwent great affliction of mind to see that her sister had a greater share in Jacob's affection than herself; but lived in hope still that the bringing of him children, which was her daily prayer, might gain her a greater share in his love. And in the end it did so; for being delivered of a son, whom she called ||Rubel, (or divine mercy, for so the word signifies,) it wrought upon her husband's affections; and after this she had three other sons; Simeon, (i. e. God is favourable,) Levi, (i. e. the support of society,) and Judah, (that is to say, Thanksgiving.) Rachel was mightily in pain lest the fruitfulness of her sister might take off somewhat of Jacob's kindness to herself; and therefore contrived the putting of her woman Bala in her place, which she did accordingly, and Jacob had a son by her, called Dan, (i. e. the Judgment of God.) And a while after this, she brought him Nephthalim, (which signifies artificial;) alluding to Rachel's contending with her sister for children by craft. Leah after this, made use of her sister's stratagem, and put in Zelphah to Jacob, by whom he had two sons; the first Gad, (or by chance,) and afterwards Aser, (which signifies Beautifying) because they got honour by it.

The original of the Israelites, Gen. xxix & xxx.

ONE time, when the two sisters were got together, Rubel, the eldest son of Leah, brought his mother some Mandrake-apples, which Rachel would fain have had a part of; but the other told her with some passion, that it was too much to have her husband and her apples too; but Rachel, to pacify her, made her an offer of having Jacob to herself that night. Leah accepted it, and they lay together accordingly. Jacob after this had more children by Leah; as Issachar, (i. e. born for hire,) Zabulon, (that is, a pledge of love,) and a daughter named Dinah. Rachel stay'd a long time, and at last brought forth a son, whose name was Joseph, (or an addition.)

Rachel longs for Leah's Mandrakes.

IT was already full twenty years that Jacob had served his father-in-law, in the quality of an overseer of his shepherds and herdsmen; so that it was now high time, he thought, to think of returning homeward again, and to take his wives along with him. But this was to be privately managed, since his father-in-law had absolutely refused to give him leave. He was not willing to come to any resolution, however, without consulting his wives first, to see how they stood affected to the journey. But finding them willing, they set out altogether without any delay: the two sisters and their women, and all their children, and all that belonged to them, and Jacob also, with one half of the flocks, without ever making Laban in the least acquainted with his intentions. Rachel took away with her the images of the Gods of the country, not out of any reverence she had for the idols; for her husband had taught her better things, and to contemn them; but she fancied to herself, that in case they should be pursued by her father and overtaken, by their help matters might be brought to a more easy composition.

Jacob steals away from Laban, Gen. xxxi. 17, 18.

THE day following, when Laban came to be informed of Jacob's departure by stealth, with his daughters, he called his people together in a fury, and with a strong body of men immediately pursued them. Upon the seventh day in the evening, they overtook them resting themselves upon a little hill; but being late, Laban and his people betook themselves quietly to their repose, without attempting any violence against them. That very night God appeared to Laban in his sleep, and bad him have a care not to offer any violence or indignity to his fugitive son-in-law and daughters, but rather dispose himself to make an amicable agreement, and cultivate a better understanding with them: "And do not you de" spise them, says the vision, for the smallness
" of their number; for if you do, I myself
" will fight their battles."

Laban overtakes him, ver. 25.

God warns Laban in his sleep not to hurt him, ver. 24.

LABAN early next day sent for Jacob, (who ventured to come to him in confidence,) and told him of the dream he had had; afterwards turning his discourse to reproaching and upbraiding him. "You cannot forget (says he)
" that I took you into my house a beggar,
" and a wretch indigent to the last degree;

Jacob clears himſelf, Ver. 31, &c.

JACOB made anſwer, that he was not the only man who had a natural affection for his native country; and that after ſo long an abſence, it was but reaſonable to think of returning home again. As to the robbery or injuſtice, he was willing to appeal to any other judge than himſelf. " Now, ſays he, I ex- " pected rather that you ſhould have given me " thanks for managing and improving your eſ- " tate, than think much of the ſmall pittance " I have taken out of it. And pray do not " call it a violence neither upon your daugh- " ters; for as there is no evil intention in the " caſe, ſo that which you miſtake for a force " is only a conjugal duty, both in my taking " them away, and in accompanying their huſ- " band and their children." This he ſaid in his own defence, and for the reſt, only turned Laban's reproaches upon himſelf: wondering and complaining, that an uncle and a father-in-law, after the hardſhip of twenty years ſervice, beſide what he willingly ſuffered for the ſake of Rachel, and more afterwards, ſhould at laſt treat his ſon-in-law and kinſman at the rate of the worſt of enemies. Jacob had great reaſon undoubtedly to complain of Laban's ill uſage; who obſerving that God bleſſed Jacob in all he did, would be cajolling him with fine words, promiſing one while to give him all the white cattle that ſhould be produced, another while all the black; and ſtill as thoſe deſigned for Jacob's part came to be the greater, he went from his word, and put it off to another year, in hopes to find it leſs then; but in caſe it ſhould prove otherwiſe, with a reſolution before-hand to depart from his promiſe.

Rachel conveys away the idols, Ver. 34.

As to the images, Laban having free liberty to ſearch, Rachel convey'd them away into the ſtuffing of the camel's ſaddle, which ſhe rode upon, and pretended to have the woman's ſickneſs at that time upon her; Laban paſſed her over unſearched, upon a preſumption, that in ſuch a condition ſhe would not come ſo near any thing that was ſacred. Upon this, Laban entered into a league with Jacob, granted an act of oblivion to his daughters for all that was paſt, promiſing that for the future they ſhould be as dear to him as ever they were, and all this was confirmed with an oath. The ſolemnity paſſed upon a certain mountain, where a pillar was erected in the form of an altar,

Jacob's viſions, Gen. xxxii. 1, 2.

JACOB went forward on his way towards Chanaan, and had ſeveral propitious viſions in his paſſage, which gave him great hope of future ſucceſs, calling the place where he ſaw them the Field of God. But the old grudge that Eſau bore him was not yet out of Jacob's head, which made him ſend every where up and down to learn how his brother ſtood affected to him; beſide ſeveral expreſs meſſengers to find him out, with a commiſſion in his name to addreſs him to this effect. " That Jacob finding himſelf under his bro- " ther's diſpleaſure, voluntarily abandoned his " country, and in confidence, that after ſo long " an abſence, all paſt unkindneſſes are buried " and forgotten, he is now returning with his " wives, children, goods, and ſubſtances, to " lay himſelf and all he has at his brothers " feet; propoſing to himſelf no greater hap- " pineſs than to enjoy all the bounties which " God in his goodneſs hath been pleaſed " to beſtow upon him, in common with his " brother."

Jacob compliments, and preſents Eſau, Gen. xxxiii. 3, 4.

UPON the delivery of this meſſage, Eſau in a tranſport of joy advanced preſently with a band of four hundred men to meet his brother. Jacob was not a little ſtartled at the number; but put himſelf in a poſture however, with God's aſſiſtance, to defend himſelf and his people in caſe of the worſt. He diſpoſed his body into two diviſions; the one to advance, and the other to follow, within diſtance of either receiving or ſeconding the van, if it ſhould come to an attack. When he had ordered his people after this manner, he ſent his fore-runners to his brother with preſents: ſome for uſe, others for curioſity, as creatures of burden, and ſeveral ſorts of ſtrange beaſts that might be acceptable for their rarity ſake. Theſe were to march in looſe order at ſome convenient diſtance, one after another, to make them appear more than they were; the meſſengers having this eſpecially in charge, to behave themſelves towards Eſau with all poſſible ſmoothneſs and reſpect; not doubting but by this gentleneſs of proceeding to rectify all miſunderſtandings, if they were not already compoſed. It was a whole day's work to put Jacob's troops in order, and at night they marched. When they were got over the torrent of Jabac, Jacob being a little behind, a ſpectre engaged with him, and Jacob wreſtling with this apparition had the better of him; whereupon a voice called out to him, and ſaid, " Comfort thyſelf in what thou haſt done, for " it is not a common adverſary that thou haſt " foiled, but an angel of the Lord. Take it " for a preſage, that your poſterity ſhall con- " tinue for ever, and that you ſhall never be " overcome." Upon this, he gave him the name of Iſrael, which in Hebrew ſignifies ſtruggling with an angel of God. This was revealed to Jacob at his own requeſt, and when he found it was an angel ſpake to him, he beſought them to reveal ſome other future events that were to befal him, which the ſpectre did, and ſo diſappear'd. Jacob was ſo tranſported with what he had heard, that he gave this place the name of Phanuel,* (or the face of God.) He had a ſinew of his thigh ſtrain'd in the encounter, for which reaſon he would never afterward eat that part of any creature; and upon that account we do forbear it alſo to this day.

Phanuel, or the face of God, Ver. 30.

UPON the news of Eſau's being advanced, and drawing near to his brother, Jacob ordered his wives to go before with their women, and to march apart from one another, ſo as to ſee the action at a diſtance, if Eſau ſhould think fit to put it to a battle. But when Jacob ſaw that Eſau came towards him with peace and chearfulneſs in his countenance, he went and threw himſelf at the feet of his brother. Eſau in the mean while embracing him, aſk'd him ſeveral queſtions about the women and the children, and gave him afterwards an earneſt invitation to his father's houſe. Jacob excuſed himſelf, that his horſes and cattle were very much tired, and not in a travelling condition; and then Eſau departed to his habitation at Seir, ſo called from the hairineſs of Eſau.

The rape of Dinah. The children of Jacob.

JACOB for his part went to the place called the tabernacles, which name it bears to this day, and ſo to † Sichem, a city belonging to the Chanaanites. There happened to be a great feſtival there, and Dinah, the only daughter of Jacob, went thither to ſee the city, and the dreſs and faſhions of the women of the place. Sichem, the ſon of king ‡ Emmor fell in love with her, took her away, and raviſhed her, and liked her ſo well, that he begged his father's leave to marry her; who not only gave his conſent, but went himſelf to Jacob with the ſame requeſt on his ſon's behalf. Jacob was under a ſore dilemma what anſwer to give; for he could not in conſcience marry his daughter to a ſtranger; neither could he refuſe any thing decently to the quality of a royal advocate. But upon ſecond thoughts, he came to a reſolution to deſire time to conſider of it; ſo the king went away, little doubting of his compliance with the propoſals he had made. Upon this juncture, Jacob having conferr'd with his ſons about the indignity that had been put upon their ſiſter, and the requeſt of Emmor, the greateſt part of them had not a word to ſay, being at their wits end what to adviſe; only Simeon and Levi, the brothers of Dinah by the ſame mother, laid their heads together, and agreed upon a deſign betwixt themſelves, without ſpeaking one word to their father of it, which they executed as follows: Upon the next feſtival at Sichem, late in the night they fell upon the guards, and eaſily maſter'd them, finding them drowſy and ſecure in their drunken revels. They took poſſeſſion of the city, kill'd all the males they could meet with, the king and his ſon being in the number, ſparing only the women; and upon the finiſhing of this exploit, brought home their ſiſter again to their father. Jacob was ſtruck with horror at the barbarity of ſo bloody an action, and highly incenſed againſt his ſons for what they had done; but God comforted him in a viſion, bad him have a good heart, and purge his tents, and not forget the ſacrifice he promiſed after his dream in his Meſopotamian progreſs. While Jacob was executing this command, he happened to find Laban's Gods, which Rachel had ſtolen and buried under a certain oak, without informing him any thing about it. From thence he went and ſacrificed at Bethel, where he had that divine revelation upon his going into Meſopotamia. He went next to Ephrata, where Rachel died in labour, and there he buried her, the only perſon of his relations who died and was not interr'd at Hebron. This loſs very ſenſibly affected him, but the child liv'd, and he gave it the name of Benjamin, || from the great grief it brought to the mother.

Iſaac died at the age of one hundred and eighty five years, and was buried in Hebron.

FROM thence he went to Hebron in Chanaan, where Iſaac dwelt; but they two did not live long together. Rebecca died before the arrival of Jacob, and Iſaac follow'd her not long after. Eſau and Jacob buried him, and laid him by his wife in Hebron, in the burying-place of the family. Iſaac was a perſon acceptable in the ſight of God, and attended by ſpecial providences in the courſe of his life, next to Abraham. He lived to the age of a hundred eighty five years, in a ſteddy and eminent courſe of piety and virtue.

Esau and Jacob divide their possessions. Idumea falls to the former, and Chanaan to the other.

AFTER the death of Isaac, the two brothers kept no longer to their paternal estates, but divided their possessions; whereupon Esau yielded up the city of Hebron to his brother, and went and settled himself at Seir. He was lord and master of Idumea, and gave it his own name; that is to say, Adom *, which was a kind of a by-name given him upon this following occasion: One day when he was a youth, he had been out a hunting, and coming home very much tired and hungry, he found his brother making a soup of lentils for his dinner: they looked red, and the very colour of them set him a longing, and a begging with great importunity for a mess of this pottage; but Jacob absolutely refused so much as one drop of them to his brother, unless he would condescend to make over his birthright to him, which Esau, compelled then by hunger, submitted to, formally renouncing all the privileges of his seniority with a solemn oath. His youthful companions made sport with him for what he had done, and nick-nam'd him Adom, from the colour of the soup; for Adom in Hebrew signifies red. This name went also to the country under his jurisdiction, though the Greeks have disguised and softened it a little, by calling it Idumea.

Jacob happy in himself and family.

JACOB was one of the happiest men upon the face of the earth, and not another in the whole country to compare with him, either for wealth and command, or for well accomplish'd and virtuous children; who wanted nothing to make them great men, as well for action as for counsel; for they were indefatigably industrious, valiant even to the strictest punctilio's of generosity and honour; and, to perfect the character, endued with a talent of understanding that crowned all the rest; nay, and so wonderful a providence continually attended them in all the chances and encounters of their lives, that their very sufferings and afflictions turn'd to their advantage, in being made the instruments of Almighty God toward the bringing of our forefathers out of the bondage of Egypt. The story is this:

Joseph his father's favourite, Gen. xxxvii. 3.

JOSEPH, the son of Jacob by his wife Rachel, was much the dearest child to his father of all the offspring, in regard of the excellencies both of his body and of his mind; for, over and above the gracefulness of his person, he was no less eminent and extraordinary for uncommon sense and understanding. This exceeding tenderness of the father drew upon the son the envy and ill-will of the rest of the brothers, and this factious malevolence was much embitter'd by certain dreams Joseph had, that look'd like presages of his future felicity and greatness. This he communicated to his father and brethren, and no wonder if it stirr'd up a dangerous emulation against him. The visions were these:

The envy of his brethren, Ver. 4.

HIS father sent him out one day into the field with his brothers, in harvest time, to reap corn, where he had a dream quite of another nature than those phantastical images of things that appear to us commonly in our sleep. He told this to his brothers upon waking, and put it to them to expound it. Now the dream was this; "Methought, says he, I saw this "last night my own sheaf of wheat standing "upright, and all my brothers sheaves come "running towards it, and falling down before "it, as so many servants would do to their "master." There went no great mystery to the unriddling of this dream; for they saw manifestly that it pointed at the power and authority which Joseph in time to come was to have over them, even to the degree of their becoming subjects to him. But to their brother they pretended ignorance, and could make nothing of it, they said; praying, however, within themselves still, that God would avert the omen, their hatred increasing all this while to Joseph yet more and more. Soon after this he had another vision, much more remarkable than the former, which was sent from God for the confounding of their malice. He saw in his sleep, he thought, "The sun, "the moon, and eleven stars coming down "from the heavens to the earth, and doing "him reverence." Joseph communicated this vision also to his father, in the hearing of his brothers, (mistrusting no mischief from them all this while,) telling him that he should be very glad to understand what it meant. Jacob was highly delighted with the dream, as a presage of happy and glorious days to his son Joseph; and that the time by God's providence would come, when both father and brothers should do him reverence and honour. By the sun and moon he understood the father and mother, under this analogy, that the office of one was to increase and nourish, and that of the other to give form and force. By the eleven stars were meant the eleven brothers who had their light and virtue from the sun and moon also.

Joseph's dream of the wheat-sheaves, Ver. 5.

Sun, moon, and eleven stars, Ver. 9.

Presages of power and greatness, Ver. 10.

THIS was no idle interpretation of Jacob's; but it gall'd to the very heart the brothers of Joseph, quite contrary to the reason and duty of the matter in question; for they should have joy'd in their brother's good as in their own, without envying those graces and benefits to so near a relation, that they would have been less troubled at in a stranger. But their impious malice was now come to that height, that without any more ado, they fully intended to destroy him, and after this manner they resolved to put their project in execution. So soon as harvest was over, they went with their flocks to Sichem, (an excellent feeding ground,) but without ever speaking one word to their father of the place they were going to. When they had been gone a pretty while, and no news or certainty of what was become of them, Jacob fell into a terrible apprehension, lest some mischief might have befallen them, and so sent Joseph with orders to inform himself punctually upon the whole matter, and to bring him word back what was become of his brothers, and how they did.

CHAP. III.

Joseph sold by his brethren into Egypt, where he is highly advanc'd.

JOSEPH set forward upon his journey, according to his command and commission, and great joy there was among the brethren at his arrival, not as a brother or a messenger come from their father, but as an enemy whom God had delivered into their hands; and therefore they were for dispatching him immediately, without slipping the present opportunity. Rubel, the eldest of the brothers, found the conspiracy so strong and desperate, that he employ'd all his art and interest to prevent, or at least to divert it, setting before them the heinousness of the sin, and the indelible scandal and odium that they would draw upon themselves by an action so hateful in the sight of God and man. "It were an abomi-"nable wickedness, says he, to take away the "life even of a stranger; but to destroy a kins-"man, and a brother, and in that brother a "father and a mother too, with grief for the "loss of so good and so hopeful a son.—— "Bethink yourselves, says he, if any thing "can be more diabolical; consider that there "is an all-seeing God, who will be both wit-"ness and avenger of this horrid murder: Be-"think yourselves, I say, and repent of your "barbarous design, and consult the measures "of humanity and moderation; for you must "never think to consummate this flagitious "villany, and divine vengeance not overtake "you; for God's providence is every where,

" in the wilderneſs as well as in the city, and " whereſoever there is a man there is a God; " beſide the horror of a guilty conſcience to " purſue you wherever you go, and, whether " it be good or bad, to bear you company for " ever. Or put the caſe your brother had done " you wrong now, would you take away his " life for it? when it is our part to paſs over the " ſlips of our friends, even though they may " have fail'd in their duty. But what, in fine, " has Joſeph done againſt you? or if he had, " the ſimplicity of his youth might plead his " excuſe; and his brothers, of all men living, " ſhould be his friends and guardians rather " than his murderers: And then the very " ground of your cruelty will be a ſevere ag- " gravation, even of the ſin itſelf. His life is " to be taken away at preſent, for fear he " ſhould be great and happy hereafter; nay, and " to be taken away by them too who are to " go ſharers with him. But the wrath of God " will fall heavier upon you ſtill, if you pro- " ceed to execute ſo barbarous a piece of cru- " elty; for you will thereby diſappoint your- " ſelves of enjoying a ſhare in that proſperity " and happineſs, and thoſe bleſſings which " God for the ſake of his virtues and good- " neſs has promiſed he will confer upon him."

Joſeph's brethren inexorable, Ver. 22.

Rubel uſed all theſe and more arguments, either to deter or diſſuade them from this accurſed attempt; but when he found them ſo abſolutely inexorable, that neither humanity, reaſon, nor religion could prevail, and that the peremptory ſentence was pronounc'd, he bethought himſelf of a certain middle way of qualifying the matter. Well, ſays he, ſince the death of this our brother is abſolutely decreed, you have nothing elſe to do but to make the ſin, the envy, and the ſcandal of it as eaſy as you can; and therefore my advice is rather to caſt him into the next pit, and there leave him to periſh, without imbruing your hands in his blood. The motion was approv'd, and Rubel tied a rope about Joſeph, by which he let him gently down into a dry well, and preſently went his way to look after his ſheep.

Joſeph caſt into a dry well, Ver. 24.

RUBEL had no ſooner turn'd his back, but there appear'd in ſight a troop of Arabian merchants (Iſhmaelites) who came from Galaad with ſpices and Syrian commodities, which they were carrying into Egypt. * Judas, upon this occaſion adviſed the taking of Joſeph out of the well to ſell him to theſe merchants, by which means they might be quit of him, and out of danger of ever ſeeing him again, and at the ſame time avoid polluting their hands in his blood. This was agreed to, ſo that they took up Joſeph out of the well, and ſold him to the merchants, being ſeventeen years of age, for twenty pieces of ſilver.

Taken out and ſold to Arabian merchants, Ver. 28.

Rubel's care of his brother, Ver. 29.

RUBEL was contriving all this while how he might ſave his poor brother, and without a word ſpeaking to any of the reſt, he went late at night to the well, where he call'd ſeveral times to Joſeph; but hearing no anſwer, he preſently concluded that his brothers had murder'd him, and accordingly charged them with the fact; but when he came to know what had paſſed, he was very well ſatisfied with the proceeding. The next thing now to be thought of, was how to excuſe and palliate the matter to the father, ſo that the brothers might not be ſuſpected. They debated this point a while among themſelves, and came in the end to this concluſion, that they ſhould take Joſeph's travelling coat, which they ſtripped him of when they put him in the well, tear it and ſtain it with goat's blood, and ſo carry it to Jacob, that he might think his ſon was devour'd by wild beaſts. They came to the old man with this pretence, (who had heard ſomewhat already of his ſon's misfortune,) ſhew'd him the coat all torn and bloody, (at leaſt, ſaid they, if that were the coat Joſeph had on when he went out,) and ſo took it for granted that he was deſtroy'd by wild beaſts; for neither had they ſeen him, nor could they imagine what was become of him, as they pretended. Jacob comforted himſelf till now with the hope he might be taken priſoner, or poſſibly that ſome gentler ill hap might have befallen him, but upon the ſight of the blood and the coat, (for it appear'd to him evidently to be Joſeph's,) he immediately cloathed himſelf in ſack-cloth, and fell into ſo inconſolable a paſſion of ſorrow and lamentation, that he would not ſuffer either his ſons or his own reaſon to comfort him.

CHAP. IV.

Joſeph tempted to lewdneſs by Petepher's wife. His exemplary continence.

WHEN the merchants who had bought Joſeph came to Egypt, they ſold him to † Petepher, the head officer over king Pharaoh's kitchin, who treated him not like an ordinary ſervant, with reſpect either of liberty or diet, but with the freedom of a generous education, training him up to letters, and in a ſhort time advancing him to be overſeer of the houſe. In this change of condition his mind and his virtue were ſtill the ſame, and he gave evident demonſtration, by the prudence of his conduct, that a wiſe man will ſtand his ground in all fortunes. He was a ſtripling of ſo gracious a perſon, and ſo agreeable an addreſs, that Petepher's wife fell paſſionately in love with him, making no queſtion, but upon the firſt diſcloſing of her mind to him, the vanity and ambition of ſo great an honour would win him over to her. But ſhe made this judgment upon Joſeph, more upon the conſideration of the narrowneſs of his preſent circumſtances, than upon any reaſon ſhe had to ſuſpect the unchangeable dignity of his ſoul. However, in this confidence and opinion, ſhe told him in plain downright terms that ſhe had a mind to lie with him. He begg'd of her upon the very firſt motion, to deſiſt her ſolicitations upon that ſubject; for he could not be ſo ungrateful as to betray ſo kind a maſter, and to pay him with treachery and affront for all the obligations he had laid upon him. He adviſed her to ſmother that unruly paſſion, telling her he ſhould never be induced to oblige her in ſo criminal a requeſt. He ſhould account it a glory, he ſaid, to ſerve her in all lawful commands; but for any thing that was diſhoneſt, he could never ſubmit to it. This refuſal did but ſet her more and more on fire, for ſhe could not imagine that Joſeph would have rejected her offer. But when ſhe came to find that this would not do, ſhe ſet her wits to work upon another project. There was a great publick feaſt-day at hand, that commonly brought all the women of quality together. Petepher's wife made choice of this occaſion to feign herſelf ſick; whereupon ſhe took to her chamber, and laid hold of the opportunity of being alone with Joſeph. She got him, in ſhort, into her apartment, and there treated him with wonderful tenderneſs and reſpect, in words to this effect: "It would have been "much better for you, ſays ſhe, to have com- "plied fairly with my former requeſt; though "it had been but out of a regard to the dig- "nity of the petitioner, or the exceſs of my "paſſion; and it would have ſav'd me the "ſhame too of condeſcending to ſome words "and expreſſions that I am yet out of coun- "tenance to think of; but I hope you will "now have the wit to attone for your firſt "error. If you waited for a ſecond applica- "tion, you ſhall have it now a little more "artificial than it was before; for I have "counterfeited myſelf ſick on purpoſe to avoid "the jollity of the day, and to ſhew you that "I can quit all other converſation for the love "I bear you; or perhaps you might make "ſome doubt before, whether I was in ear- "neſt or not; but this is now to ſatisfy you "that I meant you no ill, by that I perſiſt "ſtill in the ſame mind; wherefore take your "choice now, whether you will improve this "opportunity of a preſent ſatisfaction in the "embraces of a perſon who loves you, and "from whom you may over and above expect "yet greater things, or ſtand the ſhock of "my hatred and revenge, if you ſhall preſume "to value yourſelf more upon the vain con- "ceit of your own chaſtity, than upon my "favour; and if it comes to that once, do "not flatter yourſelf into a fooliſh confidence "of eſcaping, with a dry oſtentation of your "virtue; for I will certainly accuſe you to "my husband of an attempt upon my honour; "and when the word is out once, true or falſe, "you will find more heed given to my charge "by Petepher, than to your juſtification."

She makes a ſecond attempt, Ver. 12.

THIS ſpeech was accompanied with prayers, menaces, and tears; but neither the one nor the other, neither compaſſion nor terror had the power to make any impreſſion upon his virtue; for he ſtood firm againſt all her threatnings, in an unalterable determination, rather to abide the worſt of extremities, than to yield to the lewd importunity of a diſhoneſt appetite; being in his own conſcience ſatisfied, that no puniſhment could be too great for a man who ſhould do ſo baſe a thing to pleaſe a woman. He was not wanting neither to put her in mind of her duty, both to herſelf and to her husband, and of what ſhe ow'd to piety, honeſty, cuſtom, and common fame. "What "ſignifies, ſays he, a momentary pleaſure at- "tended with a certain remorſe immediately "conſequent upon it? A heavineſs of heart "for a thing once done, and an utter impoſ- "ſibility of recalling and undoing it? Per- "petual fears of diſcovery and diſgrace? "What does all this ſignify, I ſay, in balance "with the moſt ſubſtantial comforts, and the "moſt neceſſary duties of human life? whereas "in a conjugal ſtate, the ſelf-ſame delights "are all free, ſafe, innocent, and warrantable "before God and man. Conſider again, how "it would leſſen your authority, to make your "ſervant your equal, by a ſhameful partici- "pation in one common crime. And pray, is "it not better to truſt to a good conſcience "that fears no light, than to commit wicked- "neſs in the dark, and ſpend all your days "in a reſtleſs dread of being detected?" Joſeph ſaid this, and a great deal more, to try if it were poſſible by words to do any good upon the paſſion of an impetuous woman, and to reduce his miſtreſs to ſobriety and reaſon. But all this was only adding more fuel to the fire, ſo that what ſhe could not obtain by intreaties, ſhe attempted by violence, catching hold of his garment to force him to commit lewdneſs with her. But Joſeph not being able to bear the extravagant folly of this ſhameleſs woman any longer, broke looſe from her, and ſo fled out of the door, and left his coat in her hand. She was at firſt miſerably diſtracted, betwixt the ſting of the repulſe, and the fear of being diſcover'd; but coming in an inſtant to a reſolution of outfacing the whole ſtory, and turning it upon Joſeph, by which means ſhe conſulted her ſecurity and revenge both in one, ſhe kept herſelf cloſe to her chamber, all in tears and trouble, imputing the paſſion ſhe was in at the diſappointment of her luſt to the ſcrupulous ſenſe of an indignity offer'd to her honour. While ſhe was in this diſorder and confuſion, in comes her husband, who taking notice of more than ordinary melancholy and diſorder in her countenance, enter'd preſently into a ſtrict enquiry what might be the matter. "Alas! my dear husband, ſays ſhe, you will "not deſerve to live, unleſs you make an ex- "ample of this perfidious and baſe wretch your "man. He has forgotten what he was when "you took him into your houſe; how kindly "and reſpectfully he has been treated here, "to a degree beyond his very hope, as well "as his deſert; the charge of your whole "family is committed to him, the command "of the reſt of your ſervants, and the truſt "of all you have. What will you think of "this fellow now, that, in requital of all "your bounties and good offices, could have "the impudence to offer at the violation of "your bed, and to take the opportunity of "this day of freedom, when you were out of "the way, to break in upon my privacy, and "preſs the enjoyment of his beaſtly ends? "This thankleſs villain that was effectually "the maſter of all other things under your "roof! would nothing ſerve him but he muſt "have your wife too? What a countenance "of modeſty did this wretch put on to blind "his maſter, without poſſeſſing one grain of "it in his diſpoſition and nature! Nay fur- "ther, ſays ſhe, in confirmation of all I have "ſaid, here is his garment too, which I laid "hold of when he would have forc'd me, "and which he was obliged to leave behind "him upon the ſtruggle."

THIS plauſible courſe of words, and the tears that went along with them, wrought ſo effectually upon the eaſy credulity and affection of Petepher, that being thoroughly ſatisfied with the virtue of his wife, on whom he doated, and reckoning himſelf as good as a witneſs of it too, there was no need or thought of farther enquiry or examination into circumſtances, ſtances, but all was taken for granted, and his wife celebrated for a woman of a moſt inviolable unſpotted faith. This was enough to caſt Joſeph into the common jail among the moſt infamous of malefactors.

CHAP. V.

Joſeph falſly accuſed, and committed to priſon; and what befel him there. His interpretation of ſeveral dreams.

Joſeph's patience and reſignation.

JOSEPH, in this condition, never concerned himſelf, either to make apologies in his own vindication, or remonſtrances of the truth of the ſtory; but committed his innocence to the protection of the Almighty, and bearing his chains with patience, ſupported himſelf with this comfort, that the power of God, who knew the juſtice of his cauſe, was greater than that of his enemies, as it ſoon appear'd in this following providence: For the keeper was ſo charmed with his fidelity and careful diligence in all he commanded him to do, together with the comelineſs of his perſon, that he diſcharged him of his irons, and by this means of a conſiderable part of his trouble; allowing him alſo better entertainment and better accommodations than the reſt of the priſoners uſually had. It was with Joſeph and his fellow-priſoners, as it is commonly with other people in their conditions. They had their intervals of time from labour, which they would imploy in talking and getting together in companies, and would be naturally enquiring of one another what this and t'other was in for. Upon this occaſion Pharaoh's butler, a man much in the king's eſteem, though at that time upon ſome unlucky diſſatisfaction he was a priſoner there, had contracted a familiarity with Joſeph. This butler had an high opinion of Joſeph's parts and underſtanding, and ſo took liberty to tell him of a dream he had, and to conſult Joſeph about the interpreting of it. He was very unhappy he ſaid, to be not only fallen under his maſter's diſpleaſure, but perplexed alſo with dreams and viſions of a more than ordinary quality. "Methought I ſaw (ſays he) three "branches of a vine, and a bunch of grapes "upon every branch, all ripe and ready to be "gather'd. I preſſed them myſelf, methought, "into a cup the king had in his hand; after "which I preſented his majeſty with the "wine, and he found it excellent." This was his dream, and he deſired Joſeph, if God had endow'd him with any skill that way, to give him an explication of it. Joſeph ſpake a word of comfort to him, and bad him "have "a good heart, for in three days time he "ſhould be ſet at liberty. The king had oc-"caſion for him, and he ſhould have his place "again. "The fruit of the vine, ſays Jo-"ſeph, is a gift of God, for the uſe and com-"fort of mankind. God accepts it himſelf "in his ſacrifices; it creates friendſhips, com-"poſes differences, diſſolves cares and melan-"choly, and turns ſadneſs into joy. The "king, you ſay, received the cup and the wine "from your hand; this imports great good to "you, and intimates that within as many "days as you ſaw branches, you may aſſure "yourſelf of your deliverance. Now, ſays "Joſeph, when you find this to be true, think "on me, when you yourſelf ſhall be free and "in proſperity, and do not forget thoſe you "have left behind you. I am not here a cri-"minal, but only puniſhed for prefering the "duty and honour of my maſter to a carnal "pleaſure." This interpretation could not but pleaſe the butler, and he waited cheerfully for the event.

His keeper kind to him, Ver. 22. 23.

Pharaoh's butler's dream. Gen. xl. Ver. 9, 10, 11.

Joſeph expounds it. Ver. 12, 13.

PHARAOH's chief baker was at that time in the ſame priſon: And finding ſo favourable an expoſition given of the butler's dream, he pleaſed himſelf in the hope of as fair an interpretation of a dream of his own too; conſulting Joſeph as the butler had done before, for the unfolding of it. "Laſt night (ſays he) "methought I had upon my head three baſ-"kets, two of bread, and a third of fleſh, "with other delicacies for a royal table. The "birds of the air fell violently upon them, "and devoured them, notwithſtanding all I "could do to fright them away." Now the baker expected as favourable a conſtruction of his viſion as the butler had; but it proved the contrary: For Joſeph told him that he could not ſpeak ſo comfortable things to him as he wiſh'd to do. "The two baskets, ſays he, "ſignify that you have only two days to live; "and that upon the third, you are to be cru-"cify'd upon a tree, and expoſed to the fowls "of the air; and there is no poſſibility of a-"voiding it."

Pharaoh's baker's dream. Ver. 16, 17.

Joſeph's interpretation of it. Ver. 18, 19.

EVERY thing came to paſs as Joſeph had foretold it; for upon the preciſe day, according to his prediction, the feſtival of Pharaoh's birth-day, the king order'd the baker to be crucify'd, and the butler to be reſtor'd to his office. When Joſeph had been two years a priſoner, and as a man utterly forgotten by the ungrateful butler, providence made uſe of this means for his deliverance. Pharaoh had two dreams in one night, and the viſion was expounded to him: He remembred the dreams, but forgot the interpretation of them any further, than that in general, they boded him no good. This ſo much diſturb'd Pharaoh's thoughts, that he ſummon'd a convocation of the learned'ſt doctors of the Egyptians to attend him early next morning, and to expound his viſions. They met, and conſulted; but finding themſelves unable to reſolve them, Pharaoh grew more out of humour than before. This occaſion brought the butler to bethink himſelf once again of Joſeph, and of his skill in that way of interpretation. Upon this he went to the king, and told him of Joſeph, and a viſion of his own that he had expounded to him, while they were together in priſon. And for the greater authority of his predictions, he himſelf was reſtor'd to his office, and the baker hang'd, upon the very day which he foretold. Joſeph, he ſaid, was the ſervant of Petepher, and at that time a priſoner upon his account. He avers himſelf to be an Hebrew, and of no obſcure family. You may be pleaſed, ſays the butler, to ſend for him, without any exception to the meanneſs of his preſent condition; for he will certainly inform your majeſty in the ſignification of your dreams. Let him be call'd immediately, ſays the king; and ſo the ſervants went all in haſte, and brought him. Pharaoh treated the young man very reſpectfully, and taking him by the right hand, ſpake to him courteouſly after this manner:

manner: "There is a ſervant of mine, ſays he, "that hath given you the character of a wiſe "man: He tells me that he hath found you "ſo himſelf, and very curious in one particu- "lar faculty, wherein I have at this inſtant a "ſpecial occaſion to employ you. He tells "me you have a ſingular talent in expounding "of dreams, and that you unfolded one for "him; pray do as much for me, and I ſhall "take it very kindly; but be ſure you make "things neither more nor leſs than they are, "either for fear or favour; but ſpeak the truth "freely, whether it makes for me or againſt "me. I was walking, methought, along the "river, and I ſaw ſeven large and well-fed "cattle come out of it, and go their ways to- "wards a paſture: After which I ſaw ſeven "lean ill-favour'd beaſts coming from the paſ- "ture to the river: They met, methought, "and the ſeven lean ones devoured the fat, "and were never the fuller for it." After this viſion I waked; and while my thoughts were at work upon the meaning of the dream, a ſudden heavineſs came upon me, and dropping aſleep again inſenſibly, I had a more wonderful apparition than the former, which put me into a great trouble and affright. "Me- "thought I ſaw ſeven ears of corn ſprung "from one root. They were ripe and ready "to cut, and ſo heavy laden, that their "heads bow'd under their burden. Not far "from this, I ſaw ſeven other ears, thin and "blaſted; and theſe ſtarv'd ears to my aſto- "niſhment devour'd the other."

Pharaoh's dream of ears of corn, Ver. 22. 23, 24.

JOSEPH upon this, told the king, That theſe two dreams, how differing ſoever in appearance, however denoted but one and the ſame event. "The ox, ſays he, is a crea- "ture deſign'd by providence for labour and "tillage. By the ſeven fat oxen, and the ſe- "ven lean ones; and ſo by the ſeven plump "ears of corn, and the ſeven blaſted ones, is "intimated ſeven years of plenty to come in "Egypt; and after that ſeven more of famine; "and by the lean oxen devouring the fat, and "the blaſted ears of corn, the full and plump "ones, is given to underſtand that the firſt "ſeven years will hardly be ſufficient to ſup- "ply the ſcarcity of ſeven others to come; "which I take to be demonſtrated in this, that "when the lean oxen had devoured the fat, "they were not yet ſatisfied; ſo that moſt "certainly the extremity will be very great. "Now God doth not reveal his ſecret purpo- "ſes to mankind, only to terrify and afflict "them; but for a timely warning to them, "that they may either provide againſt or "prevent the worſt. So that if your majeſ- "ty ſhall be pleaſed to order the laying up "of ſtores out of your abundance in the years "of plenty, for a reſerve againſt a time of "need, the following ſcarcity will be the leſs "grievous." The king ſtood in admiration at the ſagacity and wiſdom of Joſeph, and ſo demanded of him, what courſe he would adviſe in the preſent caſe for the obviating of thoſe difficulties to come. Joſeph propoſed a Regulation of expences; for parſimony, and the retrenching of ſuperfluities, would go a great way in the work. He was of opinion alſo, for laying up magazines of corn in barns and elſewhere, to be deliver'd out by allowance, and no more to be diſtributed than what was abſolutely neceſſary for bread and ſeed.

Joſeph expounds Pharaoh's dreams, V. 25, --32.

Joſeph's advice to provide againſt a famine, V. 33, --36.

PHARAOH was as much delighted with Joſeph's notions in œconomies, as with his skill in dreams; and ſo with great honour to his judgment and counſel, he gave him full power and authority, as ſupervifor of all his ſtores, to put his project in execution, in ſuch ſort and manner as he himſelf ſhould judge meet for the ſervice of his maſter, and the good of the publick. Upon the confering of this commiſſion, the king deliver'd him his ſigner, and granted him certain privileges of wearing purple, and riding in a chariot through all his dominions. Joſeph went now about his buſineſs, ſtoring up the corn wherever he came, and diſtributing among the husbandmen only ſuch a proportion, as might be barely ſufficient for their ſuſtenance, and for ſeed to ſow their grounds, without making any body acquainted with the reaſon of his proceedings.

Joſeph highly advanc'd by Pharaoh, Ver. 40, &c.

CHAP. VI.

Joſeph highly in the king's favour. The adventures of himſelf and his brethren upon their coming into Egypt.

JOSEPH was now thirty years of age, and ſo remarkably great in the king's favour for his extraordinary wiſdom, that he gave him the name of * Pſonthomphanec, which in the Egyptian tongue ſignifies, the finder out of hidden things.

Pſonthomphanec.

HE took to wife Aſaneth, the daughter of † Petephera, ‖ high-prieſt of Heliopolis, which was a match of the king's making, and a very great honour. He had two children by her before the famine; the elder he called Manaſſes, or Oblivion, becauſe Joſeph's better fortune made him forget the worſe; the younger Ephraim, or Reſtitution, becauſe he was reinſtated in the freedom of his anceſtors.

Joſeph marries Aſaneth. Ver. 50.

Manaſſes and Ephraim, V. 51, 52.

JOSEPH'S ſeven years of plenty in Egypt were now paſt, and in the eighth began the famine, according to his prediction. The calamity was a ſurprize, and brought huge multitudes of people into diſtreſs, flocking from all quarters about the king's gates. Whereupon Joſeph was preſently call'd, who took ſuch care for their relief, that with one voice they celebrated him as the ſaviour of the nation. Nor did he open the ſtores only to the people of the country, but to foreigners alſo; Joſeph reckoning upon it, that the univerſality of mankind are, in truth, all of a blood, and that it is the duty of men in proſperity to aſſiſt their brethren in diſtreſs.

A Famine in Egypt, V. 54.

Now this miſery did not fall upon Egypt alone, but ſeveral other countries ſuffer'd under the like ſcarcity, and Chanaan in particular; ſo that Jacob being informed that ſtrangers were admitted to deal for corn in Egypt, ſent all his ſons thither to buy proviſions, ſave only Benjamin, the ſon of Rachel, and own brother of Joſeph.

Jacob's ſons, all but Benjamin, ſent into Egypt for corn. Gen. xlii V. 3, 4.

So ſoon as the ten brothers were come into Egypt, they made their application to Joſeph, only for leave that they might have corn for their money. Now Joſeph was in ſo great favour with the king, that there was nothing to

to be done at court, but by his influence. Joſeph knew his brothers at firſt ſight, though they knew not him; for alas! he was taken away young, and age had alter'd his features, and given him the air and faſhion of quite another perſon; beſides, that no body could have expected Joſeph either in that country, or in that poſt of authority. Finding himſelf not known, and not ſo much as any ſuſpicion of him, Joſeph reſolved within himſelf to make ſome trial of his brothers, to ſee how they ſtood inclin'd; and ſo for a countenance, he not only denied them corn, but charged them as ſpies, and criminals of ſtate. "My friends, "ſays he, you ſay you are brothers, whereas "you appear to be no better than a cabal of "conſpirators, and of ſeveral nations too. "How can any body believe ſo many extra-"ordinary perſons, as you undoubtedly are, "to be only the ſons of one private man? "when hardly any prince can boaſt of ſuch "an iſſue." Joſeph put this upon them to try if he could pump out any thing concerning his father, and how matters had been managed in the family ſince his time, and what was become of his brother Benjamin; for he was not a little afraid leſt that they might have ſerved him as they would have done himſelf. This way of proceeding put them all into a conſternation, they found themſelves in danger, and the end of a long journey, as they thought, wholly diſappointed. But ſomething muſt be ſaid however to clear themſelves from the imputation of ſo foul a charge, and Rubel the eldeſt brother, in the name of the reſt, undertook the defence of the common cauſe. "We "are not come hither, ſays he, to pry into "matters of ſtate, or attempt any thing upon "the perſon of the king, or the peace of his "government. It is mere want of bread that "hath driven us hither for refuge, or I might "ſay, that your humanity hath effectually "invited us, in granting the freedom of your "markets for corn to ſtrangers, as well as to "your own people, as we are informed you "have. That we are one man's children, "may in ſome meaſure be collected from the "very reſemblance of our faces, and it is true "we are ſo. Our father's name is Jacob, by "birth an Hebrew. There were twelve ſons "of us that he had by four women, and ſo "long as they all liv'd, things went well "enough with us; but one of the number, "whoſe name was Joſeph, being taken away, "we fell into misfortunes. Our father lives "ſtill a mourner for that loſs, and his incon-"ſolable ſorrows are no leſs an affliction at "this day to us, than was the untimely death "of our deareſt brother. We come hither, "under your favour, to buy corn, and in our "abſence the care of our good father is com-"mitted to our youngeſt brother Benjamin. "If it be doubted whether we ſpeak truth "or not, it is but ſending a meſſenger to our "father to learn the certainty."

Joſeph pretends to take his brethren for ſpies, Ver. 9.

Rubel ſpeaks for himſelf and his brethren, Ver. 10,--13.

THIS was Rubel's ſpeech, for the ſatisfaction of Joſeph, and on the behalf of himſelf and his brothers. Now Joſeph finding that his father and brother were ſafe and well; commanded the brethren to be all taken into cuſtody, upon pretence of calling them to a ſtricter account at better leiſure. At three days end they were brought to him again; "And well, my friends, ſays Joſeph, here "you affirm to me that you are come hither "without any malicious deſign upon the go-"vernment, and that you are all the ſons of "the ſame father Jacob. Now for the truth "of all you ſay, you ſhall leave one of your "brethren with me as an hoſtage, that when "you ſhall have deliver'd the corn you come "for to your father, you ſhall return back "again, and bring along with you the other "brother that you ſay you have left behind. "In the mean time your hoſtage ſhall be well "uſed: this, and nothing elſe, will convince "me that you are honeſt men." Theſe words went to their hearts, for they fancied themſelves upon the very brink of ruin: they deplored their ill hap, and were continually crying out to one another, that all this was only a divine vengeance that purſued them for their barbarity to their poor brother. Rubel reprimanded them for the vanity and the folly of a late and unprofitable repentance; telling them frankly, that there was no remedy but patience under the judgment of a juſt God, upon a wicked brood of brothers. Theſe diſcourſes paſſed among themſelves, in confidence that no body there underſtood Hebrew. Rubel with this cutting liberty wounded them to the ſouls, lamenting one to another, why they could not think of this in time, and their conſciences ſtill ſuggeſting to them, that the wrath of God had juſtly overtaken them. Theſe reflections put the brothers into ſuch a horror of deſperation and confuſion, that Joſeph was fain to withdraw for fear of diſcovering himſelf, being no longer able to forbear weeping. After a little ſtay, he came in again, took Simeon for a pledge of their return, and gave them a licence for their corn; but a ſervant was order'd underhand to convey the money they paid for it into their baggage, which was accordingly done, and ſo they departed.

Joſeph orders his brethren to be taken into cuſtody, Ver. 16, 17.

Troubled in conſcience upon Joſeph's account, Ver. 21.

UPON the return of Jacob's ſons into Chanaan, they told their father the whole ſtory of their adventure in Egypt; how they were ſeized for ſpies, and could not be believed, either that they were all brethren, or had left another brother behind them; ſo that they were forc'd to leave Simeon for a pledge that they ſhould come back again, and bring Benjamin with them to vouch what they ſaid, begging earneſtly of their father to let him go without any further heſitation. Jacob was very much diſpleaſed, and highly diſapprov'd of what they had done, in leaving Simeon: but it cut him to the very heart, like a death-wound, to think of parting with Benjamin alſo, though Rubel offer'd to anſwer with the lives of his own children for the other's ſafety and return. They were in a dreadful perplexity what to do; and nothing ſtagger'd them more, than when they came to find their money in their ſacks. But their proviſions waſting all this while, and their wants increaſing, Jacob through compulſion, not inclination, was half in the mind ſometimes to venture his ſon Benjamin with the reſt; for there was no thought of ever returning to Egypt, without keeping their conditions. Their neceſſities preſſed harder and harder upon them, and the brothers importunities were not wanting neither; but nothing could move Jacob yet, till in the concluſion, Judas, a man of a bold and free ſpirit, took the liberty to argue the caſe with his father after another manner. "Methinks, ſays he to his father, you are a "little too ſolicitous for Benjamin. He muſt "ſubmit to the will of God, whether he be "abroad or at home; and we are all to be "delivered to a certain deſtruction in the loſs "of Pharaoh's friendſhip, for fear of I know "not what, that may poſſibly befal our little "brother; but what will you ſay now, if the "Egyptians ſhould deſtroy Simeon, while you "are demurring and trifling away time about "Benjamin. Truſt God in all events, and "reſt aſſured, that I will either periſh myſelf, "or bring him ſafe home again." Jacob was at length prevail'd upon, and deliver'd up the child; gave them double the price of the corn with them, and preſents of the fruits of the land of Chanaan for Joſeph, the perſon with whom they treated; as balm, myrrh, turpentine, honey, &c. and ſo with a flood of tears on both ſides, they tenderly parted; the father in a deſperate anxiety for fear he ſhould never ſee his ſons again, and the ſons under as diſmal apprehenſions for fear this very ſeparation ſhould be the death of their father. They ſpent a whole day upon this mournful ſubject, and in the end Jacob betook himſelf to his ſolitude, and the ſons proſecuted their journey, in hopes of ſomewhat to come that might balance their preſent affliction.

Jacob ſends Benjamin with preſents, Gen. xliii. 15.

The brethren addreſs to Joſeph, Ver. 20, 21, 22.

So ſoon as ever they came into Egypt, they addreſs'd themſelves to Joſeph; not a little concern'd for fear the money they found in their ſacks ſhould be charg'd upon them as a cheat. But upon laying the matter before Joſeph's ſteward, and telling him, how that finding their money in their ſacks without knowing how it came there, they had now brought it back again to reſtore it, the ſteward anſwer'd them boldly that he knew nothing of the buſineſs. Their hearts upon this were a little more at eaſe, eſpecially when they ſaw their brother Simeon at liberty. Joſeph, by this time was come from waiting upon the king, and while they were making their preſents, he fell to asking them queſtions; as how their father did, and the like; they told him well. His fears for Benjamin were now over too; for he ſaw him in the company, and asked them again, if that were the youngeſt of the brothers, and they told him yes; whereupon he ſaid no more than this, "God's providence "is over all things," and ſo went out, though againſt his will, to weep in private; for the emotions of natural affection had drawn tears into his eyes in ſuch abundance, that he could not forbear venting them any longer. That evening he gave them an invitation to ſupper with him, where he ranged them in the ſame order they uſed in their father's houſe, treating them all with exceeding courteſy, but Benjamin's portion was double to any of the reſt.

Simeon ſet at liberty, Ver. 23.

Joſeph treats his brethren at ſupper, Ver. 32, 33, 34.

AFTER ſupper, when the company was retir'd, Joſeph order'd the meaſuring of their corn, and bad his ſteward put the money into their ſacks as before, and to convey into Benjamin's ſack a certain ſilver cup that he himſelf had a particular fancy for, and always uſed to drink out of. This he did to try whether they would ſtand by Benjamin, in caſe he ſhould be charged with the theft, or abandon him in diſtreſs, and ſo return to their father without him. This was all done according to order. By break of day the next morning, they ſet forward on their journey, not in the leaſt ſuſpecting any trick to be put upon them, and mightily pleaſed at the thought that they had got Simeon ſafe, and Benjamin ſo far on his way back again, according to their engagement. As they were travelling on, they found themſelves all on a ſudden ſurrounded with troops of horſe, amongſt whom was the ſervant who had put the cup into the ſack. This ſurprize tranſported them into clamours and exclamations againſt the inhumanity of ſuch a practice from the ſame people who had but juſt now treated them with ſo much hoſpitality and honour. The Egyptians, on the other ſide, tax'd them with villany and ingratitude for returning only injuries, where they had received ſo many civilities and benefits; and threatened they ſhould be ſpeedily brought to condign puniſhment, for the theft they had committed. They might, indeed, put tricks, they ſaid, upon the butler; but there was an all-ſeeing eye above that would certainly detect them. They had brought matters now to ſuch a paſs, that there was nothing to be expected but immediately to receive the juſt reward of their treachery. At this inſolent rate they inſulted them, but the ſervant above all the reſt; inſomuch, that they who were intirely ignorant of the plot, could not forbear reproaching the man with folly and indiſcretion for accuſing them of theft, who when they found the corn money in their ſacks, had the honeſty to bring it back and reſtore it, though none beſides their own conſciences knew any thing of the matter; but ſearching, they ſaid, would gain more credence, and prove or diſprove the fact better than the moſt poſitive denial of it; and ſo without any more words they offer'd up themſelves, bag and baggage, to the ſcrutiny; and if any one of them ſhould be found guilty, they were all willing to ſuffer for it; ſo ſecure did they reckon themſelves in the conſcience of their own innocence. The Egyptians took them at their words, and fell to ſearching; "but "heaven forbid, they cried, if any one of "them ſhould be detected, the innocent "ſhould ſuffer for the guilty." They took them in order, and ſo paſſed from one to another, till they came at laſt to Benjamin; not that they were ignorant in whoſe ſack the cup was, but that they might ſeem to make a more ſtrict and methodical ſearch. All the reſt were now ſafe and clear, and the whole concern they were now in was for him only: they confided, however, that he would be found as guiltleſs and innocent as themſelves, and therefore they might, they thought, take the more liberty and freedom to retort upon the Egyptians the ill language they had given them, and ſhew their reſentment of their troubleſome and unneceſſary impertinence, who from groundleſs ſuſpicions, and ill-founded conjectures of their diſhoneſty, had ſtopp'd them on the road, and been a conſiderable hindrance to them in their journey. Being now come to Benjamin's ſack, out came the ſilver cup at once, which they that put it there could have found as well at firſt, if the method of the contrivance would have born it. Upon this diſcovery they all broke out into tears, extravagant actions, and paſſionate lamentations; tearing their garments, and crying ing out like men diſtracted, their brother was undone! what would become of that poor brother of theirs! how ſhould they anſwer for him to his father! and then to miſcarry now too, when they thought all was over! "It was not for nothing, they cried, that the "good man was ſo unwilling to part with "him, and we muſt be preſſing of him to let "him go; ſo that our father is ruin'd, and "the blame of all this muſt be laid at our "door."

Benjamin ſeized, and carried to Joſeph.

THE officers carried Benjamin away to Joſeph, and his companions went along with him. Benjamin being now a priſoner, and his brethren ſtanding round him in a ſorrowful condition, Joſeph looking upon them, reproach'd them in words to this purpoſe; "And is it ſo "then, ſays he, ye vileſt of men, that with-"out any regard either to the good offices of "hoſpitality, or to the diſpenſations of divine "providence, you ſhould put ſo ungrateful "an affront upon your patron and benefac-"tor?" The brothers interpoſing their requeſts, that their perſons might be accepted of in exchange for that of their unfortunate brother, and the puniſhment due to his offence inflicted upon them inſtead of him; and then they made mention of Joſeph's name over and over again, how happy it was for him that he was out of this miſerable life, (at leaſt if he was ſo,) or if yet living, how much it was to his honour, if that the ſevere vengeance of God ſhould be inflicted upon them for his ſake. They went on, accuſing and condemning of themſelves, as the authors and inſtruments of their father's afflictions, in reviving and increaſing his old ſorrows with the addition of this new one; Rubel at every turn reproaching them with the execrable wickedneſs they had been guilty of with regard to their brother. Joſeph, as upon conſideration, told them at length, that truly for the innocent, as he did not think it fair to make one man bear the puniſhment of another man's tranſgreſſion, ſo neither did he judge it reaſonable to diſcharge the offender at the inſtance of the guiltleſs, or to puniſh them all alike; wherefore, ſays he, you may return when you pleaſe, and it ſhall be my care to provide you a ſafe paſſage; and for your brother, I ſhall content myſelf with him alone for an example.

Judas expoſtulates on Benjamin's behalf, Gen. xliv. 16, &c.

THESE words ſtruck them all dumb, ſave only Judas, who was a man of wit and courage, and the only perſon who perſuaded Jacob to part with his ſon. This Judas took up a generous reſolution, upon this occaſion, of running any riſque to ſave him, as he had promiſed his father; and hereupon applied himſelf to Joſeph in theſe words: "We can-"not but confeſs, moſt excellent governor, "that the fact now in queſtion is a heinous "tranſgreſſion, and a crime that deſerves pu-"niſhment. The guilt, it is true, falls only "upon one of us, and the youngeſt; but "though we are not all in fault, we are all "ready yet to ſuffer for it. As to the poor "young man, we ſhould give him for loſt, if "it were not for the confidence we have in "your clemency and goodneſs. We muſt "therefore appeal from the ſtrict conſidera-"tion of the fact, to the benignity of your "own nature; and to your native tenderneſs, "from the heat of your indignation, anger "being a paſſion only for narrow ſouls; and "therefore we make no doubt but your vir-"tue and moderation will ſet bounds to your "diſpleaſure; for with ſubmiſſion, it would "not be for your honour to deſtroy a ſort of "people that voluntarily deliver up themſelves "to your juſtice, and deſire only to become "indebted for their lives to your mercy; "which in effect would be but the bounty of "giving us the ſame lives over again; for "when we were in diſtreſs for want of corn, "what was it but the diſpatch and generoſity "of your relief, that preſerved us and our "whole family from periſhing by famine? "now to relieve men in extream neceſſity for "for want of food, and to forgive an of-"fender that ſtands in need of a pardon, is "but an effect of the ſame tenderneſs, in an-"other way of expreſſing it; the one ſaves "the life, and the other ſpares it. You are "now but to ſave whom you have fed for the "very end of ſaving them; which end is loſt, "if you do not preſerve the lives you have "given; and in ſo doing we ſhall become your "debtors, not only for the neceſſaries of life, "but for life itſelf. This occaſion looks as if "God himſelf, for your greater glory, had "furniſhed expreſs matter for your virtue to "work upon; and that the world may ſee "you are merciful as well as liberal, and take "more delight in doing good offices to others, "than in revenging injuries done to yourſelf. "It is, I muſt confeſs, a generous diſpoſition "to be human and charitable; but there is no "ornament that becomes greatneſs like cle-"mency, eſpecially when that clemency is "exercis'd upon the forgiving of affronts of-"fer'd to the forgiver himſelf. Now if it be "praiſe-worthy to paſs over even the ſmalleſt "faults, it is little leſs than divine, for a "man to moderate the reſentment of a capital "crime, and in his own caſe too. It is not "for the ſake of our own ſafety that I am "thus ſolicitous, but out of a ſenſe of the "anxious tenderneſs of a father for a child, "wh ich I am the more ſenſible of, by the "experience I have had of the violence of "my father's paſſion upon the loſs of our "dear brother Joſeph. We ſhould not think "our own lives worth the ſtruggling for, "were it not for the deplorable conſequences "that our ruin would bring upon our aged fa-"ther when we are gone; ſaving that we "have ſome ſort of ambition likewiſe to be-"come indebted to your virtue, and to de-"clare ourſelves the monuments of your fame "and goodneſs. We do not beg, nor are we "ſo much concerned for ourſelves, though "we be a company of young men in the prime "and vigour of our youth, who have taſted as "yet but little of the pleaſures and enjoyments "of life, as for an antient father, a perſon "waſted with age and cares. It is in his "name, and for his ſake only, that we implore "your compaſſion upon us his ſons, who have "all rendered themſelves obnoxious to pu-"niſhment by this day's miſdemeanour. He "himſelf is undoubtedly a good man, and it "is none of his fault if we are not ſo too. "He has a thouſand griefs and terrors upon "him at this day, for fear we return not in "ſafety; and it were great pity ſo worthy a "perſon ſhould ſuffer under ſo mortal a ca-"lamity. When he ſhall hear that we are "dead, and upon what account, he will moſt

"infal-

" infallibly die likewiſe. The ſingle thought " of the infamy, nay, the very rumour of it " will kill him. We cannot deny, after all " this, the provocation to be great, and your " diſpleaſure juſt; but we may yet petition, " that the vengeance for it may not fall upon " our innocent father, and that for his ſake " you will be gracious to us. Be pleaſed but " to conſider his age and his condition, and " you may conclude that when we are gone, " he neither can nor will live without us. " Conſider but our father in your own, and " then in ours the common caſe of all fathers. " There is ſomething ſacred in the very name " of father, as being an appellation which " God himſelf vouchſafes to aſſume; and " God the father of all will certainly bleſs " you and your poſterity, for all the good you " ſhall do under the honour of that common " name, and on the behalf of a father that " otherwiſe muſt be left childleſs. Our lives " are in your hand, and it is at your choice " whether to give or take; the one you may " do with juſtice, and the other will be an " act of grace; and having both indifferently " in your power, you may grant the latter in " imitation of God himſelf, without putting " the other to the ſtreſs, and employ your " prerogative for the good and preſervation of " mankind. Now the more lives you ſave, " the more honourable will be your fame, " and in preſerving our brother, you preſerve " us all; for upon his ſafety depends ours, and " we are never to ſee our father again without " him; ſo that whatever he ſuffers, we muſt " ſuffer too. Neither have we, moſt illuſtrious " governor, any thing more to crave, if we " cannot obtain this, than that we all may " be join'd in the puniſhment, as if we had " been complices in the fact; which would " be much eaſier to us, than to be forc'd by " an inſupportable deſpair to lay violent hands " upon ourſelves. I might offer further on " his behalf, that he is young, and has not " ſeen much of the world; and that under " theſe circumſtances it is a very rare thing to " put people to extremities. But to come to " a concluſion, if we are condemn'd for want " of a competent defence, it muſt lie at my " door; if acquitted, we ſhall aſcribe it wholly " to your generoſity and goodneſs; adding " this further to your honour, that in the ſa- " ving of us you give us a new life, and con- " ſult better for us than we could do for our- " ſelves; but if it ſhall yet be found abſolutely " neceſſary that ſomewhat be done for the ſa- " tisfaction of a rigorous juſtice, I muſt affec- " tionately beſeech you to accept of me in the " place of my brother, that I may abide his " puniſhment, and the young man be ſent " away to his father. Or if the ſentence ſhould " be ſlavery, my body may be able to do you " the better ſervice of the two; and I am " ready indifferently to ſubmit either to the " one or to the other."

When Judas had ſaid and offer'd all that was poſſible toward the pacifying of the governor, and the eaſing of his brother, he threw himſelf at Joſeph's feet, and all the reſt after him, in a joint mediation for Benjamin.

Joseph by this time found himſelf ſo overcome with tenderneſs and natural affection, that he could no longer act the part of an angry judge, and therefore he order'd all that were preſent to withdraw, that he might make himſelf known to his brethren, without any witneſſes; ſo that having got them by themſelves, he made a diſcourſe to them to this effect: " I cannot, ſays he, but be exceedingly " delighted to find you ſo friendly and com- " paſſionate to your brother; which I muſt " confeſs exceeded my expectation, conſidering " ſome paſt circumſtances in my own caſe that " were not ſo good-natur'd. It was my end, " in what I have now done, to make ſome " trial of your brotherly love upon this occa- " ſion; which I have now receiv'd ſo fair a " proof of, that I cannot impute any thing " you ever did againſt me to gall or malice; " but the hand of God was in it, whoſe pro- " vidence hath now made uſe of that action, " as the means of a preſent comfort to you, " in giving us the hope of greater bleſſings " yet to come, by the continuance of God's " favour and protection. But ſince I am now " come to underſtand that my father is in ſuch " a ſtate, as I could better with than expect, and " my brothers the tender men that they ought " to be, all paſt injuries are as if they had " never been; and I am rather to give you " my thanks, as the inſtruments of divine pro- " vidence for our common advantage, than " to upbraid you now with former actions, " which at that time perhaps carried a coun- " tenance of evil: and pray let theſe things be " forgotten on your part too, and ſet your hearts " at reſt, without diſcompoſing yourſelves for " errors not to be recall'd, and for lewd pur- " poſes that never took effect, ſince it hath " pleaſed God to bring good out of evil. Go " your ways back therefore to your father, with " all joy and comfort, and tell him the won- " derful things that God hath done for you. " Go and diſpatch, for fear of any diſaſter his " very grief and apprehenſion may bring up- " on him elſe before you ſee him, which would " utterly blaſt all the hopes I have of happi- " neſs, both in the ſight of him, and in an " enjoyment with him of all the bleſſings that " I am poſſeſs'd of; wherefore be gone, and " make haſte back again; and be ſure you " bring my father, your wives, children, and " all your kindred along with you; for I " ſhould be loth to have my deareſt friends at " ſuch a diſtance from me, when there are five " years of famine yet more to come." With theſe words Joſeph embrac'd his brothers, who could not but burſt out into tears and lamentations, reflecting upon their wicked practices againſt him. But nothing went nearer their hearts, than to conſider how baſely they had dealt with ſo worthy a brother. After this a ſumptuous banquet being prepared, they all ſeaſted together.

Joseph makes himſelf known to his brethren, Gen. xlv. 1.

Joſeph ſends his brothers for their father, &c. Ver. 13.

When the king came to underſtand that Joſeph's brothers were come, the news was as welcome to him as if ſome great good fortune had befallen him, inſomuch that he order'd wagons with corn, gold, and ſilver to be ſent, and preſents for their father, beſide what Joſeph gave them; ſome for the father, ſome for the brothers themſelves, but the beſt of all for Benjamin, and ſo they return'd.

CHAP. VII.

Jacob hearing how ſplendidly his ſon Joſeph liv'd in Egypt, repairs to him there with his family.

The hiſtory of Joſeph's adventures, Ver. 26, 27.

UPON the arrival of Jacob's ſons with their father, they told him the whole Hiſtory of Joſeph's adventures: How he was not only living, after ſo long and ſad a mourning for him, but in great power and ſplendor: Pharaoh's firſt miniſter; and, next to the king himſelf, the moſt eminent perſon in his dominions. Jacob made no difficulty of believing what was told him, but enter'd into a contemplation of God's infinite Grace and favour to him, tho' for ſome time ſeemingly diſcontinued, and ſo without any delay, he and his people haſten'd away to Joſeph.

Jacob ſacrifices at Beerſheba, Gen. xlvi. 1.

WHEN Jacob came to the well called the Well of Oath, he offer'd up a ſacrifice; but ſomewhat uneaſy within himſelf, for fear the plenty of Egypt ſhould debauch his ſons, and tempt them to ſettle there, and ſo divert his poſterity from returning to Chanaan, and the land which God had promis'd him. He had ſome ſcruple too, leaſt God ſhould ſtrike him and his family with ſome judicial calamity, even for undertaking the preſent journey, without imploring counſel and direction from above; or that he himſelf ſhould die before he came to Joſeph. As he lay pondering with theſe thoughts in his head, he fell faſt aſleep; and God appeared to him in a viſion, calling him twice by his name. Jacob asked who was there, and the viſion made him anſwer, "Haſt

God appears to Jacob in a viſion, Ver. 2.

"thou forgotten thy God then, Jacob? the "God of thy forefathers that never failed, ei-"ther them or their poſterity, in a time of "need? That God who appointed you the "head of your family, contrary to your fa-"ther's intent; and when you went ſingle in-"to Meſopotamia, bleſſed you with an advan-"tageous match, and brought you back again "full of wealth and children? That God who "hath ſtill been the protector and guardian of "your family, and advanced your ſon Joſeph, "whom you gave for loſt, to a degree of ho-"nour next to the king in Egypt? I am now "coming to be your conductor in your preſent "Journey, and to foretel you, that you ſhall "end your days in the arms of your ſon Jo-"ſeph; that your poſterity ſhall be powerful "and famous for many ages, and come at laſt "to the land I have promis'd them."

Jacob advances towards Egypt, Ver. 5, 6, 7.

JACOB, putting confidence in this viſion, marched chearfully on himſelf toward Egypt, and his people, to the number of ſeventy perſons. Their names are a little uncouth, and I ſhould have paſſed them over, but for the ſatisfaction of thoſe that will have us to be Egyptians, not Meſopotamians.

The children of Jacob, Ver. 8, &c.

JACOB had twelve ſons. Joſeph being gone away before, we ſhall only give an account now of the reſt ſeverally, and of their iſſue.

RUBEL had four ſons; Anoch, Phalles, Eſſaron, and Charmi.

Gen. xlvi. 9. Hezron. ib. Carmi.

SIMEON had ſix ſons; Jumil, Jamin, Ohad, Jachin, Zoar, and Shaul.

Ver. 11. Coath.

LEVI had three ſons; Gerſhon, Chaath, and Merari.

Ver. 12. Shelah. ib. Zerah. Ver. 12. Hazael.

JUDAS had three ſons; Salah, Phares, and Zarah.

PHARES had two ſons; Eſron, and Amyr.

ISSACHAR had four ſons; Thulas, Phuas, Jaſob, and Samaron. Ver. 13. Tola, Phuvah, Job, Shimron.

ZABULON had three ſons; Sarad, Elon, and Jalel. Ver. 14. Sered, Elon, Jahleel.

JACOB had theſe children by Leah; who carry'd with her her daughter Dinah; and all theſe together amount to the number of thirty three perſons.

JACOB had over and above, by Rachel, Joſeph and Benjamin.

JOSEPH had two ſons; Manaſſes and Ephraim.

BENJAMIN had ten ſons; Bolau, Baccharis, Aſabel, Gera, Naaman, Ies, Ros, Momphis, Opphis, and Arad: And theſe fourteen perſons added to the other thirty three, make the number of forty ſeven. Theſe were Jacob's legitimate ſons, beſide Dan and Nephthali, which he had by Bilhah. V. 21. Belah. ib. Becher. ib. Aſhbel. ib. Ehi, Roſh. ib. Muppim, and Huppim, and Ard.

DAN had but one ſon; and he called him Uſis. Ver. 23. Huſhim.

NEPHTHALI had four ſons; Jeſel, Guni, Iſſares, and Sellim; and theſe added to thoſe above, make the number of fifty four. Ver. 24. Jahzeel, Guni, Jezer, and Shillem.

JACOB had alſo by Zilpah, Gad and Aſſer.

GAD had ſeven ſons; Saphonias, Augis, Sunis, Azabon, Aerin, Eroed, and Ariel. V. 16. Ziphion, Haggai, Shuni, Eſbon, Eri, Arodi, Areli.

ASSER had one daughter, Sarah, and ſix ſons; Jomnes, Iſus, Iſuis, Baris, Abar, and Melchiel. Now theſe fifteen added to the other fifty four, if we include Jacob, amount, as is ſaid before, to the exact number of ſeventy. Ver. 17. Jimnah, Iſhuah, Iſua, Beriah, and Serah their Siſter: The Sons of Beriah, Hebor, and Malchiel.

As they were advancing upon the way, Judas went before with the intelligence to Joſeph, that Jacob was coming, who preſently ſet out to receive him, and they met at a place call'd Heropolis. Jacob, at the greeting, had like to have expir'd in a tranſport of joy; and Joſeph's ſurprize was not much leſs: But his own danger did not hinder him from taking care of his father, being the weaker of the two. After this, he took five of his brethren along with him, and poſted away to the king with the tidings of their arrival, ordering the reſt to advance by eaſy journeys. The king was very glad of the news, and enquir'd of Joſeph what buſineſs or profeſſion they chiefly apply'd themſelves to. Joſeph anſwer'd, that their employment was wholly paſtoral, and that they minded nothing elſe. He gave this anſwer for two reaſons: Firſt, to keep them together that they might be within diſtance of ſerving their father: Secondly, to prevent ſtrife and emulation with the Egyptians, by interfering with any of their commiſſions; for theſe people were not allow'd to concern themſelves in flocks and paſtures. Jacob, upon his arrival, was brought before the king, who asking him his age, he told him, an hundred and thirty: Pharaoh ſeeming mightily ſurpriz'd at his great age, Jacob added further, that his anceſtors commonly liv'd a great while longer; ſo the king appointed Jacob, and his ſons to go and live in Heliopolis, where the king had his flocks and ſhepherds.

Jacob conducted to Pharaoh. Gen. xlvii. 7, 8, 9. Heliopolis aſſign'd Jacob for his Habitation. Gen. xlvii. 11. Rameſes.

THE famine at this time increaſed grievouſly in Egypt, and no redreſs. The overflowing of the Nile that was wont to water the country, and make it fruitful, was ſuſpended, no rain at all, and the generality of the people, for want of foreſight, utterly without ſtores, and no grain to be had but for ready money; and when that fail'd, they gave their land, cattle, and ſlaves, in exchange for corn. By this means all came into the king's hands, while the miſerable multitude went, ſome one way, and ſome another, ſubmitting to any miſery rather than ſtarving; only the prieſts preſerv'd their freedom, and their eſtates. This neceſſity in the concluſion made the people's minds as ſervile as their bodies; for they accounted nothing mean or ſcandalous that would procure them bread in their mouths, which way ſoever they came at it.

The famine increaſes in Egypt, V. 13.

The famine abates.

UPON the return of the Nile to its uſual ſtate, and courſe of watering and refreſhing the earth, the famine began by degrees to abate, and every thing to return to the condition it was in before. Joſeph hereupon viſited all the great towns and cities, call'd the people together, and put them into poſſeſſion of their lands again, which they had parted with to the king, reſerving a fifth part of the profits of them as a duty to the royal prerogative; charging them to be as good husbands for the king as they would for themſelves, if the grounds were entirely their own. The men were ſo ſurpriz'd with joy at this unlook'd for reſtitution, that they fell preſently to work upon tillage and improvement. This moſt generous piece of juſtice did mightily advance Joſeph's intereſt and authority, and engage the affection of the people to the king. And after this conceſſion, the aforeſaid fifth part was ſettled by an act of ſtate upon the crown for ever.

CHAP. VIII.

The death of Jacob, and of Joſeph.

Jacob dies in the arms of his children, Gen. xlviii. xlix.

WHEN Jacob had been ſeventeen years in Egypt, he departed this life in the arms of his children, wiſhing them plenty and proſperity, and foretelling them that their iſſue ſhould in time to come poſſeſs part of the land of Chanaan, which came afterwards to paſs. He mightily recommended to them the generoſity of Joſeph, for his goodneſs, in returning only kindneſſes and benefits for the moſt provoking of injuries; and expreſſing more tenderneſs for his mortal enemies, than was uſual with others to the beſt of friends; wherefore he laid his commands upon them to receive Ephraim and Manaſſes, Joſeph's children, into their number, when they ſhould come to ſhare the land of Chanaan, (but of this hereafter;)

Jacob recommends Ephraim and Manaſſes to his ſons, Gen. xlviii.

deſiring them at laſt, that his body might be buried in Hebron. He died at a hundred and forty ſeven years of age, not inferior for piety and virtue to any of his predeceſſors, and by the goodneſs of God he was crown'd with all ſorts of bleſſings. Joſeph, with the king's leave, cauſed his body to be tranſported to Hebron, where it was magnificently buried. The ſolemnity being over, the brothers made a great difficulty of going back again, for fear leaſt Joſeph ſhould execute revenge on them, now the father was dead, and no body left that could interpoſe to hinder miſchief; but Joſeph ſoon diſpoſſeſſed them of their fears, and prevail'd with them to return with him back again; beſtowing upon them large poſſeſſions, and upon all occaſions treating them with the moſt generous reſpect imaginable.

The death and character of Joſeph.

After this Joſeph alſo died, at the age of a hundred and ten years, a man of the ſtricteſt and moſt exact virtue; of profound wiſdom and prudence, and one who made ſo modeſt a uſe of his power, that no calumny, no not ſo much as that of Petepher's wife, nor the conſideration of his being a forcigner was of any diſſervice to him. In fine, he maſter'd all difficulties, and was advanced to the higheſt ſtation in the government, which he enjoy'd without either the envy or cenſure of any perſon whatſoever. The reſt of the brethren liv'd and died happily in Egypt too, and their bodies afterward, by their poſterity, were tranſported to Hebron, and there interr'd. The bones of Joſeph were laſt of all carried out of Egypt, when the Hebrews relinquiſh'd the country, according to his own appointment, and the oath which he made his ſons ſwear to him before he died. As to the hiſtory and adventures of theſe people, and how they made their way into the land of Chanaan, we ſhall treat of it in another place. But it ſhould be firſt ſeen how they came to quit the land of Egypt.

CHAP. IX.

The miſerable ſlavery of the Hebrews in Egypt, for four hundred years. The birth of Moſes, and the providence of his preſervation, by the means of Pharaoh's daughter.

The Egyptians a luxurious, envious people.

THE Egyptians are naturally a peeviſh, lazy ſort of people, abandon'd to their pleaſures, and their very ſouls ſet upon worldly riches, let them come which way they will. So that it was no wonder they ſhould caſt an envious eye upon the Hebrews, whom they found (juſt in a contradiction to their humour) a laborious, induſtrious people, abounding in men and treaſure; a people, in ſhort, whoſe happineſs they were not able to bear; beſide a jealouſy they had that their increaſe in wealth and number might make them dangerous. Joſeph's old ſervices being now forgotten, and the government of Egypt tranſlated into another family, the Iſraelites were no longer treated as friends, but as ſlaves; for all ſervile and coarſe offices of drudgery were impoſed upon them, even to the degree of putting their wits to work, to find out new ways of vexation and oppreſſion. They put them to the draining of rivers into chanels, walling of towns, caſting up of dikes and banks, to keep off inundations; nay, the erecting of phantaſtical pyramids, forcing them upon the learning of ſeveral painful trades, and tying them up to a perpetual reſtleſſneſs of labour: this was their life for a matter of four hundred years. The Egyptians, on the one hand, ſtriving to kill as many of them as they could by hard labour, while the Iſraelites on the other, patiently made the beſt of their misfortunes in all difficulties.

The Egyptian ſlavery, Exod. i. 13, 14.

WHILE the Egyptians were thus intent upon the deſtroying of them, there went a diſcourſe about, that made their malice againſt them yet more implacable, even to the degree of reſolving to root them out from off the face of the earth. There was a certain ſcribe, as they call'd him, a man highly eſteem'd for his predictions, who told the king that there was a Hebrew child to be born about that time, who would be a ſcourge to the Egyptians, and advance advance the glory of his own nation; and, if he liv'd to grow up, would be a man eminent for virtue and courage, and make his name famous to posterity. The king was so affrighted at this prediction, that by the counsel of the scribe, he order'd the Egyptian midwives carefully and strictly to attend the labours of all the Hebrew women; preserving the females, and casting the males into the river. He committed this trust to the Egyptians, as the least likely to be partial; and upon pain of death to them and their family, who should presume to conceal any child, or act contrary to this command.

A prophecy of a Hebrew child that ſhould curb the Egyptians.

An order to drown all the Hebrew males, Ver. 16.

THE barbarity of this bloody decree look'd several ways; first, as it depriv'd so many parents of their children; secondly, as it made those parents themselves accessary to the murder of their own issue; and then again, as they had in prospect an utter extinction of the whole race, for want of males to continue it, they were now brought to the last extremity. But there is no opposing of craft and violence to God's will and providence; for this child, of whom the scribe had foretold, was born and brought up privately and safe, in despite of all precautions, and liv'd to make good the scribe's predictions. The matter was carried thus:

THERE was one * Amaram, a Hebrew, a man of eminent quality and credit, who found himself in a great streight upon this decree, both in a publick and a private sense; one way, out of a respect to the whole nation that was to be extirpated by it; the other, in regard to his own particular, for his wife was then with child. In this distress of sorrow he offer'd up a prayer to Almighty God, "That he would "look down in pity upon a people that had "never departed from his worship; that he "would guide and protect them, and in his "good time put an end to a calamity that "struck at no less than the rooting out of the "whole stock." His prayer was heard, and God appear'd to him in a dream, telling him, "That as he had not forgotten the piety of "his predecessors, so neither would he fail "to reward them as he had done their ances-"tors;" encouraging Amaram to hope for better things. "It was I, said the vision, "who made you so mighty a nation from so "small a beginning; that brought Abraham "in his own single person out of Mesopota-"mia into Chanaan, and beside, other bles-"sings, gave him children by a woman, who "according to the course of nature, was past "child-bearing, and left vast possessions to "those who came after him; to Ishmael the "country of Arabia; Troglodytis to the chil-"dren of Cheturah, and to Isaac the land of "Chanaan. You cannot (without extreme "wickedness and ingratitude) forget the glo-"ry and successes of all your exploits when I "fought your battles. My blessings upon Ja-"cob and his posterity, who of † seventy "persons only that came into Egypt, are at "present multiplied to six hundred thousand. "The vision also assur'd him, that he would "provide for the common good of them all, "and for himself in particular; for the child "that the Egyptians stood in such dread of, "and for whose sake all the Hebrew males "were to be put to death; that child, the "vision said, should be born to him, come "happily into the world, escape all spies, have "an education provided for him, beyond what "could be expected, and in good time deli-"ver the Israelites from the Egyptian bondage, "and make his name glorious to eternity, "through all nations. This, and more, says "the vision, will I do for you and yours; "and he shall have a brother whom I will ho-"nour with the high-priesthood, and it shall "descend from him to his heirs for ever."

Amaram's prayer for the Hebrews.

God answers Amaram in a vision.

AMARAM, upon waking, gave his wife Jochabel the history of this vision, and the discourse put them both in great perplexity what to think of it; for they were now not only solicitous for the child, but to the highest degree incredulous also of the wonderful good things that were to come to pass; but after a while, Jochabel fell in labour, and her pains so short and easy, that all was over before the Egyptian midwives could take notice of it; by which providence they were brought to have more faith in the vision. After the child had been kept close three months, Amaram at last, for fear of a discovery that would destroy father, mother, child, and all at once, and likewise disappoint the prediction, determin'd to leave all to providence, reasoning upon it after this manner: If the child could be concealed, (as it was very difficult to do it, and very hazardous to attempt it,) they must live in danger every moment; but as to the power and veracity of God, they made no doubt of it, or of his ability to save them; so that whatever he had promised, he would certainly bring to pass. Upon this discourse they came to a resolution, and made a small cradle of bulrushes, ‡ fit for their purpose; twisted them together, pitched the joints, and when they had made it tight, and dressed it to hold water, they put in the child, and so committed them to the river, and to God's merciful protection. In this manner it was set a-float, and the stream carried it along. ||Mariam the child's sister was sent by her mother's order to watch it on the other side of the river, and see what became on't. This may serve now to convince mankind, that it is in vain for human wisdom to think of defeating the will and pleasure of the Almighty; and to instruct us, that they, who for their own interest or security, meditate mischief to other men, though with never so much art and address, shall probably meet with many disappointments in the end; as they on the contrary, that chearfully resign up themselves to the good pleasure of God, shall find relief, even by miracle, where ordinary means fail; as in the case of this innocent child.

XIII. c. 11. Of this also was made the paper of the antients.

when it came to be examin'd, proved a fair goodly child, expos'd in a kind of cradle or basket, as aforesaid, which the princess was exceedingly delighted withal. Such was the grace and favour of God to Moses, that he was preserv'd, brought up, and provided for, by those very persons that were in the design of cutting off the whole race of the Hebrews for his sake. So that Thermuthis order'd some women to be call'd to give it suck: But several being brought, and try'd, one after another, the child turn'd away with such an aversion, that they could not make it take the breast. Mariam being there present, and seemingly more out of curiosity or by chance, than any thing of concern or business, she told the princess that this would never do; "For, (says she) if "this child be of one country, and the nurse "of another, it is possible the milk of a stran-"ger will not agree with it: But if there "was ever a Hebrew woman, the child would "perhaps allow that to suckle it." That which Mariam said seem'd so reasonable, that the princess order'd her to try if she could get such a nurse herself.

She went away presently to look after one, and in a short time brought the real mother herself (whom no body there knew) to make the experiment. She had no sooner offer'd it the breast, but the child immediately fell to drawing and sucking it with all the eagerness that could be. And the princess observing it, desir'd Jochabel to take charge of the infant; which she very readily accepted of. The child had a name given him according to the event of the providence, and it was called Mo-Yses: *Mo, in the Egyptian language signifying water, and Yses, as much as preserv'd: So that putting them together, Moyses signifies preserv'd out of water. This Moses, beyond all controversy, proved in time the wisest man in the whole nation of the Hebrews, which was but according to what God had foretold of him. He was the sixth generation from Abraham: Amaram his father being the son of Caath; the son of Levi; the son of Jacob; the son of Isaac; who was the son of Abraham.

Jochabel the mother nurses it, Ver. 8.

Why call'd Moses, V. 10.

Moses the sixth from Abraham.

As he grew up, he shew'd a pregnancy of understanding much above those of his years. Nay, the very gaiety of his little plays and sports was not without somewhat of serious and instructive in it: Doing every thing with such a grace, that in his very childhood he gave the world to understand what might be expected from him in time to come. After three years of age, he came to be such a miracle of a child, for beauty and comelines of stature, that people would stop and stand gazing at him with delight and admiration whenever they saw him; and there appeared such a charming sweetness and winning gracefulness in his mien, that it wrought upon the most unsociable and morose of men: Nor did he so much as move any where, but all eyes were upon him; and let people be upon never such urgent business, or so much in haste, it was with difficulty and unwillingness that they departed from him.

Moses a miracle of a child.

So it was, in fine, that Thermuthis, out of a pure affection to the child, and wanting issue of her own, took a resolution to adopt him for her son; carry'd him to her father, and told him that she came to present him with a successor, in case he should die without male issue. "This (says she) is the sweetest towardly child "that ever was born. I have brought it up my "self, and it was the bounty of the river Nile "that deliver'd it into my arms. This child "do I intend to adopt, and make yourself a "present of it for your successor." With these words she gave the child into the hands of her father. The king receiv'd him, and with an affectionate tenderness, pressing him towards his heart, took off his crown to gratify his daughter, and placed it upon the child's head; who wantonly turning it up and down, let it drop to the ground; the child, after that, trampling upon it with his feet. This passage was look'd upon as an ill omen to the king and his government: Insomuch that the scribe (being then at hand) vehemently cry'd out aloud to have the boy kill'd; for that is the child, (says he to the king) that I foretold you would be the destruction of Egypt, and he has now confirm'd the prophecy by the affront he has put upon your government, in trampling your crown under his feet. This is he, in fine, by whose death alone you can promise yourself to be secure; and take him but away once, the Hebrews have nothing more to hope for, nor the Egyptians to fear. Thermuthis, upon this outcry, took him instantly away without any opposition from the king, it being God's will, for the good of Moses, that he should give no heed to what he said. The princess gave him all the advantages of a generous and polite education, which put the Hebrews in hope of some great good that was shortly to accrue to them. The Egyptians on the other side, were as jealous of mischief; but having no prospect of any successor to the crown whom they could hope to be much the better for, the bloody design of putting him to death dropt.

Thermuthis adopts him, and presents him to her father.

Moses preserv'd by a special providence.

CHAP. X.

The war of Moses with the Ethiopians.

THUS was Moses born, and brought up; and still, as he advanc'd farther into the world, he gave every day more and more proofs of his character and courage, and of what consequence his valour and conduct might be, either to his friends or his enemies. As for example:

The Ethiopians made an inroad upon the borders of Egypt, rifling and spoiling that part of the country. The Egyptians highly resented the affront, and march'd out against them with an army to revenge both the dishonour and the injury they had suffer'd. It came to a battle, and the Egyptians were routed; some kill'd in the action, and others shamefully beaten home again. The Ethiopians were sufficiently puffed up with this success, and follow'd the blow so close, that they were not without some hope of over-running even their whole country. They burnt and ravaged without controul, took booty in abundance, and carried all before them without resistance; insomuch that they march'd to Memphis itself, and so to the sea, and all without oppoſition. The Egyptians were hard preſs'd, and in this extremity had recourſe to their divines and oracles, what they had beſt to do. The anſwer was, that they ſhould call in a certain Hebrew to their aſſiſtance. The king forthwith upon this, tells his daughter that he was reſolv'd to levy an army againſt the Ethiopians upon this occaſion, and that he ſhould be glad to have Moſes undertake the command of it. The princeſs promis'd to do her part toward the engaging of him, as a thing of great importance to her father's ſervice; but firſt of all bound him under the obligation of a ſolemn oath, that no miſchievous practice ſhould be attempted upon his perſon; caſting it in the teeth of the prieſts, how wretched a ſhame it was, firſt to contrive and adviſe the death of him, and then moſt pitifully to implore his friendſhip.

Moſes marches againſt the Ethiopians at the head of an army.

MOSES at the interceſſion of Thermuthis and the king, was eaſily prevail'd upon to undertake this commiſſion, which was highly pleaſing to the holy men of both ſides. The Egyptians flatter'd themſelves, firſt with the hope of victory under his conduct, and then with the likelihood of an opportunity, when their own work was done, to deſtroy Moſes. The Hebrews, on the other ſide, delighted themſelves with the thought, that under the command of ſo great a general, they might one day find themſelves in a condition to ſhake off this Egyptian yoke. Moſes bethought himſelf upon this expedition how he might come to attack the enemy unawares. The paſſage over land was horribly infeſted with ſerpents; many of them fierce and venomous, terrible to the very ſight, and ſeveral ſorts among them that are not to be found any where elſe; ſome with wings, that ſeize men by ſurprize, and are as mortal in the air, as upon the ground. This way was ſo deadly hazardous, that all people were againſt the venturing of an army through it; ſo that for that very reaſon he rather choſe the inland paſſage than that by the Nile; and this he did upon a true judgment of the reaſon of the thing. Moſes was only in the firſt place to provide againſt the perils of this deſperate paſſage, which he did by this wonderful ſtratagem. The bird Ibis is a mortal enemy to all ſorts of ſerpents; they fly from the purſuit of it as from deer, till they are overtaken and devour'd. This bird is only fierce to thoſe poiſonous creatures, and gentle to all others. I ſhall need ſay no more of it at preſent; for the Greeks are very well informed in this hiſtory. Now Moſes's invention to ſecure his army againſt the aſſaults of ſerpents, was to carry with him ſo many of theſe birds in cages of bulruſhes to clear the way for him.

The paſſages infeſted with ſerpents.

Moſes deſtroys the ſerpents with his Ibis.

MOSES was no ſooner advanc'd to this dangerous quarter, but he let looſe his birds upon the ſerpents, as againſt ſo many enemies, and under their protection went forward without any harm or interruption; ſo that puſhing hard to overtake the Ethiopians, he came up with them before they were aware, fought and defeated them; and having bauk'd their hopes of conquering Egypt, he drove them back again in confuſion to their own country, deſtroying a great many of their towns and cities, and committing terrible ſlaughter upon their people.

Surprizes the Ethiopians, and ravages their country.

THIS victory of Moſes infus'd new life and vigour into the Egyptians, while the Ethiopians, on the other hand, had nothing but death, deſtruction, and ſlavery before their eyes. They were at laſt driven into Saba, the metropolis of Ethiopia, which Cambyſes afterward called by the name of Meroe, having a ſiſter of that name. Moſes ſat down before this place, though in all appearance impregnable, being ſurrounded by the Nile, and two other rivers, Aſtapus and Aſtabora, falling in to ſtrengthen it; which made the paſſage ſo much the more difficult; beſide, that ſtanding in an iſland, and being encompaſs'd with a ſtrong wall, it is likewiſe fortified with ramparts, and other works of defence, to ſecure it from any attacks or inundations from the river.

Moſes lays ſiege to Saba.

MOSES was not at all pleaſed with this ſiege, for the army lay idle, and there was no forcing the enemy to come to an engagement. But while this paſs'd, there happen'd a very extraordinary accident; the king of Ethiopia had a daughter he called Tharbis, who had the fortune once to ſee and to obſerve Moſes with his ſword in his hand, drawing up his arms and behaving with great honour and bravery under the walls of the town. She was ſo infinitely taken with the courage and gallant behaviour of the man, looking upon him alſo as the balance of the two kingdoms, and having recover'd the affairs of the Egyptians when reduced to the laſt extremities, and at the ſame time humbled the Ethiopians in the very height of their victories, that upon all this together the princeſs fell violently in love with him; and her affection growing upon her ſtill more and more, ſhe broke her mind at laſt to ſome particular confidents ſhe had, and ſent them over to Moſes to offer herſelf in marriage to him. Moſes agreed to it, but upon this condition, (which was ratified with an oath too,) that upon delivering up the city, the marriage ſhould be conſummated, which was accordingly perform'd very ſoon after. Moſes gave God thanks for his conqueſt over the Ethiopians, and at the ſame time ſolemniz'd the nuptials; which being done, the army of the Egyptians return'd home victorious.

Tharbis, the king's daughter, falls in love with Moſes.

The place render'd up on condition of marriage.

The ungrateful Egyptians conſpire againſt the life of Moſes, who flies from Egypt to Madian.

BUT ſo far were theſe ungrateful wretches from acknowledging the benefits they had received from their deliverer and preſerver, that they returned him only a mortal ill-will and hatred in requital; proceeding even to foul practices upon his perſon. They were afraid the reputation and intereſt he had acquir'd by his mighty atchievements, might, perhaps, put him in a condition to ſet up for himſelf; and ſo to give a check to his career, they exhibited an information of * murder againſt him, which the king himſelf was well enough content to entertain; partly out of envy to the fame of his valour and wiſdom, and partly for fear of that deſtruction which the prieſts and ſcribes were continually ringing in his ears; for they never left ſpurring him on to miſchief, till in concluſion they brought the king himſelf over into the plot. Moſes, in fine, was certainly deſign'd for death, and he eſcaped it ſo narrowly too, that if by providence he had not got ſome intelligence of the deſign juſt when he did, and in that inſtant ſtole privately away, he had undoubtedly periſhed. He was inform'd that the ways were laid, and therefore he was forc'd to take his flight through a deſart, where he might reaſonably preſume no body would look after him. He travelled without finding any thing to eat upon his journey; ſo that there was no remedy for hunger but patience. In this condition he paſs'd travelling forward, till he came about noon, within a little of * Madian, a city upon the coaſt of the Red Sea, that took its name from one of the ſons of Abraham by Chetura. He was now come within ſight of the town, where he ſat down by a fountain, to refreſh and reſt himſelf. In this place there happened an accident that took its riſe from ſomewhat of the cuſtom of the country; and it gave Moſes an occaſion not only of ſhewing his reſolution and juſtice, but, as the conſequence prov'd, of making his fortune alſo. Water is ſo ſcarce in that country, that the ſhepherds ſtrive who can get firſt in the morning to the fountain, leaſt it be drawn dry, and not enough left for their cattle. At this time there ſtood by the fountain ſeven maiden ſiſters, the daughters of † Raguel, a prieſt, and a perſon of great reputation in that quarter. Theſe maids had their father's flocks under their care, which is commonly the women's buſineſs among the Troglodytes; and when they had taken what they thought ſufficient, they emptied it into troughs, the better to divide it among their ſheep; but ſome ſhepherds coming up at the ſame time, they rudely forced the virgins away from their ſtation, in order to take the water to themſelves. This was ſo brutal, and ſo unmanly an indignity to be put upon women, that Moſes thought it a duty incumbent upon him to vindicate their cauſe; ſo he drove the ſhepherds away, and help'd the virgins, as it well became him to do. The daughters had ſo generous a ſenſe of this civility and obligation, that upon returning to their father, they gave him the whole ſtory at length, both of the ſhepherds rudeneſs and violence, and of the ſtranger's courteſy and reſpect; joining in a requeſt to their father, that he would be pleaſed to make him ſome handſome requital for the favour they had received. The good-nature and gratitude of the daughters towards their benefactor, was ſo highly approv'd by the father, that he commanded them to bring the ſtranger to his houſe, that he might make him ſome acknowledgment ſuitable to his deſert. Moſes being accordingly introduced, the father told him what a character his daughters had given of him, and how much they were all indebted to him for his aſſiſtance and protection. He had a great admiration for his virtue, he ſaid, and would give him very ſpeedily to underſtand, that his kind offices ſhould not paſs either unregarded or unrewarded; for he ſhould quickly make him an ample recompence for his civilities. Hereupon he took him for his adopted ſon, gave him one of his daughters in marriage, and made him head and maſter of all his cattle, which at that time was all one with the entire poſſeſſions of thoſe people.

Of God's appearing in the fiery buſh, and of Moſes's rod.

UPON this advance of Moſes in his fortune, under the favour of ‡ Jethegleth, otherwiſe Raguel, he liv'd with his father-in-law, and had the charge of his flocks, which he drove ſome time afterwards up to mount || Sinai, where there was excellent graſs, and feeding, and the higheſt mountain in the whole country. The people had an old tradition, that God dwelt there; ſo that in ancient time, out of pure reverence to this tradition, people forbore either feeding or walking there. Upon this mountain there appeared to him a wonderful prodigy: A fire ſeen in a buſh, the buſh burning, the flame fierce and violent, and yet neither leaves, flowers, nor branches blaſted or conſumed. The very ſpectacle itſelf, and the ſurprize of it, ſtruck Moſes with aſtoniſhment; but he was much more amazed when he heard a voice out of the fire calling him by his name, and ſpeaking to him; "How "durſt you preſume, ſays the voice, to ſet "foot upon this ground, where never any "man living trod before you, out of a vene-"ration to the very holineſs of the place?" Commanding Moſes to withdraw himſelf from the fire, and to reſt content with what he had ſeen, and what he was thought worthy of, as the righteous offſpring of ſo many glorious anceſtors; charging him over again to carry his curioſity no farther. The voice foretold him, that through God's aſſiſtance his name ſhould be great and honourable among men; bidding him fear nothing, but go to Egypt, where he ſhould have the abſolute command of all the Hebrews, and deliver his countrymen from their preſent tyranny and oppreſſion; "For, "ſays the voice, they ſhall come to inhabit "the lands, and to enjoy all the good "things that their firſt father Abraham was "poſſeſs'd of, and by your wiſdom be put in-"to the full enjoyments of all thoſe bleſ-"ſings; but be ſure to remember, that ſo ſoon "as ever you ſhall have brought the Hebrews "out of Egypt, you offer up a ſacrifice of "thankſgiving in this very place." of the murder, by giving it a different turn, and connecting it with the preceding chapter, which gives us an hiſtory of actions in that interval of time, betwixt Moſes's childhood and manhood; the credit of which depends intirely upon his own authority, the holy ſcriptures not making the leaſt mention of any of the particulars therein contain'd.

THE prodigy of the viſion gave Moſes a frightful amazement, but the voice much greater. "Lord, ſays he, I know, and I adore "thy power, and ſo have all my predeceſſors "done before me; ſo that I muſt be worſe "than mad, to make any doubt of obeying "it; but how ſhall I yet, a weak private "man, find either words or credit to prevail "with ſuch a number of people; firſt to for-"ſake a place where they are at preſent ſet-"tled, and then to follow me upon uncertain-"ties, whitherſoever I ſhall think fit to lead "them? Or otherwiſe, ſuppoſing that I had "intereſt enough to draw them after me, who "ſhall compel Pharaoh to let them go yet, "when ſo great a part of the Egyptians happi-"neſs and revenue depends upon their la-"bour?" The voice commanded him again to reſt ſatisfied upon the whole matter, promiſing to be with him upon all occaſions; and that if there were need of words, the faculty of perſuaſion ſhould be put into his mouth; or if of works or actions, he ſhould be ſtrengthened and ſupported. But for the fuller confirmation and conviction of Moſes, the voice commanded him to throw a rod down upon the ground that he had in his hand. He did ſo, and it was preſently turn'd into a ſerpent, rolling itſelf into folds, and menacing with the head, as if it threatened an aſſault; and then this ſerpent in a little time became a rod again. The voice, after this, bad Moſes put his hand into his boſom, which he did, and it came out again as white as chalk, returning in a very little time to its native colour. Moſes was again commanded to take fair water, and throw it upon the ground, where it ſeem'd to be turn'd into blood. Moſes ſtanding aghaſt at the miraculous operations, God commanded him to caſt himſelf wholly upon him, and to depend upon the aſſiſtance of an Almighty power, which ſhould enable him alſo to work the ſame miracles, and give him the credit of a perſon acting by a divine commiſſion, and in obedience to the will of God.

UPON this deliberation God commanded Moſes away immediately for Egypt, and to purſue his journey night and day without intermiſſion; for the longer he ſtaid, the longer would the Hebrews remain in affliction and ſlavery. It was not for Moſes, after what he had ſeen and heard, to doubt of God's power or juſtice; for nothing could be clearer than the certainty of the grounds he went upon. He made it his petition yet, that he might have the ſame power of working miracles continued to him in Egypt, which he had exercis'd here, with this further ſupplication, that God would vouchſafe to reveal unto him the name of that infinite power which he had ſeen and heard, to the end that in his ſacrifices and invocations he might know more explicitly under what appellation to offer up his addreſs. God was pleaſed to grant him his requeſt, but it is a name that was never known, nor heard of before by any of the children of men, and I dare not ſo much as mention it. Moſes had the gift of working miracles confer'd upon him, not only for this particular time, but ſo often as there ſhould be occaſion for it; ſo that without the leaſt doubt or diſtruſt of the certainty of the revelations and predictions from the buſh, or of the aſſurances of a divine aſſiſtance to go along with him wherever he went, he ſettled his thoughts in a firm confidence of living to ſee the happy deliverance of the Hebrews, and the utter confuſion of their Egyptian enemies.

Upon the news of Pharaoh's death, Moſes and Aaron go into Egypt to the new king.

MOSES had news by this time of the death of that Pharaoh who ſought his life, and for fear of whom he had abandoned the country; ſo he ask'd Raguel's leave to return to his friends and relations in Egypt, for their common good. His deſire being granted, he took his wife * Sepphorah, the daughter of Raguel, and his children by her, Gerſhom and Eleazar, and with all ſpeed poſted away with them into Egypt. Now Gerſhom in the Hebrew language ſignifies a foreigner, and Eleazar the help of God; becauſe it was by the aid of divine providence that Moſes eſcaped the ſnare the Egyptians had laid for him. By the time that he was gotten near the borders, his brother Aaron, by God's direction, came to him. Upon their meeting, Moſes gave him an account at large of the wonders upon the mount, and of all the commands, inſtructions, and revelations that he had received from God. He was met upon the way a little farther by great numbers of the principal men among the Hebrews, who upon notice of his approach came out to bid him welcome. To them Moſes communicated his commiſſion from God; and, that there might be no room left for their diffidence and incredulity, in confirmation of the truth of what he ſaid, he gave them ocular demonſtration of his gift of miracles, as a certain and undoubted proof of his authority and power. This evidence did ſo abſolutely confirm, as well as amaze them, that they made no longer any doubt but it was a token of aſſurance from Heaven, that God would provide for the relief and ſecurity of his people by ſome extraordinary means.

THE Hebrews being thus inſpired with the love and hopes of gaining their liberty, very readily came into Moſes's meaſures, promiſing him for the future all reſpect and obedience; upon which he went directly to the new king; minded him of the ſervices he had done the Egyptians againſt the Ethiopians, when they inſolently and contemptuouſly made an irruption into his country, and ravaged it; the toils and hazaads he had undergone, and the care he had taken to manage the war for the advantage of the Egyptians, as if they had been his own countrymen; not forgetting at the ſame time to recount to him the baſe and ungenerous returns they had made him for theſe good offices. He told him likewiſe of the viſion upon mount Sinai, and very particularly what God had ſaid to him, and what ſigns he had given him by miracles and revelations, to fix him in a firm belief of all his promiſes;

Pharaoh ridicules him. Moſes does his former miracles over again.

PHARAOH turn'd all theſe things to ridicule. Moſes, for his better ſatisfaction, did all thoſe miracles before his face which he had wrought upon mount Sinai; upon which Pharaoh broke out into a violent outrage of paſſion and ill language. "You, ſays Pharaoh, a ſcandalous "runagate! Firſt you ignominiouſly fled out "of Egypt to ſave yourſelf, and you are now "come back again, inſtructed in the arts of "magick and inchantments, to ſeduce the "people from their allegiance and duty. "You take upon you, ſays Pharaoh, as if you "were the only man skill'd in this divine "myſtery, and value your reputation upon "that idle pretence at ſuch a rate, as if the "multitude were to fall down and worſhip "you. But after all this vanity and oſtenta-

Pharaoh ſets up his prieſts and inchanters againſt Moſes, Exod. vii. 11.

"tion, my prieſts, ſays Pharaoh, I would have "you to know, can do all your feats as well "as you." So the prieſts were call'd, and bid to throw down their rods, which was done, and they were immediately turned into ſerpents. "This does not move me at all, ſays "Moſes, for I am neither a ſtranger to the "learning of the Egyptians, nor a deſpiſer "thereof; but I may well affirm, that the "operations I perform are as much more ex-"cellent than theirs, as the power of God "is above that of their magick, or things di-"vine more illuſtrious than human; and I "ſhall make it inſtantly appear, that what I "do is not a fancy of impoſing illuſions upon "a credulous multitude, under the reſemblance "of truth, but the very power of an omni-"potent God, which will riſe in judgment "againſt thoſe unbelievers, who ſhall ſhut their "eyes againſt ſo clear an evidence." With theſe words he threw his rod upon the ground, and commanded it to become a ſerpent; it did ſo, and while the magician's ſerpents were winding themſelves upon the earth, Moſes's ſerpent devour'd their ſerpents one after another; and then when it was return'd to its former ſhape, Moſes took it up again.

Moſes's rod devours the inchanters rods, Ver. 12.

THIS miracle was ſo far from having any good effect upon the king, that inſtead of admiring the power by which it was wrought, he burſt out into indignation at the fact, proteſting that he would do nothing in his favour, nor believe otherwiſe than that the wiſdom and power of the Egyptians was equal to his; ordering at the ſame time the overſeers not only to keep the Hebrews to their work, but to increaſe their task; which was forthwith done, by withdrawing their former allowance of ſtraw toward the making of brick; ſo that they were obliged to work all day, and in the night fetch ſtraw, which doubled their labour.

Pharaoh doubles the Hebrews task, Exod. v. 9.

MOSES was not in the leaſt diſcouraged at theſe hard words and menaces, but ſtood firm, both againſt the king's diſpleaſure, and the murmurings of his own people, who would needs have diſſuaded him from his enterprize, ſince his interfering did but, they ſaid, make their oppreſſion more grievous, and increaſe their miſery. But the heart of Moſes was ſet upon the liberty of his countrymen; wherefore he went again to the king, to beg leave for the Hebrews to go to mount Sinai, and offer ſacrifice to God, as he had commanded them; telling Pharaoh alſo, "That there was no oppoſing "of God's will; wherefore he ſhould do "well not to ſeem to deſpiſe his favour, but "rather let the people go, for fear of draw-"ing thoſe judgments upon his own head an-"other day, which do certainly one time or "other fall upon the unbelievers and the diſ-"obedient. In ſuch a caſe, the very earth and "the air, he ſaid, would fight againſt him; "his women would be barren, and all the ele-"ments would conſpire to avenge God's cauſe "upon him; all things would go croſs with "him, and no avoiding it, even though the "Hebrews ſhould leave his country, unleſs it "were with Pharaoh's licence and free con-"ſent; and rather than fail, God himſelf "would bring it about at laſt, if Pharaoh "would not."

Moſes ſolicits Pharaoh for the Iſraelites again; and precautions him for fear of the conſequence.

CHAP. XIV.

The ten plagues of Egypt.

THE king gave no heed at all to what Moſes ſaid, and upon this hardneſs and contempt, the Egyptians ſuffer'd moſt dreadful calamities; wherein I ſhall be very particular, both for the novelty ſake, and to ſhew alſo that the predictions of our prophet were not idle. Beſide, that finally it is for the good of mankind to know theſe things, both for their caution and inſtruction, that people may keep clear of crying and provoking ſins, which bring down dreadful judgments upon mankind.

Pharaoh is harden'd, Exod vii. 22. The plagues of Egypt.

IN the firſt place, the water of the river Nile was turn'd to blood, which was the only water they had to drink; and it was not ſo in colour only, but it immediately affected the Egyptians who drunk of it with the moſt pungent pains and wracking tortures, and the Egyptians only; for to the Hebrews it was ſweet and potable as at other times. This miracle put the king to his wits end; ſo that for fear of a total deſtruction, he gave the Hebrews leave to depart. So ſoon as the preſent evil was remov'd, he repented of what he had promiſed, and recall'd his word. God was ſo incenſed againſt him for his falſeneſs and ingratitude, after the plague was removed from him, that he preſently viſited Egypt with another judgment; which was ſuch ſwarms or ſhoals of frogs amongſt them, that they cover'd the earth, and choak'd up the river, in which great numbers of them dying and rotting, they ſo corrupted the water that it was almoſt death to drink it; beſides the dead frogs turn'd to mud, and produced others out of that putrefaction; ſo that they crawl'd into their bed-chambers, cups, diſhes, meat, and drink; nothing eſcap'd them, and wherever they came, a poiſonous ſtink went along with them. This fell ſo heavy upon the Egyptians, that Pharaoh ſent for Moſes a ſecond time, and told him that he might now go and take the Hebrews along with him whither he pleaſed. The word was no ſooner paſs'd, but both land and water were all clear'd of the frogs, and every thing in its former ſtate. This viſitation was no ſooner taken off, than forgotten; for Pharaoh detain'd the people ſtill, pretending that what he promiſed was out of fear, and conſequently not binding; for his will never conſented to it, which looked as if he had done done it on purpoſe to make a further experiment. This baſe and treacherous breach of faith was follow'd with a judgment of lice: the bodies of the people bred them, and they were all cover'd with them, gnawing and tearing intolerably, and no remedy; for baths and ointments were of no ſervice. Pharaoh was ſo confounded at this new plague, what with the danger, the ſcandal, and the naſtineſs of it, that as wicked as he was, he was half ſorry for what he had done; for he gave the Hebrews permiſſion to go their way; but ſo ſoon as the rod was off again, he demanded their wives and children as hoſtages for their return.

3. The plague of lice. Exod. viii. 17.

Pharaoh promiſes, and fails again as before.

THIS was a practice that exaſperated God more than the reſt; for it look'd as if he thought to have over-reach'd providence, and as if Moſes, not God, had puniſh'd the Egyptians for oppreſſing the Hebrews. Wherefore God ſent numberleſs ſwarms of flies and inſects, and ſuch varieties of them as had never been ſeen before. They fill'd the whole country, deſtroy'd the people, and cover'd the ground ſo that there was no tilling of it; and they who eſcap'd preſent deſtruction, being infected with the contagion that was bred from the corruption of them, were ſeized by dangerous diſeaſes: But all this was not yet enough to bring him to a ſenſe of his ſin, and a compliance with the will of God: But he was now only for letting ſome of the women and their husbands go, but keeping back their children.

4. The plague of flies.

Pharaoh falſifies again. Ex. viii. 32.

THE wiſdom of God did not want variety of plagues in abundance, and worſe than the former, to inflict upon the whole nation for the wickedneſs of an incorrigible obſtinate prince. So he viſited the Egyptians with a plague of inward ulcers, which carry'd the people off in great numbers.

5, 6. The plague of murrain, and of Ulcers. Ex. ix. 6.--11.

WHEN God ſaw that Pharaoh ſtill perſiſted in the defiance of a divine power, he ſent upon the Egyptians a judgment of hail, in the prime of the ſpring, which utterly deſtroy'd all their fruits and plants that were in the bud. This was not only a prodigy in Egypt, where they had never ſeen hail before, but beyond any other that ever had been heard of in the coldeſt and moſt northerly climates: And what the hail left was devour'd by a following plague of locuſts; ſo that the whole product of the earth was loſt for that year. Now, one would have thought, if this king had not been beſotted as well as abandoned, theſe judgments would have convinc'd him of the vanity of contending with Almighty God, and have brought him to bethink himſelf of ſome way in time to prevent his final ruin: But Pharaoh was not ſo fooliſh all this while, as to be ignorant of the true cauſe of all his afflictions; but he ſeemed to take a vanity in the haughtineſs of a contumacious malice, to try maſteries with God Almighty, who ſhould get the better of it; and in this height of ſtomach he reſolv'd to ſacrifice himſelf and his people to his preſumption. He came at length by degrees to yield, that the Hebrews ſhould have licence to depart with their wives and children, only leaving their goods behind them, for the Egyptians, in conſideration for what they had loſt. Moſes did not think that condition reaſonable; becauſe, if ſo, they ſhould not have any thing left for a ſacrifice.

8. The plague of locuſts. Ex. x. 13. 14, 15.

Pharaoh ſhuffles ſtill. Ver. 20.

THIS diſpute held ſo long, that before it was over, the Egyptians were all invironed with a profound thick darkneſs: Several of them periſh'd by ſeveral ways; ſome were afraid of one thing, ſome of another; and not a few, of being all ſwallow'd up in the ſame abyſs together. After three days and nights, Pharaoh ſtill remaining obſtinate in his reſolution not to part with the Hebrews, Moſes went and ſpoke to him in theſe words: "How long, ſays he, "will you ſet up your own will againſt the "will of God! It is his pleaſure and command "that you diſmiſs the Hebrews, and there is "nothing elſe in nature to ſave you from the "evils wherewith you are afflicted but that." The king was ſo enraged at this freedom, that he declared it ſhould coſt Moſes his head, if ever he ſpoke one word to him more upon that ſubject. Moſes made anſwer, that he had now ſaid all he had to ſay; but that he was well aſſur'd it would not be long before the king himſelf, and the chief of his nobility ſhould of their own accord ſpeak to the Hebrews themſelves to make haſte to be gone: And with theſe words Moſes went his way.

9. The plague of darkneſs. Ver. 22, 23.

Pharaoh continues obſtinate. Ver. 27, 28.

THE impenitent obſtinacy of Pharaoh was ſo provoking, that God kept yet one plague more in ſtore for him, which would be ſure to humble his proud heart, and make him diſcharge the Hebrews. He commanded Moſes to give notice to the people to prepare their ſacrifice on the * thirteenth day of the month Xanticus, to be offer'd up on the fourteenth. (That which the Macedonians call Xanticus, the Hebrews call Niſan, and the Egyptians Pharmuthi.) Moſes was appointed to bring the Hebrews along with him, and all that belong'd to them: which he did accordingly, gathering them together, and then dividing them into tribes and companies, but all in the ſame place. Early in the morning on the 14th, (the day aſſign'd) being all in readineſs to depart, they ſacrific'd, purifying their houſes by ſprinkling blood upon them with a bunch of hyſſop. After ſupper they burnt the remainder of the fleſh, as juſt entring upon a journey. And this is our way of ſacrificing unto this day upon the feſtival of our paſcha, which ſignifies paſſing over, becauſe God paſſed over the Hebrews without hurting them, when the Egyptians were ſtruck with a diſeaſe; for the plague made ſuch havock that night with the Egyptians firſt-born, that people of all conditions came thronging in troops to the palace with clamours to have the Hebrews forthwith ſent away. Whereupon the King call'd for Moſes, and gave immediate order for them to depart, upon an opinion that Egypt could never be happy ſo long as they ſtaid in the country; and that the liberty of one would be the deliverance of the other. Several of the Egyptians preſented them upon their going away, ſome for diſpatch, others for acquaintance ſake; and not without tears at parting: many of them repenting at the barbarous cruelty they had formerly exercis'd over them.

THE Iſraelites took their way by Letopolis, a city at that time deſerted: and Babylon was afterwards built in the place of it by Cambyſes, when he laid Egypt waſte. They made long marches, and on the third day got to Beelzephon, by the red Sea. There were no proviſions to be had upon the way in the wilderneſs; ſo that their food was only meal and water, kneaded and bak'd into cakes, and this was their entertainment for thirty days. They had now ſpent all they brought out of Egypt, having manag'd it as ſparingly too as was poſſible, providing barely for their neceſſities, without filling their bellies. It is in memory of that ſcarcity that we celebrate the eight-days-feſtival, which we call that of unleaven'd bread. But the multitude of the travellers, with their wives and children, was almoſt innumerable; for there were full ſix hundred thouſand men that were able to bear arms.

They march out of Egypt. Ex. xii. 37.

The eight-days-feſtival. Ex. xiii 6. 7.

THE Hebrews went out of Egypt on the 15th day of the month of Xanthicus, Moſes being now eighty years of age, and his brother Aaron eighty three. It was two hundred and fifteen years from Jacob's coming into Egypt, and four hundred and fifteen from the coming of our father Abraham into Chanaan. They carry'd Joſeph's bones along with them, being a truſt that he had committed to the charge of his ſons.

They carry Joſeph's bones along with them. Ver. 19.

THEY had not been long gone before the Egyptians repented that they had let them go; the King eſpecially, who imputed all the Calamities that had befallen Egypt to the inchantments of Moſes, and look'd upon them to be no more than the works of his practice and contrivance. This opinion brought them quickly to a reſolution to follow them and fall upon them; in order to which having furniſhed themſelves with arms and the other neceſſaries of war, they purſued them with a full deſign to bring them back, if they cou'd but overtake them; concluding there was no reaſon to fear God would be offended with them for this action, ſince they had once conſented to their departure: and as to their maſtering of them, that they made no queſtion would be effected with eaſe, ſince they were unarmed and weary with the fatigue of a march; whereupon enquiring of every body they met which way they journey'd, they purſued haſtily; notwithſtanding the difficulties of the paſſages were troubleſome, even to a ſingle traveller, and much more ſo to a marching army. But Moſes had ſeveral inducements to make choice of this way: firſt, in caſe the Egyptians ſhould change their minds, and ſend after them, the very fatigue of the expedition would make them repent both the perfidy and the undertaking: and then Moſes held it imprudent and impolitick to lead them by paleſtine; for the philiſtines, who were enemies to the Hebrews upon the ſcore of an old grudge, and borderers upon Egypt, would perhaps have fallen upon them, if they could have had any intelligence of their march. He led them, in fine, by the way of the wilderneſs, tho' a great way about, and through many inconveniences, with an intent to ſacrifice upon mount Sinai, as God had commanded him, and from thence to Chanaan.

Pharaoh purſues them. Ver. 6, 7, 8, 9.

Moſes leads them away by the wilderneſs. Ex. xiii. 18.

By that time they were come to the Red Sea, they found themſelves overtaken, and encompaſs'd by the Egyptians with an army of 600 chariots, 50000 horſe, and 200000 foot; the main body being drawn up in order of battle. They had ſet guards upon all paſſes, ſecur'd all avenues, and ſhut the Hebrews up into ſo narrow a compaſs, betwixt impaſſable mountains and the ſea, that it was utterly impoſſible for them to make an eſcape. In this ſtreight, there was no thought of flying; and, if they had never ſo much a mind to't, there was no means of fighting neither; for they had no arms: and then, if they continu'd where they were, they muſt inevitably ſtarve: ſo that there appear'd to them no viſible means of ſaving their lives, but by baſely yielding themſelves ſlaves, and ſubmitting to the will of their enemies. In this dangerous and deſperate extremity the whole blame was laid upon Moſes: They had forgotten the wonderful things that God had done for their deliverance, and the miracles he had wrought for the ſtrengthening of their faith. They were ſo exaſperated, in ſhort, with the outcries of women and children that gave themſelves for loſt, that they were upon the very point of * ſtoning their falſe prophet, as they accounted him, and proſtituting themſelves once more yet to their former ſlavery; for they had nothing in ſight but rocks, ſeas, and armed troops to encounter.

The Egyptians overtake them. Ex. xiv. 10.

The People ready to ſtone Moſes.

THE outrages and madneſs of this headſtrong multitude had no effect at all upon the providence and courage of Moſes; his whole truſt was in God, who, he knew, after ſo many preſages of liberty, would never fail him, or ſuffer his people to fall into the power of their enemies, to ſerve and periſh; whereupon ſtanding in the midſt of the people, he addreſs'd himſelf to them in the following manner: "Pray put the caſe, ſays he, that "you had depoſited ſome great truſt in the "hand of a perſon who had hitherto manag'd "it well and wiſely for you, might not you "reaſonably depend upon that man for the "ſame care and kindneſs, and in the ſame "caſe too over again? ## CHAP. XVI.

Moſes leads the Iſraelites toward the ſea.

WITH theſe laſt words in his mouth, Moſes led the Hebrews toward the ſea, the Egyptians looking on; who having them in view, and being extremely harraſs'd out with the purſuit, thought it adviſeable to refreſh themſelves, and put off fighting till the day following. So ſoon as Moſes was come to the ſea ſide, he took out his rod, and called upon God, imploring his divine aid and aſſiſtance in a prayer to this effect: " Lord, " ſays he, thou ſeeſt thy ſervants here reduced " to ſo miſerable an extremity, that it is not " in the power of any natural means, whether " of arms, or human policy, to deliver us; " but it is the God alone whom we ſerve and " truſt in who is able to do it. Lord, be " merciful to theſe thy people who are now " come out of Egypt, in a pure ſimplicity of " obedience to thy holy will and command- " ment, and repoſing themſelves entirely upon " thy gracious promiſes. It is to thee, Lord, " that we fly for help, who alone canſt reſcue " us out of the hands of our unmerciful ene- " mies. Speak comfort to thy ſervants, and " exert thy power; let thy relief be ſpeedy, " and inſpire them with a new life and confi- " dence, now in the depth of their deſpair. " Lord, we are under great difficulties, hem- " med in with the ſea and mountains; but " that ſea and thoſe mountains are thine, and " if thou doſt but ſay the word, the one ſhall " be levell'd, and the other turn'd into dry " land; or otherwiſe, thy providence may " carry us off among the very birds of the " air, if it ſhall be thy will to employ thy " power that way to ſave us." Immediately upon this prayer, Moſes ſtruck the ſea with his rod, whereupon the waters parted and recoil'd; by that means leaving a way open for the Hebrews paſſage and eſcape. The ſea being now divided, and a way opened, Moſes perceived the thing proceeded from God; ſo putting himſelf at the head of the people, who with great alacrity follow'd him, he bad them give God thanks for the bleſſing of ſo unexpected and unaccountable a deliverance, and in the name of God to follow him chearfully through the way which Almighty God had provided for them. The Hebrews, without delay, marched forward, and the Egyptians look'd upon them as ſo many ſots and madmen, to throw themſelves headlong into ſo certain a deſtruction. But when they ſaw them a great way in the ſea, and preſſing further ſtill, without any inconvenience and impediment, they poſted away after them, not making any doubt but the ſame road would ſerve them both. They therefore placing their cavalry in the van, made their deſcent from the ſhore into the ſea, the infantry following after. But the Egyptians having ſpent ſome time in making ready, and being alſo heavy armed, the Hebrews got out of their reach, and arriv'd ſafely on the oppoſite ſhore, leaveing their enemies behind them. This happy ſucceſs of the Hebrews made the Egyptians yet more eager to purſue, and more ſecure too; for they did not underſtand that this miracle was not wrought for the opening of a common way to them both; and that divine juſtice had made uſe of it at the ſame time for the preſervation of the people of God, and the confuſion of their oppreſſors. They followed the purſuit however, and when the whole army was advanc'd within compaſs, the ſea return'd upon it, and drowned them all. The judgment of this reflux was accompanied with high and fierce winds and tempeſts, ſtorms of hail and rain, terrible thunderings and lightenings, and nothing, in ſhort, wanting to make the calamity more dreadful, or to ſet forth the horrors of their condition that fall under the diſpleaſure of an angry God. They were alſo overtaken with a dark pitchy night; ſo that the whole army was deſtroy'd, and not ſo much as one ſoul left alive to carry the tidings.

Moſes calls upon God.

Moſes ſtrikes the ſea with his rod, and the waters part, Exod. xiv. 21.

Moſes advances, and his people follow him, Ver. 22.

The Egyptians purſue them, and are all drown'd, Ver. 23--28.

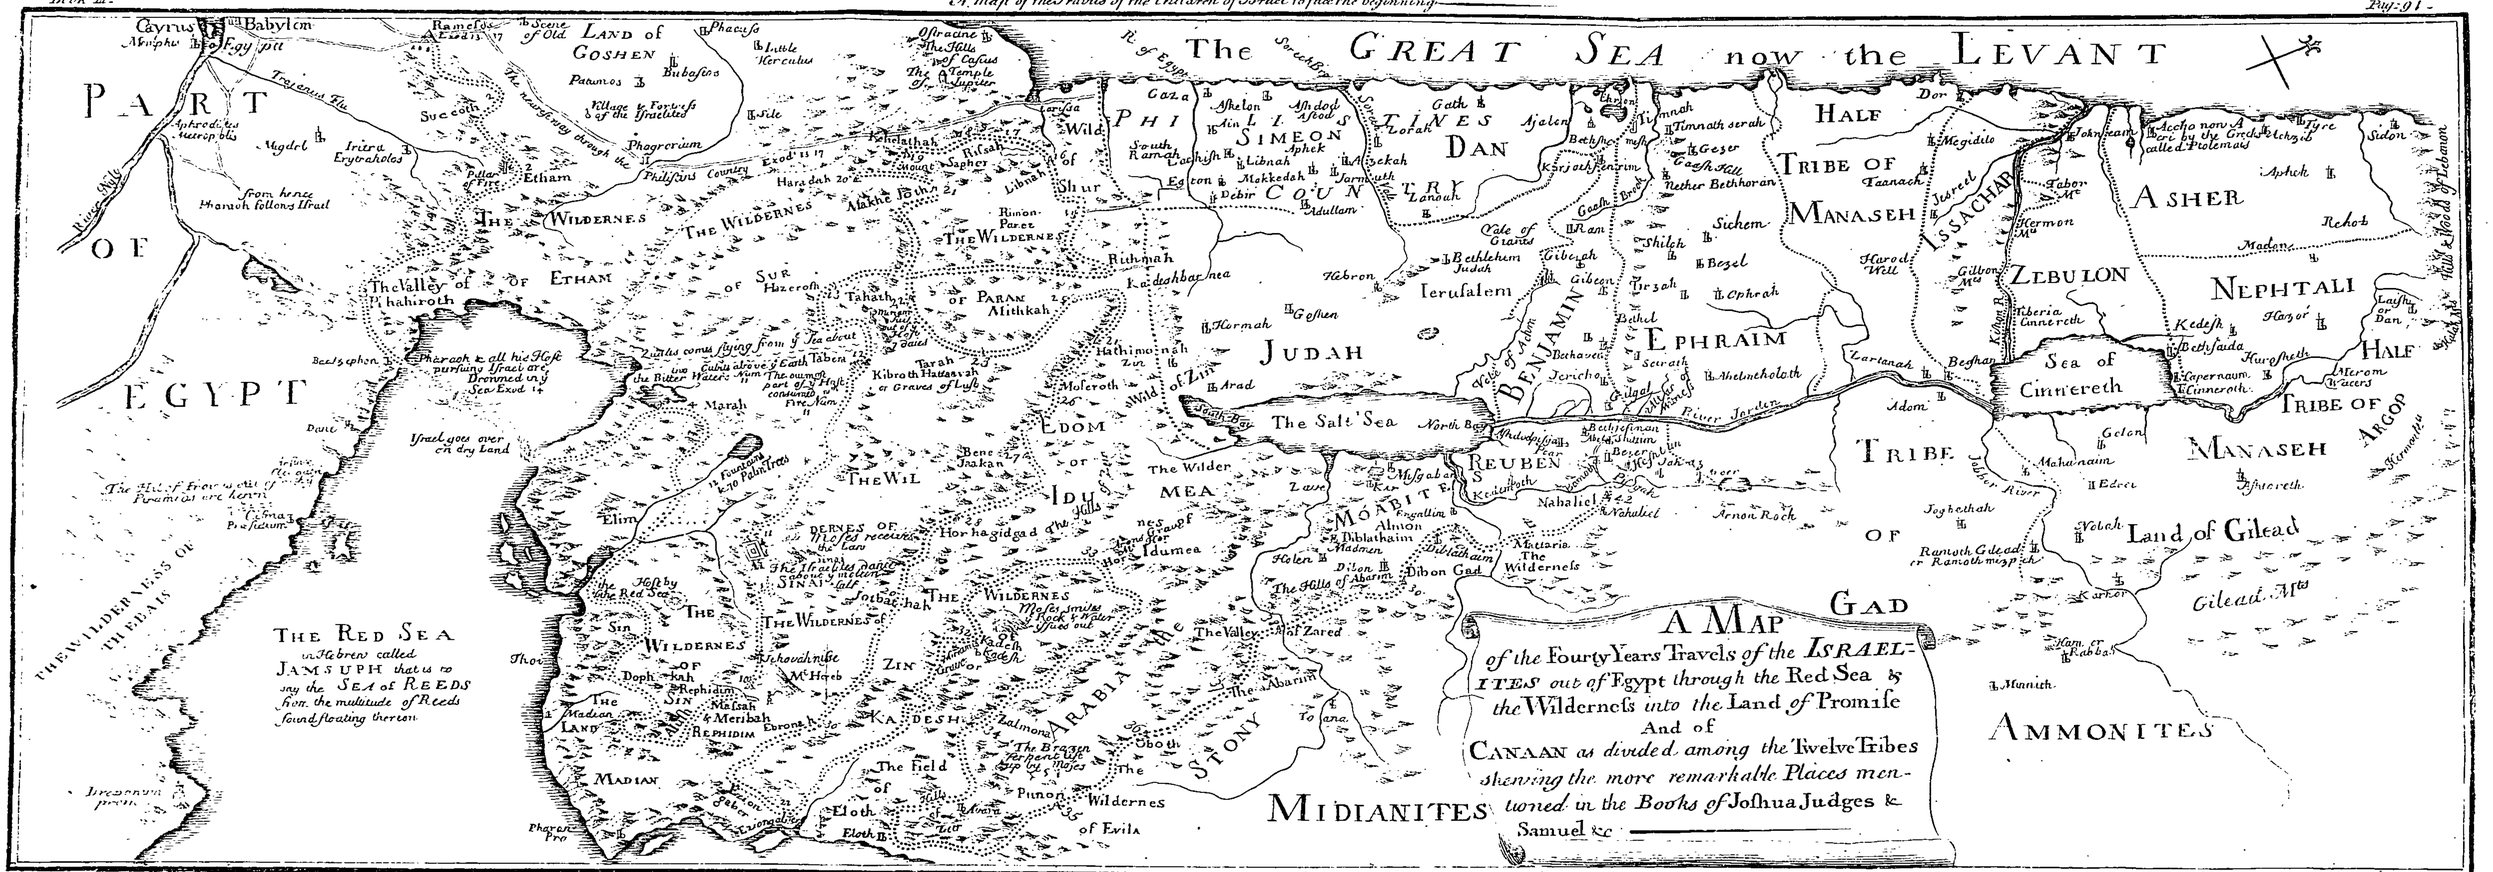
IT is not in the power of words to expreſs the tranſports of the Hebrews upon this deliverance; a bleſſing ſo unlook'd for, and God himſelf the immediate and the profeſs'd author of it; beſide the deſtruction of their enemies before their faces, to ſecure them in the poſſeſſion of their liberty, and their oppreſſors all drown'd to a man too. God's hand was ſo eminently viſible in the whole proceſs of this affair, that never had creatures ſuch cauſe of rejoicing. And ſo they ſpent that whole night in hymns and thankſgivings; Moſes in particular compoſing a ſong in hexameter verſe, to the honour of God upon this occaſion.

Moſes's ſong of thankſgiving, Exod. xv.

I HAVE been the more particular in theſe relations, becauſe I find them in holy writ, and let no man think this ſtory incredible of the ſea's dividing to ſave theſe people; for we find it in ancient records, that this hath been ſeen before, whether by God's extraordinary will, or by the courſe of nature, it is indifferent. The ſame thing happen'd one time to the * Macedonians, under the command of

* As it is related by Caliſthenes in Euſtathius upon Homer's third iliad. See Huetius's Alnetan. Quæſt. lib. ii. p. 206.

Alexander,



Alexander, when for want of another paſſage, the Pamphylian ſea divided to make them way; God's providence making uſe of Alexander at that time as his inſtrument for deſtroying the Perſian empire. This is atteſted by all the hiſtorians who have pretended to write the life of that prince. But people are at liberty to think what they pleaſe.

THE next day after this memorable judgment upon the Egyptians, the winds and the waves forc'd their arms a-ſhore juſt at the place where the Hebrews had pitched their tents; which Moſes underſtood to be another providence, in furniſhing the people with arms that they ſo much wanted; ſo they were gather'd together, and diſtributed among the Hebrews, man by man. After this, and the arming of the people, he led them to mount Sinai, there to offer ſacrifice, and preſent oblations for the deliverance of the people, in obedience to the command of God, as aforeſaid.

Moſes goes to mount Sinai, and ſacrifices.

CHAP. I.

The paſſage of the Iſraelites from Egypt to Mount Sinai. Their hardſhips by the way. Their murmurings againſt Moſes. The miſeries they endur'd by hunger and thirſt, till they were reliev'd by miracle.

The Hebrews hardſhips in the wilderneſs.

THE joy of the Hebrews, for ſo wonderful and unthought-of a deliverance, was not a little damp'd by the extreme hardſhips they were put to in their way through the wilderneſs to Mount Sinai. There was no food to be got; the water foul, very ſcarce and bad, and no nouriſhment in it; inſomuch that the very cattle could not drink it, much leſs the men; but this was the way they were obliged to take for want of another. By the advice of their conductor, they brought a proviſion of water with them into the deſart; and when that was ſpent, they digg'd pits, but with very great difficulty; for the ground was hard, and the water very bad and bitter when they came at it, and not enough of that neither.

The waters of Marah bitter, Exod. xv. 23.

IN travelling forward, they came about the evening to a place called Marah, from the taſte of the water; for Marah in Hebrew is bitterneſs: they were quite tired with the journey; beſide that their proviſions falling ſhort, they began to be pinch'd with hunger. But however they agreed to make ſome little ſtay there; and the rather, becauſe of a pit they had the fortune to find there; which though it could not anſwer the neceſſities of their vaſt numbers, there was yet ſome ſort of conſolation in it, the country conſidered, and that there was no more water to be expected from that place forward. This was as bitter as the other, and a drink that agreed neither with man nor beaſt.

MOSES found the people's hearts beginning to ſink, and not one word of comfort that he could give them; for the enemies they had now to deal withal were not to be encounter'd with wiſdom and valour; but men, women, and children were equally in danger, and it was a hard matter for him to adviſe others, who had the whole burden of the common calamity upon himſelf; for in their diſtreſs they all came thronging to him, women begging for their children, husbands for their wives, men for themſelves, and all imploring relief, when there was none to be had. Moſes betook himſelf to his prayers again, beſeeching God that he would be pleaſed to correct the bitterneſs of thoſe waters, and make them ſweet. This was granted him at the firſt requeſt, and ſo he took a piece of wood that lay there by chance, cleft it lengthways in the middle, and caſt it into the water; telling the Hebrews, that God had heard their prayers, and promiſed them a ſupply of water to their liking, upon condition that they ſhould readily and chearfully do whatever he commanded them. They ask'd him what he would have them do to get better water. Why then, says Moses, let the well be drained, and the lustiest young fellows among you set their hands to the work; you shall find upon emptying out the better half of it, that the remainder will be potable, and for your turn. They did as they were directed, and the water was so purg'd by the continual agitation of it, that it went down with the multitude for no contemptible drink.

Bitter waters made sweet, Exod. xv. 25.

The Israelites encamp at Helim, Ver. 27.

UPON decamping from hence, they went to a place call'd Helim. The prospect of it was pleasant enough at a distance, for there appear'd a plantation of palm-trees; but upon a nearer approach, they found themselves much deceiv'd in their expectation; for there were but seventy of them in all, and those but dwarfs neither; for the droughtiness of the place starv'd whatsoever grew upon it; nay, though there were twelve springs there, the plants were not one jot the better for them; for they never mounted so high as to distribute their waters into rivulets for the refreshment of the earth. The soil was sandy; no veins of water in it; or if now and then a small quantity appear'd, it was so foul and dirty there was no drinking of it: this scarcity of water spoil'd the fruit-trees too. The multitude, upon these melancholly thoughts, were so impatient under the sense of this miserable calamity, that they fell into direct mutiny against their leader, and charg'd the whole blame of it upon him. Their thirty days store was spent; their wants increas'd, and no supplies to be got in the wilderness. These thoughts all together put the people into a downright desperation; and the sense of their present necessities made them forget all former providences and blessings, whether immediately from God himself, or instrumentally by the hand of his servant Moses; proceeding in their ingratitude to such a degree of outrage, that they were within a very little of stoning their commander to death, as the man, they said, who had caused the ruin of them all. While the people were as yet in the heat of their malice and rage, with stones in their hands, and clamours and menaces in their mouths, and nothing less than the life of the commander to pacify this fury, Moses, in the fear of God, and with a good conscience, stood forth among them, and with a grace of language and address, peculiar to himself, opposed argument to violence in words to the following purpose: "You must not think, says he, to "cancel past obligations with a pretence of "present sufferings; but the difficulties you "now labour under should rather move you "to a thankful contemplation of God's boun-"ties and mercies to you in times past, even "beyond all hope and expectation. And "why may not the same providence attend "you now again? why may not this affliction "be laid upon you for a trial, to see if you "have courage, patience, and sense enough "of gratitude to stand the test, and if you "can distinguish betwixt the force and reason "of past benefits and present troubles, as you "ought to do? Have a care that you do not "make yourselves unworthy of God's favour, "by impatience under crosses, and by un-"thankfulness for favours, and by opposing "your present passions to the divine will and "power; for it was God that brought you "out of the land of Egypt, and it is with his "order and good pleasure that you now con-"tend. And so for your quarrel with me "now, his minister, my fault, says Moses, is "only the obeying of my master's order. I "have done nothing without a commission, "and you cannot say I have ever deceiv'd "you." When Moses had laid before them the reason of the matter, he had then recourse to instances, and particularly what judgments befel the Egyptians for keeping the Hebrews in slavery, and detaining them contrary to the declar'd will of God; how the river was turn'd into blood; and how the same water, that became poisonous to the Egyptians, was yet preserv'd salutary to the Hebrews; how the sea opened to make a lane for the Hebrews in their flight, and how the waters closed again to drown the Egyptians in the pursuit; the former at the same time being spectators of the overthrow of their enemies; and receiving a large supply of arms by that providence too, which they were wholly unprovided of before; and then how many miraculous deliverances out of the very jaws of destruction God had wrought for them, even beyond the force of human imagination to conceive. "Now God's omnipotency, says Moses, is "everlasting, and his providence as gracious, "and as extensive at this day as ever it was; "wherefore you are not to despair of the "goodness of heaven, but to bear all chances "and turns with moderation, and to consider "that the assistance that is defer'd may come "yet time enough, and in season; for so long "as there is life there is hope. You are not, "says Moses, to look upon yourselves in this "case as neglected or abandoned, but it is "God's pleasure to put your greatness of "mind and love of liberty to the trial, and "to see whether you had rather submit to a "pinching necessity, for want of meat and "drink, or lead the life of brutes in slavery, "that are only fed and fatten'd up for the "benefit of their master. It is not for my-"self, continues he, that I fear any thing; "for what am I the worse for an unjust vio-"lence upon my person; but for the sake of "your safety, I reckon myself bound to take "some care of my own; for every stone you "cast at me in this cause, imports a condem-"nation of the counsels and the doings even "of God himself."

Their wants increase upon them.

The people threaten to stone Moses.

Moses reasons the case with them.

Moses minds them of former mercies.

THESE words brought the maddest of the company, in some measure, to their wits again, and made them cast away the stones they had prepar'd for his execution. Moses having convinc'd them of the lewdness of their intention, and modestly imputing that to their necessities which could not be justified in reason, though the temptation they lay under might seem in some sort to extenuate the offence. Upon this Moses had recourse to supplications and prayers, and withdrawing up to a rock, he besought God in mercy to grant these miserable people some relief; for it was in his power only to save them; beseeching him likewise to forgive them their intemperate passions, and to cast all the things that they had said and done amiss, upon the account of human frailty. God gave him this answer, that he would take care of the people, and send them a speedy succour.

The people pacified.

Moses calls upon God.

Moses's prayer is heard.

UPON this promise and concession, Moses went down again to the multitude with joy in his countenance; which the people presently took took notice of, and in the ſtrength of that good omen, after all their ſadneſs, put on an air of chearfulneſs themſelves too. Moſes told them what had paſs'd, and that God would relieve their preſent neceſſities very ſuddenly; and ſo it prov'd, for ſoon after this came a wonderful flight of quails. There are vaſt numbers of them by the Arabian Gulf, and theſe birds were ſo tir'd with croſſing it, that they dropp'd quite weary into the camp of the Hebrews. They look'd upon this as a relief immediately ſent from Heaven; all people ſtriving with earneſtneſs to have their ſhare of the bounty. Moſes went now to his prayers again, returning God thanks, both for what he had promiſed, and what he had done.

A flight of quails drops into the camp, Exod. xvi. 13.

AFTER this firſt repaſt, God preſently ſent them another; for as Moſes was at his prayers, holding up his hands, there dropt from Heaven a kind of dew upon them, and as it fell it ſtuck to them, and thicken'd. Moſes preſently fancied it to be a ſecond ſupply, and upon taſting it was overjoy'd to find it ſo. It was now winter, and the common ſort of people would needs have this dew to be ſnow. Moſes told them they were miſtaken, and that this was no common dew, but ſuch a nouriſhment as they would find to be a competent remedy againſt famine; and ſo he firſt taſted of it himſelf, and then gave it them to try; who after his example lik'd it exceedingly well; for it had the taſte of honey, and ſome reſemblance alſo of Bdellium, and was about the bigneſs of a coriander-ſeed. There was great ſtriving for it in the gathering, till the matter was order'd by an edict, appointing that all people ſhould gather every day alike, and the meaſure of an omer to be the proportion; being aſſured at the ſame time, that there ſhould be no want of that food. This was order'd in favour of the weak, that they might not be run down, and to keep the ſtronger from taking more than came to their ſhare. Whoever ſhould exceed his meaſure, in contempt of this edict, did only take ſo much the more pains to no manner of purpoſe; for whatever they kept till the next day was good for nothing; for it bred worms, and turn'd bitter. There was one divine and incredible quality in this food, that whoever taſted it deſired nothing elſe. They have in that country to this very day certain dews and rains, which ſeem to have ſomewhat of reſemblance to this that fell upon the interceſſion of Moſes. The Hebrews call it Manna, and * Man in our tongue ſignifies an interrogation, as if we ſhould ſay, What is this? They celebrated this bleſſing with great joy, as coming from Heaven; and this was their food for the forty years they continued in the wilderneſs.

A fall of manna, Ver. 14, 15.

AFTER their removal from hence to Rephidim, they found themſelves parch'd up with an intolerable thirſt, having met with very little water for ſome days before. Being now come into a country where there was no water at all, they began to murmur againſt Moſes again; but he left them for a while by themſelves, and ſtept aſide once more to his prayers, "Beſeeching him, who gave them "meat when they were ready to ſtarve, now to "ſupply them with drink to it when they were "ready to choak; for the one without the other "would not ſatisfy their appetites." God without any delay promis'd Moſes a fountain and a flood of water, where he leaſt expected it; commanding him to ſtrike a rock near at hand there with his rod, and that rock ſhould ſupply them abundantly with what they deſir'd, beſide that it ſhould come without labour too. Moſes having receiv'd this anſwer went back to the people, who were now waiting with great impatience for his return; for they ſaw him coming down from the mountain, looking intently upon him, to ſee what tidings they could read in his countenance. Upon his returning back to the people, he told them, that God would deliver them alſo from this affliction of thirſt, by a way that they leaſt ſuſpected; that is to ſay, by a river which ſhould iſſue out of that rock. They fancied that they themſelves were to penetrate the rock to make way for the paſſage; which would have been a hard piece of work, they thought, for people to undertake, who were ſpent and half dead with thirſt and toil already. Moſes quickly undeceived them herein, by ſtriking the rock with his rod; which in that very inſtant threw out a large ſtream of water as clear as chryſtal. It was hard to ſay, whether the ſpectators were more amaz'd at the operation, or delighted in the drinking of it; for they found it ſweet and agreeable, and ſuch as became the dignity of the preſenter and the preſent. They extoll'd Moſes to the skies, when they ſaw how much he was in God's favour, and offer'd ſacrifices and thankſgivings for the benefits received. We find it written in the holy ſcripture, which is depoſited in the temple, that God had foretold to Moſes this miracle of the water out of the rock, in ſuch manner as we have heard.

CHAP. II.

The kings of the Amalekites join in a confederacy againſt the Hebrews, and are routed by Joſhua. The arrival of the Hebrews at Mount Sinai.

THE fame of the Hebrews was by this time in every body's mouth, and their reputation ſo great, far and near, that the provinces were all alarm'd at it, and entered into a conſultation together how they might keep them at a diſtance, or elſe utterly exterminate and deſtroy them; and to this purpoſe they ſent their ambaſſadors up and down from one to another to manage the counſel of the league. The chief inſtigators of this deſign were the inhabitants of the country of Gobol, and the city of Petra, who commonly went under the appellation of Amalekites, and were the moſt martial people of that quarter. The kings of theſe places not only concerted meaſures among themſelves for carrying on a war againſt the Hebrews, but drew in as many as they could of their neighbours to join with them. "Theſe people, they ſaid, were only "a vagabond army of fugitives, who ran "away out of Egypt, becauſe they would be "no longer ſlaves there, to make war upon "others. Now the beſt way to deal with "them, they ſaid, without either neglecting "or making too ſlight of them, would be to

" fall upon them, and ſubdue them in time, " while their men were raw and undiſciplin'd, " and as yet never a plentiful province in their " poſſeſſion to ſupply them with refreſhment " to recover their ſtrength, but their army " weak and feeble, and in want of all ne- " ceſſaries. In ſhort, the ſafeſt policy would " be to begin firſt, and not ſtand looking on, " till they ſhould have the confidence to be " the aggreſſors. It would be but attacking " them in the wilderneſs, before they could " make themſelves maſters of any places of " ſtrength and importance, and the buſineſs " would be effectually done. They laid it " down as a piece of neceſſary prudence, to " nip the growing power of an enemy in the " bud, and not ſtand waiting till by ſucceſs " upon ſucceſs he makes himſelf ſtronger, both " in power and reputation; and that it was " better to prevent the danger than to run " the riſque of overcoming it." Upon the debating of the whole matter in the confederate council, it was reſolv'd at laſt by common conſent to carry on an invaſive war againſt the Hebrews, and ſo to force them from their borders.

An invaſion reſolv'd upon.

Moſes and the people ſtartled at it.

MOSES at that time not in the leaſt ſuſpecting any oppoſition from the inhabitants, was not a little ſurpriz'd at this reſolution, and his people were alſo in the greateſt confuſion imaginable, at the neceſſity of ſo unexpected a war with an enemy who wanted nothing, and themſelves at all points ſo unprovided. He minded them of God's multiply'd declarations in their favour, his bringing them out of the land of Egypt, what he had done for them already, and what he would do further; and ſo encourag'd them, in confidence of his power and goodneſs, to think of nothing but victory

Moſes keeps up their hearts.

" Never reckon upon the advantages, ſays " Moſes, of arms, money, and proviſions, " but conſider that, to counterbalance all this, " you have God on your ſide to fight your " battles, and then no matter for the odds of " number and ſtratagem. You have all that " and more in him who is your helper, who " by his Almighty power hath brought you " out of greater difficulties already. Have " you not found that God a friend ſtill to you, " and an enemy to your enemies? Witneſs " his miraculous preſervation of you in your " extremities of hunger and thirſt, and in " making that a ſafe retreat to you thorough " the ſea, which at the ſame time ſwallow'd " up your adverſaries. For a concluſion, ſays " he, the gaining of this victory will put you " in poſſeſſion of all the good things of this " world; wherefore behave yourſelves like " men."

THIS diſcourſe put new life into the people, ſo that Moſes calling the heads and principals of the tribes together, addreſs'd himſelf to them all, both in general and in particular; admoniſhing the young men to hearken to their elders, and inculcating to all the reſt obedience to their commander. They were by this time ſo perfectly cured of their former apprehenſions, that they look'd upon any thing of danger with a contempt, and under a kind of impatience to come to action, in the ſtrong hope and expectation of ſuch a victory, as would put a final end to their miſery; inſomuch, that they preſs'd Moſes, with great earneſtneſs, to bring them immediately to the enemy, and not to loſe ſo critical an opportunity of fighting by an unſeaſonable delay, when the ſoldiers were in ſo good a humour for it. Moſes upon this drew out a detachment of the choiceſt men he could find for ſervice in the whole multitude, and ſet Joſhuah the ſon of Nun, and of the tribe of Ephraim over them; a man equally qualified both for arms and counſel; eminent for piety, a diſciple of Moſes, and one who did not ſhame his maſter. He ſent out ſeveral troops of guards; ſome to ſecure their water, others their tents; and ſome again to take care of the women and children. All things were now in readineſs for an engagement; the ſoldiery in arms all night, waiting only for the word of command from Moſes, who was himſelf alſo the whole night in counſel with Joſhuah, and giving order about the battle. When it began to draw toward day, Moſes recommended it to Joſhuah to make good by his actions what the world expected from him upon that occaſion, and by the glory of that day to perpetuate his name to poſterity. He did the like to all the chief of the Hebrews apart, and ſo in courſe to the whole body of the army.

Joſhuah is made general, Exod. xvii. 9.

They prepare for a battle.

HAVING thus inflam'd their reſolutions into a generous ſenſe of piety and honour, Moſes commended them to God, and to their general Joſhuah, himſelf going up to the mountain. The two armies join'd immediately, with all ſorts of encouragement from their leaders, and the battle was fought with great fury on both ſides. So long as Moſes held up his hands, Ver. 11. the Hebrews prevail'd; but when he could hold them up no longer for wearineſs, the Amalekites had the better of it. But Moſes obſerving this, ſpake to his brother Aaron, Ver. 12. and to Hur, the husband of his ſiſter Mariam, to ſtand by him and ſupport his hands for him, and to take care not to let them fall again. The Amalekites after this were totally defeated, and had been all entirely cut off, if the darkneſs of the night had not cover'd the miſerable remainder of them in their flight.

The Amalekites utterly defeated, Ver. 13.

THIS was a victory ſo glorious and ſeaſonable, that the whole hiſtory of our anceſtors cannot pretend to any thing beyond it; * for it was a total and an abſolute overthrow, gain'd upon an invading enemy, and an action of ſo great a reputation, that it ſtruck a terror into all the neighbouring provinces, beſide a prodigious booty over and above; the pillage of the Amalekites camp being of an ineſtimable value in gold and ſilver plate, curious braſs veſſels of all ſorts, minted money, fine imbroidered cloaths, rich arms, and ſoldiers equipage, horſes, baggage, cattle, &c. both to ſmall and great, and to thoſe who themſelves were but in a ſtarving condition the day before. This ſucceſs, in fine, made the Hebrews more daring, induſtrious, and forward for any virtuous exploit; and it was of a mighty advantage, even at preſent, but not comparable to what it was in the iſſue, and in the conſequences of it; for this battle broke the very hearts, as well as the bodies of the enemy, and from that time forward, all the adjoining provinces ſtood in awe of the Hebrews. This was the event of the battle; and

A vaſt booty.

* Here a little liberty is taken in the tranſlation, yet ſo as not to injure the ſenſe of the author.

on on the day following, Moſes cauſed all the dead bodies to be ſtripp'd, and the ſcatter'd arms of them who fled, to be gather'd up and employ'd for ſervice; rewards alſo to be diſtributed to thoſe who had made themſelves eminently remarkable in the battle. He did right alſo to the general, in form, and with the ſolemnity of a publick declaration to the honour of his bravery and conduct; the whole army ſeconding that illuſtrious character with praiſes and acclamations. The ſlaughter of the Amalekites was ſo great, that they could make no eſtimate of the number, and not ſo much as one Hebrew ſlain in the action. Moſes erected an altar after this victory, inſcrib'd to God the conqueror, where he worſhipped with ſacrifices and thankſgivings, foretelling at the ſame time the utter extirpation of the Amalekites, for the baſeneſs of their attempt upon the Hebrews, when they were in diſtreſs, and ready to periſh in the wilderneſs. Moſes concluded the ſolemnity with feaſtings and rejoicings, treating the general, the officers, and the whole camp with ſoldierly entertainments ſuitable to the occaſion.

Not one Hebrew ſlain.

THIS was the firſt battle the Hebrews fought after their coming out of Egypt, to the utter ruin and confuſion of their enemies. When they had ſpent ſome few days in jollity and refreſhment, they march'd forward with a better order'd army than before, and a much greater too; for the enemies arms that were taken upon the rout had much increas'd their number. Advancing at this rate by eaſy marches, they reach'd Mount Sinai, the place where Moſes ſaw the viſion of the burning buſh, which we have ſpoken of already. This was the third month after they left Egypt.

CHAP. III.

Raguel repairs to his ſon-in-law Moſes, to give him joy of his ſucceſs.

RAGUEL had no ſooner heard of the wonderful ſucceſs of Moſes, but he preſently took a journey to congratulate his ſon-in-law, and to ſee how it fared with his daughter Sepphora, and their children. Moſes was overjoy'd to ſee him, and ſo offer'd a ſacrifice, and feaſted the whole multitude, in the order of their tribes and families, at a ſmall diſtance from the burning buſh that the fire could not conſume. Aaron, in the mean while, with Raguel and the reſt, chanted forth hymns of praiſe and honour to the author of their ſafety, freedom, and deliverance; not forgetting their admirable leader, and how all things proſper'd that he took in hand. Neither was Raguel behind hand in doing right to the army, and to the dignity of their preſerver, by whoſe authority and direction ſo many wiſe and brave men were conducted and govern'd.

Raguel gives Moſes joy of his ſucceſſes, Exod. xviii. 9.

CHAP. IV.

Raguel gives Moſes advice about religion and government; and for the ordering of his army.

RAGUEL took notice one day, as his ſon-in-law was hearing of cauſes, how intolerably he was oppreſs'd with the importunity of attending ſo much buſineſs; but he could not well ſay any thing of it at preſent, without giving an interruption to the courſe of publick juſtice; beſide that the people had ſo great a reverence for the authority of Moſes, that he became their ſole arbiter of cauſes, they thinking no other perſon ſo well qualified to aſcertain juſtice among them as he; ſo that even they, againſt whom he gave judgment, would contentedly abide by his ſentence, and acquieſce in his determination, being fully convinced that he was actuated by a principle of honour and impartiality, and not of avarice and corruption. So ſoon therefore as ever the hurry of the day was well over, Raguel took Moſes apart, and gave him his opinion upon the matter. "You have, ſays he, more work "upon your hand than 'tis poſſible for one "man to diſpatch. As for the matter of pri- "vate perſonal cauſes, they are ſo numerous "you can never go through with them; "wherefore you ſhould do well to imploy "other people, as you have choice enough, "for the diſcharge of that function. But, "ſays Raguel further, as to what concerns "religion and government, that muſt be your "particular province; for there's no man ſo "fit to be truſted with the care of ſo many "thouſand ſouls as yourſelf. You cannot but "be ſenſible of the excellent faculties where- "with God hath endowed you; how inſtru- "mental you have been to the ſaving of the "people under your charge, and how neceſ- "ſary your counſel and aſſiſtance will yet be "to them for the future; wherefore do you "attend the worſhip of God, wherein you "ſhall highly contribute to the common wel- "fare of yourſelf, and of thoſe under you; "and for the trial of cauſes betwixt man and "man, you may leave it to ſuch miniſters as "you think proper. Now with reſpect to "your other affairs, the thing I would ad- "viſe you is this. Take a muſter of all "your troops, and divide them into ſo many "bodies, of ten thouſand men a-piece, placing "officers over every one of theſe bodies; you "ſhall afterwards ſubdivide them into thou- "ſands, five hundreds, hundreds, and fifties, "with officers over them too; and ſo divide "them again into thirties, twenties, and tens, "with diſtinct officers alſo belonging to them, "to take their names from the number of men "they command, and all theſe to have their "proper judges to determine controverſies; "thoſe judges to have the approbation of the "people for men of probity and virtue; yet "in caſes of great difficulty and importance, "let them repair to you. By this means the "people ſhall have right done them, and you "yourſelf be at liberty to attend God's wor- "ſhip for the good of the army, without any "interruption." Moſes was ſo well pleaſed with this ſcheme of Raguel's, that he order'd the project to be put in execution, not as any contrivance of his own, but as the advice of his father-in-law, to whom he aſcrib'd the ſole honour of it before the people. Moſes has declar'd as much in his writings alſo, ever accounting it more laudable to give worthy men their due, than for one man to uſurp to himſelf the reputation of another man's merit. But this will be fitter for another place.

CHAP. V.

Moſes goes up to the mount, where he receives the two tables of the decalogue from God, which he communicates to the people.

WHILE they continued in this place, Moſes call'd the people together, and told them that he was going to the top of Mount Sinai to converſe with God, and not without hope of bringing them comfortable news at his return; commanding them in the mean time however to pitch their tents at the foot of the mountain, where they might be near at hand; and ſo Moſes went up.

Moſes goes up to Mount Sinai, Exod. xix. 20.

MOUNT Sinai is by much the higheſt eminence in all thoſe countries, and betwixt the extreme height and the craggineſs of the rocks, it ſeems not only inacceſſible, but wearyſome to the very eye to look up at it. The place is accounted ſacred, upon the credit of an ancient tradition of God's having his habitation there. The Hebrews removed their tents, and poſted themſelves at the foot of the mountain, as Moſes had commanded them; lifting up their hands to God, and muſing within themſelves what thoſe good tidings might be, which Moſes, when he went up, promis'd to bring them at his return. In his abſence they kept their feſtivals, purifying themſelves, and living in continence for three days, even from their own wives, as they were order'd; ſoliciting Almighty God with hourly prayers to be gracious to Moſes, and grant them ſomewhat by him that might conduce to the peace and happineſs of their lives. They feaſted upon this occaſion with great magnificence, and had their wives and children dreſs'd up with more pomp and ornament than uſual. This laſted two days; but upon the third, before ſun-riſe, in as clear a sky as ever was ſeen, there appear'd a cloud which cover'd and encompaſs'd the whole camp of the Hebrews; the firſt prodigy of that kind ſince the creation. This was afterwards follow'd with a terrible tempeſt of thunder and lightening, wind and rain; intimating that God had met Moſes there in a propitious manner. The reader may take this as he pleaſes; but it will not become me to depart from the leaſt tittle of what I find written in holy ſcriptures. The Hebrews were ſo terrified at what they had ſeen and heard, as well for the novelty and ſtrangeneſs of the thing, as for the common rumour of God's dwelling upon this mount, that they durſt not ſo much as put their heads out of their tents, but fell into a conſternation, giving it for granted, that God in his wrath had taken away Moſes, and that they themſelves were to expect the ſame fate. As they lay ready to ſink under this dreadful apprehenſion, Moſes appear'd; but with ſo much joy and majeſty in his countenance, that all their fears vaniſh'd, and this change made way for hopes of better things; the air alſo recovering its former ſerenity.

A terrible tempeſt of thunder and lightening, Exod. xix. 18.

The people thought Moſes had been loſt.

WHILE this paſs'd, Moſes ſummon'd the people to attend, and hear what God had given him in charge to deliver: whereupon they drew together, and Moſes betaking himſelf to a riſing ground, where he might be beſt ſeen and heard, addreſs'd himſelf to the people in manner following:

"You men and brethern, Hebrews: as "our moſt gracious God hath been always hi-"therto propitious to your prayers, ſo I am now "to tell you, upon this preſent Occaſion, that "he hath received your meſſenger with infinite "grace and goodneſs: and you are likewiſe "to reſt aſſured, that he will take your army "into his protection, and preſcribe to you "ſuch ways of living that you yourſelves can-"not ſo much as wiſh to be more happy, than "a careful obſervance of thoſe Rules will make "you. Wherefore as you have any reverence "for that God, and for all the mighty things "that he hath done in your favour, do not "make ſlight, I beſeech you, of what I am a-"bout to ſay. Do not think the worſe of the "matter for the meanneſs of the bearer of it; "but know, that at this inſtant it is God who "ſpeaks to you, tho' by the tongue of a man. "You are only to conſider the goodneſs, and "the advantage of the commands I bring you; "and to adore the Majeſty of that God, who "for the promoting of your happineſs, hath "condeſcended to make uſe of me for the re-"porter of his gracious will and pleaſure to-"wards you. Do not any longer look upon me "as Moſes the ſon Amaram and Jochabel, but "but as the inſtrument who for your ſake cauſ-"ed the water of the Nile to be turned into "blood, and with variety of plagues broke "the hearts of the Egyptians: He who pav'd "you a way thro' the Sea, and fetch'd Food "for you from Heaven, and Water out of the "rock, for you to drink: He who made Adam "Lord of the world; ſav'd Noah from the "Deluge; put Abraham, our progenitor, in "poſſeſſion of the Land of Chanaan: he who "made Sarah bring forth Iſaac in the old age "of his parents, bleſs'd Jacob with twelve ve-"ry godly ſons, and made Joſeph governor of "Egypt; it is he, in fine, who by my hand, "honours you with theſe precepts and com-"mands; and you are to value me only as the "interpreter of his holy will. Keep theſe "commands ſacred and inviolate, and let them "be dearer to you than your wives and chil-"dren: your obedience ſhall make your lives "happy, the ſea calm, your wives fruitful, "your lands ſhall bring forth encreaſe, and "you ſhall be a terror to your enemies: for, "ſays Moſes, I have ſpoken with God face to "face; I have heard his divine voice, and I "am likewiſe to aſſure you, that he hath a "fatherly tenderneſs for you, and will take "care of your poſterity."

Moſes ſets forth God's mercies to the Iſraelites.

AT the end of this diſcourſe he conducted the people with their wives and children to a place where they might hear the voice of God ſpeaking to them, and teaching them what they were to do. This he did for the authority of the promulgation; for it would not have made ſo deep an impreſſion upon the minds of the hearers from the lips of any mortal: ſo they all heard a voice deſcending from above; and it was ſo diſtinct too, that they all underſtood it. But for the commandments that Moſes left in writing in the two tables, we are not to publiſh the very words; but the minutes of them are as follow. We are taught,

The voice of God ſpeaking to the people.

I. THAT that there is but one God, and that he alone is to be worſhipped.

II. THAT no image of any living creature is to be ador'd.

The ten commandments, Exod. xx. 2--17.

III. THAT

III. THAT no man is to ſwear raſhly.

IV. THAT the ſeventh day is to be kept holy, and not to be profaned by any common work.

V. THAT parents are to be honour'd.

VI. THAT we are not to commit murder.

VII. THAT we are not to commit adultery.

VIII. THAT we are not to commit theft.

IX. THAT we are not to bear falſe witneſs.

X. THAT we are not to covet any thing that is our neighbour's.

WHEN the people had heard the ſame things over again from the voice of God, which Moſes had told them of beforehand, they were abundantly ſatisfied, and ſo the aſſembly broke up. But before many days were over, they came frequently to Moſes's tent, ſoliciting him earneſtly to procure them a body of laws for the ordering of civil matters; who gratified them with a proviſion alſo of ſuch laws, preſcribing what to do, and what not, and how to govern themſelves one with another. But I ſhall refer the greater part of thoſe laws to a tract by itſelf.

The people ſolicit Moſes to provide them laws for the civil government.

IT was about this time that Moſes went up again to the mount, having firſt told the people of his intent, that he might not want witneſſes of his aſcenſion. His ſtay being longer than they expected, (for he was forty days abſent,) the people began to be in pain, for fear ſome miſchief might have befallen him; and in all their troubles nothing gave them ſo ſenſible an affliction as the apprehenſions of his being deſtroyed; but ſeveral perſons were of ſeveral opinions: they who had the leaſt kindneſs for him, would have it that he was devour'd by wild beaſts; others had the charity to fancy that God had taken him to himſelf; but the wiſer ſort divided their opinions betwixt theſe two. "If it ſhould prove, they ſaid, that he "was indeed torn to pieces by wild beaſts, "what was there more in it than a miſhap in "one of the common accidents of life?" And then for the ſuppoſition of his being taken up to God, it was in truth but a conjecture ſuitable to the reverence they had for his virtue. Betwixt theſe two ſurmizes, they were not caſt down ſo much for his ſake, as for their own, in the loſs of ſuch a governor and patron, as was never to be repair'd. their grief and deſperation left them no place to hope for any thing; and in theſe hopeleſs circumſtances they could not yet forbear lamenting: Nay, they durſt not ſo much as move their camp, becauſe of the order they had to wait his coming back.

Moſes goes up again to the mount, where he continues forty days, Exod. xxiv. 13--18.

AT the end of forty days and forty nights, and without either meat or drink in that interval, Moſes returns and ſhews himſelf, to the unſpeakable joy of the whole army. He told them how much they were the care of divine providence; for in theſe days of his abſence he had been inſtructed in the meaſures and conduct of a good and happy life. He told them that it was God's command they ſhould build him a tabernacle for himſelf at any time, to come down to, when he pleaſed, and be among them; but rather as to a viſit, than to a place of abode. After this, there would be no further need, he ſaid, of travelling up into Mount Sinai; for he would come down to them. This tabernacle was ſtill to go along with the army, where God would be always at hand to receive their prayers.

Moſes faſts forty days and forty nights.

He orders the building of a tabernacle, Exod. xxvi. 1. &c.

As to the meaſures and model of it, Moſes told them that he had his inſtructions, and that there was nothing more for them to do, than preſently to enter upon the undertaking. With this he produced the two tables of the ten commandments, five in each column, and of God's own writing.

CHAP. VI.

Moſes builds a tabernacle according to God's appointment for his holy worſhip.

THE people's affections were ſo elevated with the diſcourſe and preſence of Moſes, that they made collections in ſtriſe who ſhould do moſt toward the advancing of this ſtructure. They preſented gold, ſilver, copper, curious wood that would not take the worm, goats hair, purple and ſcarlet-colour'd ſheep-skins, and ſome white, ſome blue; wool of the ſame tincture; fine linnen, precious ſtones for ornament ſet in gold; perfumes of all ſorts; and all this toward the uſe and ſervice of the tabernacle, which was, in effect, but a kind of an ambulatory portable temple. So ſoon as the contribution was made, ſome giving to the uttermoſt of their abilities, others even beyond them, Moſes ſets his architects at work upon it without delay, as God had commanded; and they were ſo great maſters in their way too, that the people would have pitch'd upon the ſame perſons, even if it had been left to their own choice. Their names we have upon record in the holy ſcriptures; as Bezaleel of the tribe of Judah, the ſon of Uri, and Mariam the ſiſter of Moſes; Aholiab, the ſon of Aheſamach, of the tribe of Dan. Nay, the people were ſo free of their money, goods, and pains, that Moſes was forc'd to reſtrain them by a proclamation, and bid them hold their hands, there being more than enough brought in already. And the maſter-builders were of that opinion, ſo that they were now to begin the building of the fabrick; Moſes directing the magnitude and the proportion of it, according to what God had appointed in the mount. He gave particular orders alſo for the ſacrificing veſſels, with the ſize and number of thoſe who were to be employ'd in the divine worſhip. The zeal and bounty of the women too was very remarkable, in the ſparkling magnificence and curioſity of the ſacerdotal veſtments, and whatever elſe might ſerve to illuſtrate either the place or the duty.

The names of the chief maſter-workmen, Exod. xxxv. 30--34.

THINGS being thus prepar'd, and the gold, ſilver, braſs, loom-work, and other materials all in readineſs, Moſes proclaim'd a feſtival, where every man was to attend, and ſacrifice according to his ability: and ſo ſoon as that ſolemnity was over, he went immediately in hand with the erecting of a tabernacle according to this following Model.

Moſes erects a tabernacle, Exod. xxxviii. 9, &c.

THE outward court was to be fifty cubits in breadth, a hundred in length; twenty brazen pillars on each ſide long ways, ten a-croſs, and every pillar five cubits in height, with rings and borders to it of ſilver: the baſes of braſs curiouſly wrought and gilded, and faſten'd into the ground with pins of a cubit in length, pointed at the end like the foot of a pike: which with the help cords that paſs'd through the the rings bound the whole frame together, from top to bottom, and kept it firm and ſteady againſt the ſtrongeſt blaſts. It was alſo encompaſs'd with a veil of curious fine linnen, that hung from the corniſhes down to the very baſes, which ſerv'd for a wall to the encloſure.

THESE were the dimenſions of three ſides of the work, and it was alſo fifty cubits in front: twenty of them left open for a door or entrance, with two planks or quarters, like gate-poſts on each ſide of the paſſage. They were cover'd all over with ſilver work, only the baſes were braſs. There were likewiſe ſix other planks, three on each hand, that for ſtrength's ſake were jointed one into another, and a curious curtain drawn over them. The gate ſpace being twenty cubits wide, was five alſo in depth, and cover'd with a delicate imbroidery of flowers and figures (living creatures only excepted) in violet colours, ſcarlet and purple, upon a veil of fine linnen.

WITHIN the court-gate ſtood a laver for water, being a large veſſel of braſs, with a foot of the ſame, for the prieſts to waſh their hands and their feet in.

The poſition of the tabernacle.

IN the middle of this court ſtood the tabernacle, fronting to the eaſt for the advantage of receiving the beams of the riſing Sun. It was thirty cubits in length, and twelve in breadth, and juſt as high as it was broad. One ſide of it look'd towards the ſouth another to the north; and the back part of it to the weſt. The two ſides were made up of forty wooden planks, twenty of a ſide, and the form of them quadrangular, a cubit and a half in breadth, and four Fingers thick, plated all over with gold; two tenons to every plank, and two ſilver baſes, with mortiſſes to receive theſe tenons. On the weſt ſide there ſtood ſix other boards, which were likewiſe over-laid with gold, and ſo nicely put together, that they ſeem'd to be all of a-piece. Now theſe twenty boards, being each of them a cubit and a half over, make up the juſt length of thirty cubits; the ſix boards on the weſtern ſide only nine cubits; but then there were two other planks to join them, one at each corner in the ſame poſition, and of the ſame length and breadth with the other, but much thicker, to bind the ends and that ſide of the tabernacle the faſter together. Every plank had golden rings or ſtaples driven into it, and all ſo orderly diſpos'd, that they anſwer'd one another in a direct line. Through theſe rings there went ſeveral bars, of five cubits in length, and plated all over with gold; which reaching from end to end, kept the whole quarter tight, by framing one piece into another. On the back part, or the lower end of this ſtructure, the boards were all rang'd and order'd after the ſame manner, by paſſing a gilt bar through as many rings as there were plates, and accommodating one bar to another. There were moreover bolts and ſtaples at the corners to keep the ends and ſides together; which, by the help of mortiſſes to bind one piece to the other, ſecur'd the tabernacle againſt wind and weather.

The diviſion of the tabernacle, and the myſtery of it.

THE inſide of this tabernacle was divided into thrice ten cubits in length. At ten cubits from the bottom there ſtood four pillars acroſs, of the ſame workmanſhip, and the ſame matter, and upon baſes of the ſame make and metal already ſpoken of, ſtanding at equal diſtances one from the other. Within theſe pillars was the moſt holy place, which was inacceſſible even to the prieſts themſelves; to whom the reſt of the tabernacle was all open. This diviſion of it into three parts ſeems to hold ſome analogy with the conſideration of the univerſe. The firſt part, where the very prieſts were not permitted to enter, may be allow'd to have ſome reſemblance to Heaven itſelf, as the throne of the divine Majeſty; and for the other twenty cubits, where only the prieſts had admittance, it bore a reſemblance, in ſome ſort, to the earth and the ſea. At the entrance into this tabernacle, there were five gilded columns planted upon baſes of braſs, and all cover'd with curtains of fine yarn, dy'd into blue, purple, and ſcarlet, and woven together. The firſt of theſe curtains was ten cubits ſquare, and ſerv'd for a covering to the partition betwixt the moſt holy place and the holy, to keep the former out of ſight. The temple itſelf was call'd holy; but the ſpace within the four pillars bears the name of Holy of Holies. This curtain or veil was beautified with all ſorts of flowers and curious figures, living creatures only excepted. There was yet another veil, that for ſize, colours, and imbroidery, was not inferior to the former; and this overſpread the five pillars at the coming in. It was faſten'd at the top with hooks and eyes, and ſo down to the middle of the five columns, leaving the reſt open for the prieſts to enter by. This veil had another over it, of the ſame largeneſs, and almoſt contiguous to it, but the web flaxen; and it had rings tack'd to it, with a ſtring run through them, to draw at pleaſure, upon feſtival days, to give the people the ſight of the under curtain, with all the ornaments of its imbroidery and figures. At other times, and chiefly in foul weather, the upper curtain ſerv'd for a cover to preſerve the former, being of a ſtuff that was proof againſt rain. This kind of curtain has been made uſe of at the door of the temple from the very building of it to this day.

The curtains, Exod. xxxvi. 37.

The Holy, and the Holy of Holies.

THERE were likewiſe ten pieces of hanging, of eight and twenty cubits compaſs each, and four cubits deep, and ſo exactly coupled together with golden loops, as if they had been all but one intire piece. Theſe hangings cover'd the whole tabernacle, top and ſides, within one foot of the ground. There were likewiſe eleven pieces more of the ſame depth, but ſomewhat longer; that is to ſay, they were thirty cubits each, and made of hair, as the other were of wool, and the workmanſhip every jot as artificial. Theſe curtains were a covering to the other ten; and as they hung down looſe and flowing upon the ground, they carried ſome ſort of reſemblance to the canopy of a bed. The eleventh curtain was put over the door of the tabernacle, the odd number being ſpecially deſign'd for that ſervice. This covering of goat's hair had yet another of skins over that, for a ſhelter againſt heats and rains. The ſpectacle, in fine, was ſo great a ſurprize to people at a diſtance, by the ſky-colour appearance of it, that it ſeem'd to the eye a perfect repreſentation of the Heavens. Now theſe curtains of hair-cloth and skins were, as that over the gate, for a fence againſt the injuries of the ſeaſon.

The frame and figure of the ark, Exod. xxxvii. 1--6.

AFTER the finiſhing of the tabernacle as above, they went in hand with the ark of God,

God, which was made of a wood that the Hebrews call Heoron, the ſtrongeſt and firmeſt of all plants, and the moſt ſecure againſt rotting or taking the worm. The figure of the ark was this; it was two cubits and a half in length; one and a half broad, and as much in depth; cover'd all over with the pureſt gold, and ſo order'd both within and without, that there was no wood to be ſeen; the cover was cramp'd together with golden hooks, curious and firm to admiration, and every where ſo ſmooth, that there was no danger of one part galling another. At the two ends were riveted into the frame four golden rings, one at every corner; and through thoſe rings two gilded bars laid acroſs, on each ſide one, to remove the ark at any time from place to place upon occaſion; for they uſed no other way of tranſporting it, than as the prieſts and Levites carried it upon their ſhoulders. Upon this cover were two figures, which the Hebrews call Cherubs; a kind of wing'd creature, anſwering the deſcription of what Moſes ſaw about the throne of God, and the like to which no mortal had ever ſeen before. In this ark were depoſited the two tables of the decalogue; five of the commandments in each table, and two and a half in a column. This ark, in fine, was laid up in the ſanctuary.

The cherubims, Ver. 7.

The two tables depoſited in the ark.

IN this tabernacle Moſes plac'd a table, not unlike that at Delphi *; two cubits in length, one in breadth, and the height a cubit and a half. The feet of it from the middle downward were exactly like thoſe the Dorians make uſe of for their beds, and made round; but from thence upwards ſquare, with a border of four fingers thickneſs, jutting out, and a crown of gold over and under it on every ſide. Under this border there were four rings of gold, faſten'd into the upper part of the four feet; one at each corner, and gilt bars of the firmeſt wood that paſs'd through them, and ſerv'd for handles upon the removal of it from one place to another. This table ſtood in the temple toward the north, not far from the ſanctuary itſelf. There were ſet upon it twelve loaves of unleavened bread, ſix on each ſide of the table, and piled in order, one over another. They were made of the fineſt flower; two Aſſars in quantity, or ſeven Attick Cotyla's †, after the Hebrew meaſure. Over theſe loaves were two golden diſhes of incenſe. At the end of ſeven days theſe loaves were taken away, and others put in their places. Now the ſeventh day is that which we call our ſabbath; but we ſhall ſpeak further of this in another place.

The table of ſhew-bread, V. 10--16. and Exod. xl. 22.

The unleaven'd bread, Exod. xl. 23.

JUST over againſt this table, on the ſouth ſide, ſtood a golden candleſtick, the work of the founder, and caſt hollow; the weight of it an hundred mines ‡, which the Hebrews call Cinchares, and the Greeks a Talent. This candleſtick was ſet out with bowls, lilies, pomegranates, and little cups and diſhes of all pure gold, to the number of ſeventy pieces, that ſhot up out of the ſhank into ſeven branches, anſwering the number of the planets, and they were ranged in an order of uniformity one to another. On the top of theſe ſeven branches were as many lamps; which, as the candleſtick ſtood ſloping, faced toward the eaſt and the ſouth.

The golden candleſtick, Exod. xxxvii. 17--22. and Exod. xl. 24.

BETWIXT the candleſtick and the table, as aforeſaid, there was a little altar for incenſe, of the ſame ſtrong and incorruptible wood with the ark; one cubit ſquare for length and breadth, and the height of double; a golden fire-hearth, and a crown of the pureſt gold round about it from corner to corner, with rings and ſtaves through them, for the caſe of carriage.

The altar of incenſe.

THERE was alſo another altar erected before the tabernacle, the frame of the ſame wood with the former; five cubits ſquare, and three in height, finiſh'd after the ſame deſign with the former, ſave that it was plated all over with braſs; and in the middle of it, betwixt top and bottom, a brazen grate of a kind of net-work, for the aſhes to fall through. There were alſo funnels, vials, cenſers, cups and pans, and other neceſſaries for the ſervice of the altar, all of the fineſt gold. This may ſerve for an account of the tabernacle, and of the veſſels thereunto belonging.

CHAP. VII.

Of the prieſts and high-prieſt's veſtments; purifications and feſtivals.

TO proceed now to the veſtments appointed both for the ordinary prieſts, and the high-prieſt; as well thoſe that they call Chanæans of the one, as for the || Anarabaches himſelf, which ſignifies the prince of the prieſts, of the other. We ſhall begin with the former. No prieſt was to officiate without being firſt purified, according to the order and direction of the law: his under garment was of fine twiſted linnen, and made up much after the faſhion of our trowſſes or drawers: the Hebrews call it a Manachaſe, or a binder. The feet were to be put through it, and ſo drawn up over the thighs; open downward from the top, and faſt girt about the loins.

The prieſts veſtments.

Manachaſe, or Machanaſe, or Michnaſe, Exod. xxxix. 28.

OVER this was a coat of very fine linnen, which the Hebrews call Chethemene, that is to ſay, a linnen cloth; as Chethon is taken for the flax it is made of. It ſat cloſe to the whole body, with ſtraight ſleeves, and reaching down to the heels. This coat was faſten'd with a girdle about the middle, of four fingers broad, and ſo artificially ſet out with needle-work, in divers colours, that it had ſome reſemblance to the ſkin of a ſnake. There Chethemene, or Chethone, Ver. 27.

* Not that this was made after the faſhion of the Delphic table, but that the Delphic table was made after the model of this.

† An Attick Cotyla being about our half pint, ſeven of them muſt make three pints and an half; and two Aſſars being equivalent to ſeven Cotyla's, an Aſſar muſt be one pint and three fourths Engliſh meaſure. Admitting therefore a pint of flower to weigh a pound, each loaf muſt be about four pounds in weight; that is, about half a pound leſs than one of our quartern loaves.

‡ The Mines here meant we apprehend to be the common Attick Mina, which reduced to Engliſh troy weight, conſiſted of eleven ounces, ſeven penny weights, ſixteen grains, and two ſevenths, an hundred of which muſt amount to ninety four pound, ten ounces.

|| Or Chaanarabbes. See Braunius concerning the veſtments of the Hebrew prieſts, lib. i. c. 2. and 16. and lib. ii. c. 1. & 2.

were wrought into this girdle ſeveral flowers and figures in blue, purple, and ſcarlet, but the ground was linnen. It went twice about the body of the prieſt, and for the better grace, hung down from his breaſt to his feet, having only when he was in the exerciſe of his function, and in that caſe he caſt it over his left ſhoulder, to avoid being incommoded with it when in the diſcharge of his office. Moſes calls this girdle Abaneth, and we at this day call it Emian, a word that we have borrowed from the Babylonians. This garment was made without either plaits or folds, wide in the neck, and buckled together before and behind; the Hebrew name for it is Maſſabazanes.

Abaneth, Ex. xxxix. 29.

Maſſabazanes Ver. 27.

THE prieſt had alſo a kind of mitre or bonnet, like a ſmall helmet, that cover'd little more than one half of his head; the name of it is * Maſnaemphthes. It was made of linnen, and bound together with filleting over and over to keep it ſteddy. There was yet another cap of curious fine linnen, that ſerv'd for a covering to the former, and came ſo low, that there was not ſo much as a ſtitch or a ſeam of the other to be ſeen; and every part of it was ſo ſecur'd one to another, that there was no danger of any thing looſening or falling, to diſturb the prieſt in his office. This is enough ſaid of the prieſts veſtments in common one with another.

Maſnaemphthes, Ver. 28.

As to the high-prieſt, over and above all the ornaments already exhibited, he had others peculiar to his office; as a purple robe that came down to his ankles, which we call Methir; with ſuch a girdle for colours and figures, as that which we have formerly mention'd, ſaving only that this has alſo an intermixture of gold. The skirt of this veſt was trimm'd with a fringe, and hung round with pomegranates and golden bells of curious workmanſhip, which were interchangeably plac'd, and at equal diſtances one from another. This garment was all of a-piece, and without ſeam, and had no opening to it, but only lengthways, a little below the ſhoulders behind, and ſo to the middle of the breaſt before, with a border to it for decency's ſake, to keep the gaping out of ſight, with another border likewiſe to that part of it that was left open for the arms to paſs through the ſleeves.

The high-prieſt's Methir, or Meeir, V. 22.

OVER this veſtment there was yet a third, which was call'd the Ephod, and much the ſame with the Epomis of the Greeks, according to the deſcription. It was a cubit in length, embroider'd all over with gold, and a glorious variety of colours covering the whole breaſt; and it had likewiſe ſleeves to it, ſo that it was no other in effect than a ſhort coat.

The Ephod, Ver. 2, &c.

UPON the fore part of this robe, and in the middle of the breaſt, there was left a void place of a ſpan ſquare for the † Eſſen, which the Greeks call Logion, as much as to ſay in Latin, the || Rationale, or the Oracle. This ſquare piece did juſt fill up that vacancy, which was in truth left on purpoſe for it. There were golden rings at every corner, and purple ribbons run through them, to faſten the Ephod and the Rationale one to the other. And then to fill up all ſpaces, and cover the ſeams, the intervals were wrought over with ſtrings of the ſame colour. The high-prieſt had upon each ſhoulder a ſardonyx ſet in gold, which two ſtones ſerv'd for buckles to claſp one part of the Ephod to the other, with golden ringles to bind them and the Rationale together. Upon theſe ſtones were engraven in Hebrew characters the names of Jacob's twelve ſons; the ſix elder upon that on the right ſhoulder, and the other ſix on the left. There were ſet alſo in the Eſſen, or Rationale, twelve ſtones of ſuch a ſize and luſtre, that both for the ornament and the value they were ineſtimable. Theſe ſtones were diſpos'd of into four rows, at three in a row; and divided one from another by little partitions of gold, to ſecure them from falling out. In the firſt row there was a ſardonyx, a topaz, and an emerald; in the ſecond a ruby, a jaſper, and a ſapphire; in the third a ligyrius, an amethiſt, and an agate; and in the fourth a chryſolite, an onyx, and a beril. In theſe twelve precious ſtones were ſet down ſeverally the names of Jacob's twelve ſons, which we look upon as the heads of our tribes; and ſo their names were there inſerted in the order of ſeniority and birth. Now whereas theſe hooks or faſtenings were not ſufficient of themſelves to ſupport the weight of ſo many precious ſtones, there were two larger and ſtronger pieces tack'd to the upper part of the Rationale, toward the neck that ſtood out above the work of the garment; and to theſe were faſten'd two wreath'd golden chains that were convey'd by ſecret paſſages up to the ſhoulder-piece. The upper end of theſe chains was carried about to the back, and ſo hook'd with a ring behind, upon the border of the Ephod; and this was the principal holdfaſt that kept all firm together. There was alſo ſtitch'd to the Rationale, a girdle of the colour before ſpoken of, but interwoven with gold. It went twice round the body, and being tied by a knot before, the two ends were let looſe to hang dangling down, and a curious gold fringe to each of them.

The Eſſen, or Logion.

Ver. 10, 11, 12, 13, 14.

THE high-prieſt's Tiara, or mitre, was like that of other prieſts, ſaving only that it had another of purple or violet colour over it, and a triple crown of gold about it; over which crown was the reſemblance in gold of a kind of cup, in form like the bud of the plant which the Hebrews call Saccharus, and the Greeks Hyoſcyamos. But for the ſake of thoſe who have neither ſeen this plant, nor know any thing of it, or of others that perhaps may have heard of the name, and yet be ſtrangers to the nature of it, it will not be amiſs to give a ſhort deſcription of it. This plant riſes commonly to ſomewhat above three ſpans in height; the root of it is extremely like that of a turnip, and its leaf like mint; it branches out into a round knob, with a coat over it, which ſheds as the fruit ripens. The cup, as I told you, which was placed over the golden crown, was about the bigneſs of the joint of one's little finger, round and hollow, like the inſide of a goblet; but I ſhall yet explain myſelf a little further for the benefit of the reader. The figure of it was a kind of hemiſphere, narrowing a little upwards, and then enlarging itſelf toward the brims into the form of a baſon, reſembling a pomegranate cut in two; upon which there grew a round cover, ſo curious by nature, as if it had been turn'd on purpoſe for it; and it had ſharp points riſing out of it like the prickles of a pomegranate. Within this cup and cover the fruit was nouriſh'd and preſerv'd. The ſeed of it is like that of the plant ironwort, or wall-ſage *, and a flower like poppy. This was the ornament of the mitre from the neck round to the temples, but the forehead had a golden plate laid over it, with an inſcription upon it of the holy name of God; and this I think is ſufficient to be ſaid of the dreſs and veſtments of the high-prieſt.

I CANNOT but wonder in this place, at the hard meaſure we meet with in the world from people who hate and traduce us as blaſphemers and deriders of the divinity they adore. Let but any man conſider the ſtructure of the tabernacle, the ſacerdotal veſtments, and the holy veſſels which are dedicated to the ſervice of the altar, and he muſt of neceſſity be convinc'd that our law-giver was a pious man, and that all the cenſures paſs'd upon us and our profeſſion, as impious, are nothing but calumny and ſcandal; for what is all this but the image of the whole world? as will appear to any man who will but be at the pains ſoberly and impartially to examine the matter.

The tabernacle of thirty cubits is divided into three parts; that is to ſay, two for the prieſts in general, as a place in common to them all, and as free of acceſs as the earth and the ſea. The third place, where no mortal muſt be admitted to enter, is as the Heaven reſerv'd only for God himſelf. The twelve loaves of ſhew-bread upon the table, ſignify the twelve months of the year. The candleſtick is made up of ſeventy pieces, and refers to the twelve ſigns of the Zodiack, through which the ſeven planets take their courſe; and the ſeven lamps on the top of the ſeven branches bear an analogy to the planets themſelves. The curtains, with the four colours that are wrought into them, repreſent the four elements. The fine linnen ſignifies the earth, as the flax takes its growth out of it. By the purple is to be underſtood the ſea, from the blood of that ſhell-fiſh † which gives it the tincture. The violet colour is the ſymbol of the air; and the ſcarlet of the fire. By the linnen garment of the high-prieſt is deſign'd the whole body of the earth; by the blue the Heavens. The pomegranates anſwer the lightening; the noiſe of the bells the thunder. The four colour'd Ephod (ſince it pleaſed God to order it ſo to be) bears a reſemblance to the very nature of the univerſe, and the interweaving of it with gold ſeems to me to have a regard to the rays which give us light. The Rationale, or Oracle, in the middle of it, intimates the poſition of the earth in the centre of the world; the girdle about the body of the prieſt, is as the ſea about the globe of the earth; the two ſardonyx ſtones are a kind of figure of the ſun and moon; and the twelve other ſtones may be underſtood either of the twelve months, or the twelve ſigns in the circle, which the Greeks call the Zodiack. The violet-colour'd mitre ſpeaks a reſemblance of Heaven, and it would have been an irreverence to have written the ſacred name of God upon any other colour. The triple crown and plate of gold give us to underſtand the glory and the majeſty of Almighty God. This is as plain an illuſtration of theſe matters as I thought needful; and I would not loſe any opportunity, either upon this, or upon any other occaſion, of doing all poſſible right to the honour and wiſdom of our incomparable law-giver.

CHAP. VIII.

Of the prieſthood of Aaron.

WHEN the work of the tabernacle was thus far advanc'd, the next thing in order was to be the dedication of it; before which God appear'd to Moſes, and gave him in charge to ſettle his brother Aaron in the prieſthood, as a perſon of all men living who beſt deſerv'd the dignity. So Moſes call'd the people together, and treated them with a moving diſcourſe upon the virtues of Aaron; ſetting forth the zeal and paſſion he had for the good of the publick, even to the degree of hazarding his life upon ſeveral occaſions for their ſake. Moſes found the whole congregation ſo well ſatisfied with the reaſon of what he ſaid, and the choice of the perſon, that he proceeded to his buſineſs in theſe words: Exod. xxviii. & xxix.

Aaron declar'd high-prieſt by Moſes.

" GOOD people of Iſrael, ſays he, we have " now gone through the great work which " God requir'd at our hands, to the utter- " moſt of our power. But in regard that God " himſelf will vouchſafe to honour this taber- " nacle with his preſence, and that it is now " to be conſecrated, it will become us in the " firſt place to make choice of a high-prieſt " who is every way qualified for the exerciſe " of the holy function, and to offer up pray- " ers and ſacrifices for us. I muſt confeſs, " indeed, if the election were left to me, I " ſhould make no difficulty of aſſuming the " honour to myſelf, not only upon the ſcore " of human frailty, as all men are naturally " lovers of themſelves, but I ſhould reckon " myſelf to have ſome ſort of title to it as a " requital for the dangers and hardſhips I " have undergone for the common good: " but ſo it is in the preſent caſe, that God, " to whom belongs the power of conferring " the office of high-prieſt, has already ſingled " out and decreed Aaron to the dignity, as " the moſt worthy of the ſacerdotal robe; ſo " that Aaron is deſign'd from this time for- " ward to officiate at the altar, and to offer up " vows and ſupplications to the Almighty on " your behalf; which coming from an inter- " ceſſor of God's own appointment, will be " the more graciouſly receiv'd." The people were all highly pleaſed with what Moſes had deliver'd,

deliver'd, giving their aſſent unanimouſly and chearfully to the choice; for no man had ſo fair a pretence to the ſacred character as Aaron had, either in reſpect of his family, the gift of prophecy, which he had received, or the excellent qualities of his brother Moſes. Now Aaron had at that time four ſons; * Nabad, Abihu, Eleazar, and Ithamar.

Aaron's four ſons.

As to the remainder of what had been given toward the building of the tabernacle, Moſes order'd the overplus to be laid out in veils and coverings for the tabernacle itſelf, the golden candleſtick, the altar of incenſe, and other holy veſſels, to ſecure them upon any occaſion of removal from either wet or duſt. After this Moſes gave the people a ſummons, and laid an impoſition upon them, of half a ſhekel a head, toward the charge of the work in hand, reckoning a Hebrew ſhekel at four Attick drachma's †. They ſubmitted to the tax, in fine, with all the chearfulneſs in the world. The number of the contributors was ſix hundred five thouſand, five hundred and fifty, freemen all, and from twenty years of age to fifty; which money was all employ'd in the ſervice of the tabernacle.

A tax laid, and ſix hundred five thouſand and five hundred and fifty contributors.

Moſes applied himſelf in the next place to the purifying of the tabernacle and the prieſts; and the manner was this: he took of the choiceſt myrrh five hundred ſhekels worth ‡; and of iris the ſame quantity; cinnamon and calamus || (which are wonderfully fragrant) the one half. Theſe ingredients he order'd to be beaten together, and macerated in a hin  of the beſt olive-oil, (which hin is a veſſel that holds as much as two Attick choa's.) This compoſition being then ſet over the fire, and prepar'd by the apothecaries according to art, produced an ointment of the moſt grateful odour imaginable; with which ointment Moſes anointed the prieſts and the tabernacle, and this was the ceremony of purification, offering up ſeveral ſorts of ſacrifices alſo in the tabernacle. As to the golden altar, and the precious perfumes that were dedicated upon it, I ſhall rather paſs over the particulars, than tire out the reader with many words. But in general, there was incenſe offer'd twice a day; that is to ſay, before ſun-riſing, and about ſun-ſetting, and purifying oil preſerv'd for the lamps of the holy candleſtick; three to burn all day, and the reſt to be lighted up in the evening. The fabrick was now finiſh'd, and the two maſter-workmen concern'd in it were Bezaleel and Aholiab, whoſe office it was to ſuperintend the reſt, improving other mens inventions, and ſupplying new ones of their own; but of the two, Bezaleel had the preference. All this was done in ſeven months time, and within the compaſs of a year from their coming out of Egypt.

Bezaleel and Aholiab, Exod. xxxviii. 22, 23.

In the year following, and on the new moon of the month Xanthicus, according to the Macedonians; or Niſan, according to the Hebrews, the tabernacle was conſecrated, and ſo were all the veſſels belonging to it. Upon this occaſion God Almighty gave the Hebrews to underſtand by a remarkable providence, how graciouſly he accepted of their zeal for his ſervice, and that their labour was not loſt in the erecting of that glorious ſtructure; and this he manifeſted by deſcending to take up his habitation there, and vouchſafing them the bleſſing of his preſence. As for inſtance, it was ſo clear a ſky, that there was not one cloud to be ſeen, but juſt over and about the tabernacle. And this cloud was not either ſo thick as to threaten foul weather, nor ſo thin as to be tranſparent; but there iſſued from it ſo gentle a dew, that all who ſaw it, believ'd an Almighty power, and took it for a divine influence, and as an evident token that their prayers were heard, and that God himſelf honour'd them with his preſence.

The tabernacle conſecrated, Exod. xl. 17--38.

When Moſes had gratified the artificers who erected and beautified this ſtructure, with encouragements and rewards anſwerable to their deſerts, he ſacrificed in the door of the tabernacle, as God had commanded him, a bullock, a ram, and a kid for the ſins of the people. As to the ceremonies properly belonging to the ſacrifices, I ſhall handle that point more particularly when I come to ſpeak of the ſacrifices themſelves; and I ſhall likewiſe ſhew what thoſe burnt-offerings are, which the law has appointed to be totally conſum'd, and thoſe again which the law permits to be eaten. When the beaſts, as aforeſaid, were now kill'd, Moſes took of the blood, and ſprinkled it upon Aaron and his ſons, purifying them with water of the fountain, and anointing oil, and ſo hallowing them for prieſts of the Lord. This form of conſecration was repeated in all the parts of it for ſeven days one after another ſucceſſively, with the oblation of the ſame ſacrifices, one of a ſort every day. On the eighth day Moſes appointed a feſtival, and order'd the people to come in and ſacrifice according to their abilities; who were ſo ready and chearful in their compliance, that they did not only contend in a pious emulation one with another who ſhould go fartheſt, but made it a point of honour and conſcience even to outdo themſelves. The ſacrifices were no ſooner laid upon the altar, but there broke out a flame from them of its own accord, like a flaſh of lightening, which conſum'd them all.

There was a dreadful calamity ſoon after this befel Aaron, and would have gone to the heart of him, both as a man and as a father, if he had not been endued with fortitude, and a perſon abſolutely reſign'd to God's holy will and pleaſure. Nabad and Abihu, the two eldeſt of Aaron's four ſons already ſpoken of, as they were about to ſacrifice upon the altar, not according to the preſcription of Moſes, but after a manner formerly in practice, were all on a ſudden blaſted and conſum'd with a judicial fire, their bodies and their faces ſhrivel'd up, and themſelves ſcorch'd to death with a flame not to be quench'd. Moſes, upon this, order'd their father and their brothers to take up the bodies and carry them out of the camp, and ſo to give them a decent burial. The unexpected death of theſe brothers was ſo terrible a ſurprize to the multitude, that their grief was in effect inconſolable: but Moſes earneſtly exhorted the father and the brethren not to lay this tribulation to heart, and rather to conſider that it did not ſtand with the dignity of the prieſthood to prefer an impotent paſſion to the honour and glory of God, Aaron being at this time inveſted with the ſacerdotal ſtole.

MOSES, in fine, deliver'd himſelf up ſo entirely to the ſervice of God, that he never minded the addreſſes and acclamations of the people. He went no longer now to Mount Sinai for counſel, but into the tabernacle for divine inſtructions in matters of conſequence, and whenever the neceſſity of affairs requir'd it; and in all reſpects lived like a private man, ſave only in the exerciſe of his charge and function, for the good and well-being of the publick. He gave them alſo the laws and precepts in writing, for the leading of their lives acceptable in the ſight of God, and for the preſerving of themſelves in peace and unity, which laws and precepts were no other than the dictates of God himſelf. Of theſe laws I ſhall ſay ſomewhat farther in another place.

BUT before I proceed, I muſt here ſupply one remark about the veſtments of the high-prieſt, which I have hitherto omitted. And it is this, that to prevent all poſſibility of putting any impoſture upon the world, under the countenance of the holy robe, or a pretext of the gift of prophecy, it is to be obſerv'd that whenever God vouchſaf'd to honour theſe prieſts with his ſpecial preſence, he never fail'd of accompanying that gracious deſcenſion with ſome ſignal viſible circumſtance or other, to convince, not only his own people, but ſtrangers alſo, of the reality of that divine appearance. To inſtance, in the two ſardonyx's on the high-prieſt's ſhoulders (which we have formerly ſpoken of, and which every body knows the nature of:) what a wonderful light does the ſtone on the right ſhoulder of the high-prieſt's caſt at a great diſtance beyond the natural luſtre, upon the occaſion of God's ſhewing himſelf well pleas'd with the ſacrifices, and not otherwiſe! and this to the admiration and ſatisfaction of all men living, ſave only ſuch as ſet up to gain the reputation of wiſe men by a profeſs'd contempt of our religion. But there is another thing yet that is ſtill more amazing: I ſpeak of the twelve precious ſtones that the high-prieſt wore upon his Eſſen, or Rationale, when God preſag'd a victory: for there came out of them ſo ſparkling a glory that all the people look'd upon it as a divine influence, and as an earneſt of God's aſſiſtance. And hence it is that the Greeks who have any ſort of eſteem for our rites and ſolemnities, and are convinc'd of the miracle by their very eyes, call this Eſſen Logion, which ſignifies an Oracle [as well as Rationale.] But it is now two hundred years and upward that this ſardonyx and Eſſen have left ſhining, or at leaſt diſcontinu'd the manifeſtations of their miraculous light and ſplendor; for God hath been offended with us for the tranſgreſſion of his laws, as I ſhall ſhew elſewhere, and ſo return to my Narration.

The ſparkling of the high-prieſt's jewels a preſage of victory.

THE tabernacle being now conſecrated, and all things diſpatch'd that related to the ſervice of the Almighty, the people were ſo tranſported with joy, to conſider that God was come down to dwell among them, that they gave up themſelves wholly to hymns and ſacrifices, and to the thought of living at eaſe, without ſo much as dreaming of any more difficulties to come: ſome of the tribes, in general, and others in particular, preſenting their reſpective oblations. The heads and princes of the twelve tribes brought ſix waggons, and a pair of oxen to each of them, for the ſervice of the tabernacle, upon any occaſion of removing, over and about a ſilver charger of a hundred and thirty ſhekels weight, and a ſilver bowl of ſeventy ſhekels, both full of fine flour mingled with oil, to be uſed in the ſacrifices; with an incenſe-cup alſo full of perfumes, and valu'd at ten daricks. They offer'd likewiſe a young bullock, a ram, and a lamb of a year old for a burnt-offering; with a he-goat for a ſin-offering. They had likewiſe their peace-offerings; that is to ſay, two bullocks a day, five rams, with as many lambs and he-goats of a year old. Theſe ſacrifices continu'd at one a day for twelve days ſucceſſively.

The oblations of the tribes, Num. vii.

MOSES, as I have ſaid already, went no longer up to Mount Sinai, but into the tabernacle to receive God's directions about the laws and rules that were to be eſtabliſh'd: which being wholly of divine appointment and inſtitution, and above the reach of human underſtanding, it was but reaſon that the ſacred authority and obligation of them ſhould be perpetual. I have ſaid enough elſewhere to prove theſe laws the gift of God, and indiſpenſibly binding to the Hebrews, as well in the liberties of peace as in the neceſſities of war. But I ſhall have occaſion to handle this point more at large in a tract by itſelf.

Moſes conſults God in the tabernacle, Ver. 89.

CHAP. IX.

Of ſacrifices.

BEING now to handle the point of ſacrifices and purifications, I ſhall only mind the reader of ſome few laws upon that ſubject. There are two ſorts of ſacrifices; the one particular and private, the other popular and publick: And theſe two differ in the manner of the celebration. One of them is call'd a burnt-offering, or an holocauſt; as who ſhall ſay, the whole ſacrifice is to be burnt: the other is an offering of thankſgiving, and to be eaten by the preſenters of it. To begin now with the former: When a private man makes an oblation of a burnt-offering, he brings a bullock, a lamb, and a goat, the two latter not above a year old, but the firſt may be allow'd to be ſomewhat older: they muſt all be males, and entirely conſum'd by the fire. When they are kill'd, the prieſt ſprinkles the blood of them round about the altar, and after they are well waſh'd, cuts them in pieces, ſtrows them with ſalt, and lays them all together upon it; where Sacrifices, particular and publick.

A burnt-offering, Lev. i. 5 and 10.

the wood lies ready kindled beforehand. He waſhes the feet and the entrails, and then caſts them into the fire with the reſt. The skin belongs to the prieſt. And this is the ceremony of a burnt-offering.

A peace-offering, Levit. iii. 1--16.

If the oblation be a peace-offering, or an offering of thankſgiving, the ſacrifices are of the ſame ſort of creatures, only they muſt be upward of yearlings, without blemiſh, and male and female that have had copulation. The prieſt, after the killing of them, ſprinkles the blood upon the altar, upon which he lays alſo the kidneys, the caul and the fillets of the liver, with all the fat upon them, and the rump of the lamb. The breaſt and the right ſhoulder is the prieſt's due; and for the overplus, they who offer the ſacrifice may eat of it during two days, and the remainder afterwards to be burnt.

A ſin-offering, Lev. v. 7.

The ſame method is obſerv'd in the ſin-offering, only thoſe who are unable to furniſh theſe ſacrifices, ſhall offer two young pigeons, or two turtles; the one for a burnt-offering, and the other for the prieſts to eat. But I ſhall explain myſelf more at large when I come to treat further of ſacrifices.

Sins of ignorance, Ver. 15. &c.

If any man falls into the ſin of ignorance, his ſacrifice ſhall be a lamb, or a ſhe-goat of the ſame age as before, for a ſin-offering; and the prieſt, inſtead of ſmearing the altar all over with the blood, ſhall only ſprinkle it upon the horns, or corners of it; the kidney, with the caul and the fibres of the liver to be laid upon the altar; the fleſh and the skins are to be reſerv'd for the prieſts, and the fleſh to be eat up that day in the temple; it being againſt the law to leave any part of it till the next day.

Wilful ſins.

If any man commits a wilful ſin, though ſo cloſe that it is impoſſible to produce any legal proof againſt him, the law appoints a ram for his offering, and the prieſts to eat the fleſh of it in the tabernacle the ſame day. The ſin-offering of the heads of the tribes is the very ſame with that of private men, ſaving only that the ſacrifices are to be a bull and a male-goat.

Laws for feaſts and ſacrifices, Lev. ii. 4--16.

According to the law, in all ſacrifices, as well private as publick, there was to be a certain proportian of fine flour; the quantity of one aſſar to a lamb, two to a ram, and three to a bullock; and this was to be conſecrated upon the altar, with a mixture of oil. It was part alſo of the oblation; half a hin of oil to a bullock, (an antient Hebrew meaſure of about two Attick choa's,) a third part of it to a ram, and a fourth to a lamb: they were oblig'd likewiſe to provide juſt as much wine as oil, and to pour the wine about the altar. If any one ſhall make an offering of fine flour for the performance of a vow, without ſacrificing, let him lay a handful of it upon the altar, and the prieſt to eat the reſt, either boil'd, (for it is kneaded with oil,) or made into cakes; the ſacrificer taking out of it what he finds neceſſary for burnt-offerings. The law forbids the ſacrificing of the dam and the young one at the ſame time, if the young one be not at leaſt eight days old. There are likewiſe other ſacrifices for the recovery of health, and divers ſuch like occaſions, where cakes are eaten with the fleſh of the ſacrifice, and the prieſts to take their part; but nothing of it muſt be left till the next morning.

CHAP. X.

Laws and ordinances for the regulation of prieſt's ſacrifices, feſtivals, and other matters political and civil.

The law hath alſo order'd and appointed a lamb of a year old to be ſacrificed every day, morning and evening, at the public charge; and two upon the ſeventh day, or ſabbath, after the ſame manner; and ſo likewiſe at the beginning of the month, over and above the ordinary ſacrifices, two ſeven lambs of a year old, a ram and a he-goat for a ſin-offering in caſe of any thing forgotten. Numb. xxviii. 3, 4. Numb. xxix. 2, 3.

On the ſeventh month, which the Macedonians call Hyperberetæus, the offering was a bullock, a ram, and ſeven lambs, beſide thoſe already mention'd, and a he-goat for a ſin-offering.

On the tenth day of the ſame month was a faſt till night, and the ſacrifices were a young bullock, two rams, ſeven lambs, and a he-goat for ſin, with two other goats over and above. One of theſe goats was preſented alive before the Lord, and ſo let go into the wilderneſs as a ſcape-goat to expiate for the people; the other was carried out into ſome ſweet clean place near the camp, and there burnt to aſhes, skin and all, without reſerving any part of it; and the bullock was likewiſe burnt at the ſame time. Now this bullock was not provided by the people, but by the high-prieſt; who, after the killing of him, and the bringing of his blood with that of the goat into the temple, dipped his finger into the blood, and ſprinkled the cover of the tabernacle ſeven times, and ſo in like manner the floor, the whole temple, the golden altar, and the great altar before the door of the tabernacle. After this, the extreme parts of theſe creatures, the kidneys and the fat, with part of the liver, were laid upon the altar, the high-prieſt furniſhing a ram alſo upon his own account, and all preſented to the Lord for a burnt-offering. The ſcape-goat, Levit. xvi. 10.

Upon the fifteenth day of the ſame month, winter drawing on, the people were commanded, with their reſpective tribes, to ſecure and fortify their tents againſt the rigour of the ſeaſon; and likewiſe that, whenever they ſhould come into the land that God had promis'd them, they ſhould repair to the metropolis, as the ſeat of the holy temple, and there celebrate an eight days feſtival, with burnt-offerings, ſacrifices, and peace-offerings; carrying boughs in their hands of myrtle, willow, palms, and little ſprouts of the peach-tree. Levit. xxiii. 30--43.

On the firſt day of the eight was to be preſented a burnt-offering, of thirteen young bullocks, fourteen lambs, two rams, and a goat, for an offering of an attonement. The number of the lambs and rams, with the goat, was to be the ſame for ſix days; but one bullock to be abated every day till the number was brought down to ſeven. The eighth was to be a day of reſt, and there were dedicated to God (as I have ſaid before) a calf, a ram, ſeven lambs, and a goat for a ſin-offering. This was the feaſt of tabernacles, upon the Hebrews erecting their tents; which being handed down to us from our anceſtors, has been conſtantly The feaſt of tabernacles, Lev. xxii. 34. ſtantly obſerv'd with all ceremony by our people.

Ex. xii. Levit. xxiii. Num. ix. Deut. xvi.

IN the month Xanthicus, which we call Niſan, and reckon upon as the beginning of the year; on the fourteenth of the moon, when the ſun is in Aries, and that being the month when our forefathers came out of Egypt, the law injoins us to offer the ſame ſacrifice every year over again, which our forefathers did at their deliverance from the Egyptian bondage, under the title of the feaſt of the paſſover. This feſtival we celebrate through all our tribes, without leaving any remainder of the oblation till the next day. The fifteenth is the feaſt of unleavened bread; which laſts ſeven days, and follows in order next to the paſſover. The ſacrifices are two bullocks, one ram, and ſeven lambs for a burnt-offering; to which is added a goat every day for a ſin-offering, toward the entertainment of the prieſts. On the ſecond day of the feaſt of the unleavened bread, and the ſixteenth of the month, they make an offering to God of the firſt-fruits of their grain, before they taſte of it themſelves; judging it a reaſonable thing that the author of all the bleſſings they enjoy ſhould be ſerv'd firſt. And the method of the oblation is this: they take a quantity of corn-ears, and dry them before the fire upon a clean hearth. After this, they break and bruiſe them, and ſo offer upon the altar an Aſſar; one handful of it to be left there, and the reſt goes to the prieſt. The people after this, are allow'd to reap at pleaſure: and the offering in this caſe is a lamb for a Holocauſt.

The firſt-fruits, V. 10.

ON the fiftieth day after the feaſt of the paſſover, that is to ſay, at the end of ſeven weeks or forty nine days, was celebrated the feaſt of Pentecoſt, ſo call'd by the Greeks, as denoting the number of fifty: the Hebrews call it * Aſſartha for the ſame reaſon. On this day they offered to God a wheaten loaf of two Aſſars, bak'd with leaven, and two lambs for a ſacrifice; which ſerv'd for the prieſt's ſupper: But nothing was to be left of it till next morning. The burnt-offerings were three calves, two ſheep, fourteen lambs, and two goats for a ſin-offering. Now there are no feaſts celebrated amongſt us without burnt-offerings and a ceſſation from labour, according to certain rules and limitations preſcrib'd in both caſes by our law; with directions alſo which of the ſacrifices are to be eaten.

The feaſt of Pentecoſt, Ver. 16, 17.

THERE was likewiſe a proviſion order'd out of the publick ſtock of twenty four Aſſars of fine flour, to be made into loaves of bread with leaven, two and two to a loaf. Now this bread was to be bak'd on the ſabbath eve, and ſet upon the holy table next morning; ſix loaves on each hand, and one directly againſt the other, with two golden cups of incenſe over them; which were there to remain till the next ſabbath-day, and then given to the prieſt to eat, and others ſet in their places. The frankincenſe being alſo burnt in the holy fire, which conſumes the burnt-offerings, there was freſh incenſe immediately ſupply'd upon freſh loaves. The high-prieſt moreover, at his own expence, offer'd twice a day of the fineſt flour drenched in oil, and a little bak'd, to the proportion of an Aſſar: one half of it to be caſt into the fire in the morning, the other in the evening. But without more words at preſent, I ſhall have occaſion to be more copious upon this ſubject in another place.

CHAP. XI.

The tribe of Levi ſet apart for the ſervice of the Altar. Of meats and perſons, clean and unclean. Laws for women in child-bed, and in caſe of adultery and jealouſy.

THE tribe of Levi being now ſet apart from the reſt of the people for the peculiar ſervice of God, Moſes purify'd them with water of the fountain; and, offering of ſacrifices to God upon the occaſion, committed the tabernacle, the holy veſſels, and all other things belonging to it, to their care and charge, under the orders and appointments of the prieſts; inſomuch that they were now look'd upon as conſecrated to God.

The tribe of Levi ſet apart for God's worſhip, Num. iii. 6---12.

MOSES at the ſame time made a difference betwixt meats clean and unclean, declaring what might be eaten, and what not; which we ſhall afterward give the reaſon of as it falls in our way. But for the blood of any creature whatſoever, it is abſolutely forbidden; upon an opinion that the very life and ſpirit of the creature is in it: neither is the fleſh of any thing to be eaten that dy'd, and ſo for the caul and fat of a goat, a ſheep, or an ox, it is all prohibited.

Meats clean and unclean, Deut. xiv.

Blood forbidden to be eat, Lev. xvii. 10---15.

IT was alſo order'd that all lepers, and ſuch as labour'd under a gonorrhœa, ſhould be turn'd out of the city; and ſo for women, during the time of their natural purgations, to withdraw from the converſation of men for ſeven days, and then be permitted to return as purified. And ſo for one who has aſſiſted at the burying of a corps, he ſhall not be reputed clean till ſeven days after. But where the pollution exceeded ſeven days, the patient was ordered to ſacrifice two lambs; one to be dedicated, and the prieſts to take the other. And the ſame ſacrifice ſerves in the caſe of nocturnal pollutions; only the patient to plunge himſelf ſtript in cold water, as men uſually do after coition with their lawful wives. But the lepers effectually and to all intents and purpoſes are baniſhed the city and human converſation, as people little better than dead. But if it ſhall pleaſe God to deliver any man from this affliction upon his humble ſupplications, and to reſtore him to a ſound habit again, there are ſeveral ſacrifices which he is oblig'd to offer up to God in acknowledgment of the benefit he had receiv'd: But of this hereafter. This is enough to expoſe the ridiculous folly and groundleſs vanity of that ſtory, which will have Moſes driven out of Egypt as a leper, and therefore none ſo fit as he to conduct the Hebrews into the land of Chanaan, who were all tainted with this malady as well as himſelf. For if it had been true, he would never have eſtabliſhed ſuch a law, for his own honour; but on the contrary, he would rather have oppos'd it, if it had been propounded; eſpecially conſidering that in ſeveral parts of the world lepers are ſo far from being ſubjected to indignities and contempt, that they are many times advanc'd to commiſſions of honour and truſt, in charges military, military, eccleſiaſtical, and civil. This is evident from the caſe of Naaman the leper, whom the king of Syria ſo highly eſteemed, as to advance him to be general over all his army, leaning on his hand when he went to worſhip in the houſe of Rimmon his God. Now if Moſes and the multitude were in truth tainted with this malady, how came it that he did not rather eſtabliſh laws in favour of it? Wherefore it is as clear as day, that this ſcandalous report was only a malicious fiction, to make us and our profeſſion odious. But Moſes being clean himſelf, and converſing with thoſe that were ſo, he ordain'd this law for the glory of God, and with a regard to thoſe who were infected. But every man is at liberty to think of this matter as he pleaſes.

Moſes vindicated.

Laws for women in child-bed. Lev. xii.

IN the caſe of a woman that is newly deliver'd of a child, if it be a male, ſhe is not allow'd to enter the temple, or to be preſent at divine ſervice forty days after; nor, if it be a female, for twice as many. But at the end of the term aforeſaid, ſhe is bound to offer ſacrifices; part to God, and the remainder to the prieſts.

Laws in caſe of adultery, or Jealouſy, Num. v. 14, &c.

IF a man ſuſpects his wife of adultery, his offering muſt be an Aſſar of barley-meal; laying a handful of it upon the altar, and giving the reſt to the prieſts to eat. After this ſome one of the prieſts ſets the woman at the gate that looks toward the tabernacle; uncovers her head, and writing the name of God upon a parchment, commands her to declare upon her oath, if ſhe had ever been falſe to her huſband's bed: To which ſhe anſwers with this imprecation: "If I have (ſays ſhe,) may my "thigh rot, and my belly burſt, and let me "die miſerable: But on the other hand, if it "ſhall be found to be only an extravagant jea-"louſy of my husband, proceeding from an "exceſs of love, I beſeech God to grant me the "bleſſing of a male-child, within ten months "from this day". After this oath, the prieſt took water, and waſh'd the ſacred name of God clear out of the parchment; and then ſtraining the water into an earthen veſſel, caſt of the duſt of the floor of the temple into it, and ſo gave it to the woman to drink. If ſhe was innocent, and tax'd unjuſtly, ſhe ſhould ſuddenly conceive, and go happily through with her burden: But if guilty of incontinence and a falſe oath both together, ſhe was ſure to periſh with horror and infamy, her thigh rotting, and her belly burſting, as is ſaid before. Theſe are the laws that Moſes gave to his countrymen, concerning his ſacrifices and purifications: Beſide a preſcription of other laws and proviſions, as follows.

CHAP. XII.

Laws againſt adultery and inceſt. Prieſts reſtrain'd in their marriages. The ſeventh year's ſabbath; and the Hebrews jubilee. Ordinances of war. The people number'd. Two ſilver trumpets, and the uſe of them.

ADULTERY was abſolutely and expreſly forbidden*; Moſes very well underſtanding that there could be no true happineſs in a conjugal ſtate, but in a mutual faith and confidence betwixt man and wife: And likewiſe how much it concerns, as well governments as families, that the members both of the one and the other ſhould be lawfully begotten. He condemn'd inceſt as a moſt horrible wickedneſs; whether with the mother, the ſtepmother, the aunt; whether by father or mother, the ſiſter, or the daughter-in-law. He prohibited the wife to live ſo much as with her own husband, in the time of her purgations. He pronounc'd it alſo a moſt abominable ſin to have to do with boys, or beaſts; and all theſe tranſgreſſions he made capital.

Inceſt, a horrible wickedneſs. Lev. xviii. xx.

As to the prieſts, Moſes laid them under a double obligation: For over and above the tying of them up to the ſame laws with other people, they were likewiſe under a prohibition of marrying with ſome ſorts of women, as a mercenary proſtitute, a maid-ſervant, a ſlave, a publick hoſteſs, or a woman divorc'd upon any account whatſoever. Now there were ſome certain allowances alſo permitted to the prieſts in ordinary, and yet deny'd to the high-prieſt; as the marrying of a widow, when the high-prieſt was only to marry a virgin. He was alſo injoin'd not to come near the dead; whereas the other prieſts were ſuffer'd to pay all cuſtomary reſpects to the bodies of their dead fathers, mothers, brothers, or children; Moſes commanding them to behave themſelves with all candour and ſimplicity both in word and deed. If a prieſt happen'd to have upon him any maim or corporal defect, he had his part however of the oblations among his fellows; but Moſes would not ſuffer him to officiate at the altar, or ſo much as to enter into the temple; looking upon it as the duty of a prieſt to demean himſelf with purity and reverence, not only in the exerciſe of his function, but in the government alſo of his life and manners. Thoſe therefore who behave themſelves as they ought to do in the ſacerdotal robe, are ſober, chaſte, and ſpotleſs in all other reſpects, as well as in their office; neither are they allow'd ſo much as to taſte of wine in their prieſt's veſtments: their ſacrifices are offer'd whole, and without blemiſh.

Lev. x. 9.

THESE were the laws that Moſes gave in the deſart, and which he cauſed to be obſerved during his life; preſcribing others alſo for the government of the people when they ſhould come into the poſſeſſion of the land of Chanaan. He order'd every ſeventh year to be a year of reſt to the earth, without either planting or plowing, anſwerable to what he had eſtabliſh'd in the caſe of the ſeventh day. He appointed likewiſe that all the fruits which the earth ſhould produce in that ſeventh year ſhould be in common to ſtrangers as well as Hebrews, without laying up any thing in ſtore. The like was to be done after ſeven times ſeven years; the next year being the fiftieth, or the Hebrews Jubilee, wherein debtors are diſcharg'd, and ſervants made free; that is to ſay, ſuch as for ſome tranſgreſſion of the law had commuted death for ſervitude. Upon the approach of this jubilee, which ſignifies liberty, there is a reſtitution alſo of lands to the antient poſſeſſors; and it is done after this manner: The buyer and ſeller meet about it; and, upon balancing the profits of the eſtate with the expences upon it, if the profit be found greater, the ſeller takes his ground again; but on the other ſide, if the charge exceeds the profit, the purchaſer receives what falls ſhort, and ſo quits the poſſeſſion. If the profit and charge ſhall fall out to be equal, the eſtate returns to the firſt owner: this was the rule alſo upon the ſale of houſes in open villages; but for thoſe in wall'd towns, there was another method, which was this: if the ſeller laid down the purchaſe-money before the year was out, he had a right to re-enter; but the year once elaps'd, the purchaſer was confirm'd in his poſſeſſion. Moſes receiv'd this body of laws from God himſelf upon Mount Sinai, for the people which were then encamp'd at the foot of the mountain, and cauſed them to be committed to writing for the uſe of poſterity.

Moſes having now ſufficiently provided for the ſettling of religion, and the civil government, his next buſineſs was to eſtabliſh certain laws and ordinances of war for the regulation of the militia; and the firſt thing he did towards it, was the iſſuing out of orders to the heads of all the tribes, Levi only excepted, to take an exact liſt of the whole number of the people that were able to bear arms. Now the Levites, being dedicated to the ſervice of God, were exempted from attending any other duty. There were found, in fine, upon the view, ſix hundred and three thouſand, ſix hundred and fifty men, from twenty to fifty, who were able to draw the ſword; and in the place of Levi, Moſes made choice of Manaſſeh, the ſon of Joſeph, and of Ephraim for Joſeph himſelf, according to the requeſt of Jacob to Joſeph when he adopted Joſeph's two ſons to himſelf, as is ſaid above.

UPON their pitching of their tents, the tabernacle was erected in the middle of the camp, with three tribes on every ſide, and large ſtreets and paſſages betwixt them, and alſo with a market-place; where all neceſſaries were to be ſold, and ſeveral ſorts of tradeſmen orderly diſpoſed of in ſhops and ſtandings about it; inſomuch, that it had the reſemblance of a regular and well-contriv'd city. The prieſts and Levites had the quarter aſſign'd them that was next the tabernacle; and an account of the Levites was taken apart; which upon the review amounted to twenty three thouſand eight hundred and eighty males*, reckoning them from the age of thirty days and upwards. So long as the cloud before ſpoken of hover'd over the tabernacle, they took it for an intimation of God's preſence there, and the army reſted and lay ſtill; but as the cloud remov'd, the army decamp'd.

A review of the Levites, Exod. xl. 34, &c.

MOSES caus'd two ſilver trumpets to be made according to this deſcription: they were near a cubit in length, the tube about the ſize of a flute, ſomewhat larger than a reed, and juſt wide enough in the mouth to receive the breath for the toning of it, turning up at the end like the mouth of a bell, or of an ordinary trumpet. The Hebrews call this inſtrument Aſophra. One of them was to call the people together, the other to ſummon a council of the princes about affairs of ſtate, and the ſounding of both together was a ſummons for a general aſſembly. Upon the moving of the tabernacle, this was the method: the three tribes to the eaſtward of it were to decamp upon the firſt ſounding; thoſe to the ſouthward upon the ſecond; the tabernacle was then to be taken in pieces, and mounted upon carriages, half and half, betwixt ſix tribes marching before it, and the other ſix following it; the Levites all this while keeping cloſe to it, and round about it. Upon the third ſounding, that part of the camp mov'd that was toward the weſt; and upon the fourth, that to the northward. They made uſe of theſe trumpets alſo in their ſacrifices, and upon their ſabbaths, and other occaſions. Moſes now ſacrific'd, and it was the firſt paſchal ſolemnity after that in the deſart, celebrated by the Iſraelites ſince their coming out of Egypt.

A murmuring againſt Moſes for want of food, and a flight of quails to ſupply it.

THE army was now decamp'd from Mount Sinai, and paſſing from place to place, (of which hereafter,) they came at laſt to Iſeremoth, where the multitude fell into a direct ſedition againſt Moſes, telling him that it was through his perſuaſion they were ſeduced out of one of the beſt countries in the world, the plenty whereof they not only ſtood in need of at preſent, but inſtead of the bleſſings he had promiſed them, were forced to wander up and down, reduced to the utmoſt diſtreſs and neceſſity, being already upon the point of periſhing for want of water; and if their manna ſhould now fail them, they ſhould be all ſtarved to death beyond redemption. When they had gone on a while, reviling the good man after this inſolent and outrageous manner, one of the company told them, they ſhould do well to call to mind the many and ſignal ſervices Moſes had formerly done them, and wholly to caſt themſelves upon the goodneſs of God for their relief; but this made the matter ſtill worſe and worſe, and ſerv'd only to inflame the mutineers. When Moſes ſaw the multitude abandon'd to this degree of deſperation, he ſpake words of kindneſs and comfort to them, notwithſtanding all the provoking affronts and indignities that had been put upon himſelf; bidding them depend upon it that they ſhould ſuddenly have fleſh ſufficient to ſupply them many days; but they gave no credit to him, but breaking out into violent exclamations, one of them, in ſcorn, asked him, how he could poſſibly take upon him to feed ſo many thouſands? His anſwer was this, That God and his ſervant Moſes would ſee them provided for, notwithſtanding all their reproaches, and it ſhould be ſuddenly too. The word was no ſooner out, but the whole camp was fill'd with quails, and the people gather'd them up; but it was not long before God took vengeance upon the Hebrews for their inſolence and impudence againſt himſelf and Moſes; for they were viſited with a plague that coſt a great many of them their lives. Spies sent into Chanaan. The delicacy and plenty of the country tempts the deputies, but are affrighted at its vast strength and fortifications. A conspiracy against Moses. Joshua and Caleb quiet the sedition. Moses and Aaron obtain mercy for the people.

Numb. xiii. 14. WHEN Moses had brought the people into a place call'd the Streights, upon the borders of Chanaan, a very incommodious quarter to live in, he call'd them together, and spake to them after this manner: "There "are, says he, two blessings that God has "promis'd us; liberty, and the enjoyment of "a happy land. By his gracious bounty at "this instant ye are in possession of one of "them, and it will not be long before you "come to be established in the other. We "are already upon the borders of Chanaan, "and it is not in the power of any king, city, "or nation to hinder our progress into the "other. Let us therefore in the first place "provide an army for the war; for there will "be no gaining of this country but by war, "nor shall we ever obtain an entire conquest "over them, without first fighting a great "many bloody battles; wherefore let us send "spies to take a view of the condition of the "land, and the strength of the people; but "above all things, let us be unanimous, and "ascribe all honour to God, who will both "assist us and fight for us."

Moses sends spies into the land of Chanaan, Numb. xiii. 16--25. WHEN Moses had made an end of speaking, the people highly approv'd of what he said, and upon his motion made choice of twelve eminent men, one out of every tribe, to send before them for discovery. They travelled through the whole land of Chanaan, from Egypt and the parts thereabouts, as far as the city Amathe and Mount Libanus. When they had well examined the nature of the soil, the state of the country, and the manners of the inhabitants, they came back again, with a particular account of what they had seen, finishing the whole work in forty days. The report they made was so much to the advantage of the place for a delicious fruitful country, and the samples of the fruits themselves that they brought along with them, were so tempting and lovely, that the people were one and all for a war to make themselves masters of it. But then, on the other hand, when the deputies came to reflect on the difficulties of the enterprize, the impassable rivers, and inaccessible mountains and precipices, the strong holds, and fortified cities that were to encounter upon the way, beside a race of giants in Hebron, of so monstrous a bulk and strength, that from their coming out of Egypt to that very instant they had never seen any thing comparable to them: their own hearts fail'd them in the first place, and so they infected the multitude with the same apprehension.

The deputies frighted at the relation of the country, Ver. 28, 29, &c.

THE people were so discourag'd upon this discourse at the hazard of the undertaking, that they brake up in a confusion, and spent that whole night with their wives and children in lamentations and outcries against God and Moses. God promises fair, they cry'd, but he does nothing for us. Then they fell again to exclaiming against Moses and his brother Aaron the high-priest. When they had pass'd away the night in outrage and blasphemy, they join'd early the next morning in a conspiracy to stone Moses and Aaron out of hand, and so return back again into Egypt.

Another mutiny against Moses, Num. xiv. 1--4.

UPON this desperate disorder, Joshua the son of Nun, of the tribe of Ephraim, and Caleb of the tribe of Judah, (being the two only dissenters of the twelve that had been employ'd in the discovery,) stood up in the middle of the congregation, and did all that was possible to appease the multitude for fear of the dreadful consequences that might attend such a tumult, delivering themselves in words to this effect: "How is it possible for "you, good people, to distrust the veracity "and goodness of God, and at the same time "to give credit to vain stories and amuse-"ments about the land of Chanaan, that are "spread abroad on purpose to affright and "abuse you? why should not you rather be-"lieve, and follow those who have taken so "much pains to put you into the possession "and enjoyment of those blessings? what's "the height of mountains, or the depth of "rivers to men of undaunted spirits, and vi-"gorous resolutions, especially when God is "both their protector and defender; where-"fore let us advance and attack the enemy, "they cry'd, without so much as the least "question of the event; only trust God for "your guide, and follow us where we lead "you." This was the course they took to pacify the people; but Moses and Aaron in the mean time threw themselves prostrate upon the ground, and besought God, not for their own sakes, but to compose the troubled minds of the ignorant people, and to deliver them from the distemper of their impotent passion: their prayers were heard, and there appear'd a cloud over the tabernacle, giving them to understand that God was present.

CHAP. XV.

Moses tells the people from God, that they themselves should never enter into the land of Chanaan, but that their children should. They repent and humble themselves. Moses, a person of great credit and authority. A miserable famine in the reign of Claudius.

MOSES, in the strength and confidence of this vision, thrusts himself into the crowd, and there laid before the people the judgments that God had denounc'd against them for their insolence and disobedience; not as a punishment answerable to the degree of the transgression, but as a fatherly correction to his children; "for, says he, upon my en-"tering into the tabernacle with supplications "and tears, to deprecate the wrath and ven-"geance of God Almighty, that he might "not utterly destroy you from off the face of "the earth, God was pleased to represent "how ungrateful a return you had made him "for all his benefits, and the indignity you "have now offer'd him in giving more credit "to the misrepresentations and false reports "of your spies, than to the promises of God "himself. I can yet assure you after this, "that you shall not all perish; neither will "God ever suffer the race of his chosen people "to 30, &c.

A denouncing prediction, Ver. 29, to 30, &c.

" to be wholly rooted out; but for the land
" of Chanaan, you muſt never expect to enjoy
" either the poſſeſſion or the comforts of it;
" for you are condemn'd to a wandering life
" for forty years in the wilderneſs, without " either houſe or home, as a puniſhment for " your iniquities. Now this will not hinder,
" but that in God's good time your children
" ſhall yet come to be lords of that bleſſed
" land, which their fathers rendered them-
" ſelves unworthy of, by their ſtubbornneſs
" and unbelief."

The people repent and ſubmit, Ver. 39, 40.

UPON this dreadful prediction thus denounced by Moſes, the people were all ſtruck with aſtoniſhment and dread, and implor'd him to intercede with God Almighty on their behalf, to pardon their ſins, to deliver them out of the wilderneſs, and put them in poſſeſſion of the promiſed land. He told them that it was not with God as it is with men in the caſes of human frailty, to be wrought upon by unreaſonable importunities; for the proceedings of the Almighty are founded upon certain knowledge, wiſdom, and juſtice; and it was upon this ground that ſentence had now paſſed upon them. It may be wonder'd at, perhaps, that Moſes, being but one man, ſhould be able to encounter the rage of ſo many thouſands, and bring them at laſt within the bounds of moderation and reaſon; but God aſſiſting him, the minds of the multitude were prepared to be overcome: they had found by woeful experience, upon ſeveral mutinies and eſſays of ſedition, that their ſtubbornneſs in reſiſting the divine will did them no good.

Moſes a perſon of great power and credit.

MOSES was a wonderful man alſo in divers other reſpects; that is to ſay, for his piety and reſolution; and ſo likewiſe for the credit he had got in the world, to be believ'd in whatever he ſaid; and that not only in his life-time, but his authority continues ſtill as ſacred to poſterity; for the Hebrews ſtand in as much awe of his laws and precepts at this very day, as if he himſelf were preſent to puniſh them for their diſobedience, and their conſciences accuſe them without need of any other witneſſes. One might give ſeveral inſtances in proof of the veneration all men had for him, as a perſon of an authority more than human, and this for one among others: there was once ſome people who came from beyond Euphrates, not without great hazard and expence, a four months journey, out of a reſpect to our way of worſhip: they offer'd ſacrifice, but were not allow'd any part of their own offering, the law of Moſes in ſome caſes forbidding it; others were not permitted to ſacrifice at all, and ſome again were forced to give off when they had but half performed their ſacrifices; others, in fine, were not ſo much as admitted into the temple, and ſo contentedly departed, chuſing rather to acquieſce in the appointments of Moſes, than to gratify their own inclinations; * and this out of no other apprehenſion than from their own conſciences: but looking upon the laws themſelves as of divine inſtitution, they had the greater reverence for the legiſlator. There happen'd not long ſince in the reign of Claudius, and in the pontificate of Iſhmael, a little before the Jewiſh war, ſo pinching a famine in Judea, that flour was ſold at four drachma's an Aſſar †. There was brought up at that time to the feaſt of unleavened bread ſeventy Corus's; ‖ that is to ſay, thirty one Sicilian Medimni, and forty one Attick. The prieſts were ready to ſtarve for want of bread, and yet not ſo much as one man of them touch'd the leaſt bit of this proviſion, ſo tender were they of their duty to the law, and of incurring God's diſpleaſure, even for their moſt ſecret ſins. Who then ſhall any longer doubt of the wonders Moſes wrought, when our very enemies are forc'd to acknowledge the divinity of the writings he hath left behind him, and to confeſs that the founder of our commonwealth was no other than the immediate inſtrument of God himſelf? But every man is left to the liberty of his own thoughts.

The Israelites make war upon the Chanaanites, contrary to the advice of Moses, and are shamefully overthrown.

Numbers xiv. 2, 3.

THE Hebrews underwent a great many hardships in the wilderness; and it was yet the most sensible part of their calamity, that God would not give them leave to make war upon the Chanaanites. Their hearts, in short, were fully set upon't; but Moses, from time to time, advising them still against it, they told him plainly in the conclusion, "That they would "e'en go their own way to work, and do their "business without him. He had a mind, they "said, to keep them in misery, and make "himself necessary to them, and that was all "he look'd after." Under this persuasion, they unadvisedly and rashly resolv'd upon the war, depending, as they said, upon God for his assistance: not so much for Moses's sake, as for the love he bare to their nation, and to the memory of their worthy ancestors. They made no doubt, but if they behav'd themselves like men, he who had formerly given them freedom, would now give them victory: or at worst, they could deal well enough with the Chanaanites, even though Moses should do all he could to set God against them. "We "are to maintain our common liberty, they "cry'd, without leaping out of one slavery "into another. What matter is it to us, whe-"ther we serve the Egyptians or Moses? we "change our master, 'tis true, but not our "condition, so long as we suffer ourselves to "be seduc'd by the illusions of this man's va-"nity and ambition. What a stir does he keep "with stories of his divine colloquies and re-"velations, as if Moses was the only confi-"dent to the privacies of God's secret pur-"poses and counsels! are not all we here of the "race of Abraham, as well as he? how comes "Moses then by the sole privilege of a divine "prescience, and a gift by himself in the fa-"culty of foretelling things to come? is not "this the land that God has promis'd us? why "do we not dispatch then, and take possession "of it, without being fool'd any longer un-"der a masque of seeking God, and subjecting "ourselves to the arrogance of one single per-"son? let us bethink ourselves, as we ought "to

CHAP. II.

The ſchiſm of Corah againſt Moſes and Aaron, about the high-prieſthood.

The levity and violence of a multitude, Numb. xvi. BUT it far'd here, as it does commonly with other great bodies, when things go croſs; there will be complaints, faction, calumnies, and diſobedience; and ſo it happen'd with the Jews. They were ſix hundred thouſand men upon the muſter, and a people not over tractable, at beſt, to their ſuperiors; but upon any pinch of neceſſity or misfortune altogether intolerable; as well one to another as to their governors. This malevolent humour of theirs gave a riſe to the moſt formida-
A deſperate ſedition, ib. ble ſedition that ever was heard of, either amongſt Greeks or Barbarians; and it had deſtroy'd them to all manner of purpoſes, if Moſes had not interpos'd to the preſerving of them, generouſly forgetting and forgiving all paſt injuries, even from thoſe very people who were ſo lately within a little of ſtoning him to death. But after all the indignities they had put, not only upon their legiſlator, but effectually upon God himſelf, in contemning his commandments, providence would not yet totally caſt them off, but graciouſly deliver'd them from the imminent danger of the moſt deſperate defection that ever was contriv'd. We are now to ſhew what this ſedition was, and how Moſes manag'd affairs after it was compos'd: but firſt of the cauſe and occaſion of it.

THERE was one Corah, a perſon of diſtinction among the Hebrews, both for his blood and his poſſeſſions, and one who had the art of humouring the people; no man living more popular. This Corah, ſeeing Moſes advanced above all his fellows, and in the exerciſe of ſovereign power, took up an envious pique againſt him. Now being both of a tribe, and kindred, Corah, the wealthier of the two, and of as good a family, he thought it hard that Moſes ſhould have the preference; wherefore he would be often venting his complaints and reſentment, and expreſſing his uneaſineſs upon that head, which made a mighty noiſe among the Levites, and his relations, wherever he uttered his diſcourſe. " Why, 'tis an intolerable
A faction ſet up againſt Moſes for taking ſo much upon him; " ſcandal, ſays he, for Moſes to take upon him
" at this rate, and to carry on his ambition
" thus under a maſque of holineſs and religi" on; and by that means to raiſe himſelf a " reputation to the wrong of other men: as " he gave lately the prieſthood, and other dig" nities to his brother Aaron, without any and advancing his brother Aaron to the high-prieſt-hood, ib. " right or colour for it, no conſent of the peo" ple to't, nor any pretext of authority, ſave
" only his own arbitrary will and pleaſure.
" And that which makes it worſe yet, is his " artful way of inſinuation, whereby he in" ſenſibly makes himſelf maſter of the go" vernment; ſo that the people have loſt their " liberty before they well know his drift. He
" that in his own conſcience finds himſelf wor" thy to be a ruler, will take the good-will
" and approbation of the people along with " him, without any need of violence for the " gaining of his end. Nay, in many caſes,
" where fairneſs and honeſty will not do the " work, the very fame of probity and ſquare
" dealing keeps men within ſome tolerable
" compaſs. But then what cannot be effected
" by force, may be ſupply'd by craft and under" mining: and that dark way of proceeding
" ought to be made exemplary in time, be" fore it breaks out into open practices upon
" the ſtate. What ſufficient reaſon can Moſes
" bring for his conferring the high-prieſthood
" upon Aaron, and his ſons after him? if " God, ſays he, has annexed the honour to the " tribe of Levi, I myſelf may pretend a right " to the preference, being of the ſame ſtock
" with Moſes, and his ſuperior, both for " riches and years. Or if it be to paſs by ſe-
" niority, it belongs to the tribe of Rubel;
" to Dathan, Abiram, and Phala, who are the " ſeniors of that tribe, and men of eminent
" credit every way among them."

Corah's ambition cover'd under a pretence of the publick good, ib. CORAH's pretext all this while was the publick good; but his buſineſs, in truth, was to inſinuate himſelf into the high-prieſthood, by the ſupplanting of Aaron. This calumny was deliver'd in terms plauſible enough, and ſo it paſſed from one to another, ſtill increaſing as it ſpread, till in the end the whole camp was full of it, and no leſs than two hundred and fifty
The whole camp in a mutiny; and two hundred and fifty leading men in the party, Ver. 17. of the principal men among them join'd with the faction, in a conſpiracy to take away the high-prieſthood from the brother of Moſes, and transfer it to Corah. This ſet the multitude all in an uproar, crouding up to the taber-
An outcry to have Moſes ſton'd. nacle, and bawling out, " ſtone him, ſtone
" him; take away this tyrant, and ſet the " people at liberty from the unmerciful op-" preſſions that this man lays upon us. If God " had had a hand, they cry'd, in this choice,

" he would never have confer'd the honour " upon a perſon ſo much below the dignity " of the function; or if God had deſign'd it " for Aaron, it ſhould have come to him by " the ſuffrage of the people, not by the fa- " vour of his brother."

MOSES knew very well what Corah was a doing, and what effect his artificial way of ſlander had upon the enrag'd multitude. But in the comfort and ſupport of a good conſcience, and in the certain knowledge that his brother was promoted to the prieſthood by God's appointment, and not upon any private account of his own, he made no difficulty (being well skill'd in popular arts) of preſenting himſelf before the people; and ſo he addreſſes himſelf to Corah in words to this effect:

Moſes's defence, Numb. xvi. 4--15.

" I GIVE it for granted, Corah, ſays he, " that you yourſelf, or any one of your noble " companions here (pointing at the two hun- " dred and fifty of the faction) is worthy of " honour; in the mean time, not excluding " the reſt of this multitude of people, how " inferior ſoever to yourſelf, upon the compa- " riſon, either in riches or other accompliſh- " ments. Aaron was not made high-prieſt for " his wealth, you yourſelf are worth as much " as both of us: nor for his nobility, for we " are all of a family, and derive from the " ſame progenitor: neither did I, induced by " any partial motive of affection or conſan- " guinity, rob any man of his right in what I " gave to my brother; for if I had any thing " in my eye but honour and juſtice, I ſhould " have given it to myſelf inſtead of him, ſince " charity begins at home; beſide that I muſt " have been a mad man to expoſe myſelf to " danger, by doing an ill thing for another, " and reaping no benefit by it myſelf: but " far be it from me to be guilty of ſuch an " improbity! God Almighty would never have " ſuffer'd either himſelf to be contemn'd, or " you to be ignorant of the moſt acceptable " things you could do to pleaſe him. It was " God himſelf who choſe the prieſt, and it " was God's act that has diſcharg'd me of " the crime. But now ſuppoſing Aaron to be " poſſeſs'd of the holy character purely by a " divine choice, and without any inclination " of partiality of mine to intervene, he ſhall " make no difficulty of caſting the cauſe upon " your ſuffrages yet over again, without in- " ſiſting upon the legality of what has been " done already, though with your own ap- " probation. This is to ſhew you that he hath " no ambition in him, and that he is ready to " part with any thing, let it be never ſo much " his right, for the purchaſing of your peace. " As to the acceptance of what God has been " pleaſed to offer us, there can be no offence " in it; and ſo on the other hand, it would " have been highly impious to have refus'd it. " But nothing however can be more reaſon- " able than to allow the benefactor a right of " ratifying and making good his own boun- " ty; wherefore you cannot do better than to " refer the matter once again even to God " himſelf, and ſo to abide by the perſon he " ſhall be pleaſed to make choice of for the " ſacred function. Now it would be a ſtrange " thing for you, Corah, by your ambition, to " bar God the liberty of chuſing his own prieſt: " this is the very caſe, and without any fur- " ther controverſy, one day more will bring " this point to an iſſue. Let all the preten- " ders to this dignity appear to-morrow " morning, with their cenſers in their hands, " and fire and incenſe in them. You muſt " have patience, Corah, and wait God's de- " termination, without preſuming to ſet up " your own authority above his; but do you " appear alſo yourſelf among the other can- " didates for the dignity; and I know not why " Aaron may not come up too, as one of the " family, and a perſon who hath behav'd him- " ſelf unblameably in the function. When " you are all together, offer up your incenſe " in the ſight of the people, and let that per- " ſon whoſe ſacrifice ſhall be moſt acceptable " to God, be declar'd to be the high-prieſt, " and then in courſe confirm'd by my autho- " rity. This will bring the whole matter in " diſpute to a fair accommodation, and like- " wiſe diſcharge me from the calumny of par- " tiality towards my brother."

Moſes's appeal, Ver. 16, 17.

CHAP. III.

God's judgment upon Corah, Dathan, and Abiram; and the prieſthood ſettled upon Aaron and his poſterity.

WITH this diſcourſe Moſes both quieted the people, and ingratiated himſelf into their better opinion at the ſame time, inſomuch that they look'd upon all he ſaid as exceedingly to the purpoſe, and gave him, in fine, the character of a very good and wiſe man; and here the council broke up.

THE next morning all the people gather'd together to attend the ſacrifice, and to ſee the event of the election then in queſtion. The multitude was tumultuous and uneaſy, divided in their inclinations, and not a little ſolicitous betwixt hope and fear, what might be the iſſue of that conteſt. Some were for having Moſes expos'd, but the men of ſenſe and ſobriety were for peace and quietneſs; for if the rabble got a head once, they did not know but they might overturn the government; for the common people are naturally fond of new things, reproachful and envious againſt their ſuperiors, apt to receive and ſpread calumnies, and carried about with every wind or rumour. Moſes however ſent a ſummons to Dathan and Abiram, commanding them to attend the buſineſs of the day, and put in their claims as they pretended; but the meſſengers brought word back that they abſolutely refuſed, ſaying, that Moſes had gotten a power into his hands by indirect means, and that they were reſolved to ſubmit no longer to the uſurpation. Upon this anſwer and return, Moſes call'd to ſuch and ſuch of the elders as he thought proper, and bad them follow him, which they did, without any difficulty or delay, Moſes not thinking it an action unworthy of him to go in perſon to the rebellious faction. Dathan and his companions hearing that Moſes and his train were coming towards them, went out of their tents with their wives and children, and there ſtood waiting to ſee what would become of this extraordinary viſit; but with their guards all at hand to repel force by force, in caſe of any violence. Moſes went peaceably forward forward till he came to Dathan, and then lifting up his hands to Heaven, he call'd upon God with a loud voice, that the whole multitude might hear him.

Moſes's ſecond appeal to God upon the juſtice of his cauſe, Num. xvi. 28.

"BLESSED God, ſays he, thou who art the "Lord of the Heavens, the earth, and the "ſea, the irrefragable witneſs of all my ac- "tions, and that whatever I have hitherto "done hath been perfectly in obedience to "thy ſpecial direction: thou who in compaſ- "ſion to the Hebrews haſt ſo graciouſly pro- "vided for them in their flight, and in their "miſerable neceſſities, having been likewiſe "upon all occaſions my conſtant ſupport, Lord "hear my prayer: thou who knoweſt all "things, and ſearcheſt the very ſecrets of our "hearts, vouchſafe to bring the truth to light, "and to lay open the ingratitude of my un- "righteous accuſers: thou who art privy to "the whole hiſtory of paſt ages, and of my "life in particular, not by hearſay, but upon "certain and infallible knowledge; Lord do "thou bear teſtimony to my innocence, againſt "the malicious calumniators of my integrity "and conduct: thou knoweſt, good God, that "at ſuch time as I was ſettled in the comfort- "able ſtate of a quiet eaſy life, under thy "bleſſing, upon my induſtry, and by the kind- "neſs of my father-in-law Raguel *, quitted "all the pleaſures and conveniences of a plen- "tiful and a ſafe privacy, in exchange for "troubleſome and dangerous commiſſions on "the behalf of theſe people; expoſing myſelf "firſt for their liberty, and now for their ſe- "curity, to all labours and hazards. But "ſince ſo it is, after all this, that I am now "fallen under the jealouſy and diſpleaſure of "thoſe very people, who by my care and "providence have been redeem'd out of ſo "many extremities; Lord, ſays he, thou who "didſt vouchſafe to appear to thy ſervant out "of the fire upon Mount Sinai, to let him "hear thy voice, and make him a witneſs of the "prodigies they wrought: thou who gaveſt "him the honour of an embaſſy into Egypt, "bringing down the Egyptians pride, and de- "livering the Hebrews out of their bondage: "thou, ſays Moſes, who laidſt the power of "Pharaoh at my feet, turning the ſea into dry "land, and that dry land into ſea again, for "the ſafety of thy people, and the confuſion "of the Egyptians, furniſhing thoſe with "arms that were defenceleſs, converting cor- "rupt water into ſweet, fetching fountains "out of rocks in the extremity of drought, "food out of the ſea, and meat from Heaven "to ſupply their wants, (a thing never heard "of before.) Lord, ſays he, thou who haſt "laid the foundations of our government, and "modell'd our laws: thou who art the judge "and witneſs of all things, avenge my cauſe, "and bear this teſtimony for me, that I never "was corrupted into the favour of an unjuſt "cauſe, or of a rich man againſt a poor; and "yet now Lord, ſays he, I find male admi- "niſtration laid to my charge, as if I had "elevated my brother to the high-prieſthood, "not by divine appointment, but by the im- "pulſe of a private affection, and without any "authority from above for what I did. Lord, "be pleaſed to make it appear now, that all "things are govern'd by thy providence, and "brought to paſs by the interpoſition of thy "holy will, not by chance; and out of thy "wonted kindneſs to the Hebrews, vindicate "thyſelf unto them, upon Dathan and Abi- "ram, for the inſolence of ſuggeſting thee to "be circumvented by my impoſtures; which "is all one with rendering thee paſſive and "inſenſible. Lord, ſays he, viſit theſe blaſ- "phemous detractors from thy glory with an "exemplary vengeance; let them not die the "common death of other men; but as they "are not worthy to live upon the earth, let "the earth ſwallow them up with their fami- "lies and ſubſtance, for the honour of thy "power, and for a document to ages to come, "that they may think more reverently of thy "divine majeſty; and if I myſelf ſhall be "found guilty of the charge exhibited againſt "me, may all thoſe curſes light upon my own "head, and my oppoſers be happy and free. "But when thou ſhalt pour out thy wrath up- "on the diſobedient and the troublers of thy "people, Lord, preſerve the reſt in peace and "unity, ſafe and untouch'd, who live in a "dutiful conformity to thy commandments; "neither will it ſtand with the methods of "thy juſtice, either to confound the innocent "with the offenders, or to puniſh the guilt- "leſs for the faults of the guilty."

THESE words were interrupted with tears, when all on a ſudden the earth fell a trembling into an agitation, like the rolling of an angry ſea in a ſtorm, which ſtruck the whole multitude with a profound aſtoniſhment and horror; and a diſmal outcry was heard upon it, that ran through all their tents. In the concluſion, the ground open'd under the feet of the faction with a terrible noiſe, and ſwallow'd them all up, every man of them, with all that appertained to them, cloſing again immediately ſo exactly, that the very mark of the rupture was not to be perceiv'd.

The earth opens, and ſwallows up Dathan and his train, Ver. 32, 33.

THIS was the end of a ſeditious ſchiſmatical faction, and an illuſtrious inſtance it was of God's providence and power at once; and to make the caſe ſtill more dreadful, there was not ſo much as one of all their relations and acquaintances who pitied them. Nay, the whole multitude had nothing in their mouths but joy and acclamations, in contemplation of this effort of divine juſtice: they look'd no further back upon things paſt, than to raiſe in them a deteſtation for the memory of thoſe people, as the peſt of their nation, and men who did not deſerve ſo much as human tenderneſs. After the extinction of Dathan and his complices, Moſes conven'd the candidates for the pontificate, committing the choice to God once more, to be confer'd upon him whoſe ſacrifice ſhould appear to be beſt accepted. There was gather'd together two hundred and fifty perſons, that both for their fathers ſakes and their own, had an eminent reputation among the people; and with theſe men came forth Aaron and Corah, who ſtanding before the tabernacle, offer'd ſuch incenſe in their cenſers as they brought with them. While they were thus employ'd, there appear'd all in an inſtant, ſo fierce a fire, that the flame of burning mountains, the conflagration of whole forests, with winds and brush-wood to assist it, were nothing in comparison to it. It was clear and flagrant, and came undoubtedly from Heaven; for no natural ingredients could have produc'd so subtle a flame. By the force of this fire, Corah, together with his two hundred and fifty companions, were so totally consum'd, that there was not so much as any remainder of their carcases to be found; only Aaron surviv'd, untouch'd, as a most certain evidence that this was the supernatural work of an Almighty power. Moses, for the perpetual memory of this judgment, in the transmitting of it to posterity, commanded Eleazar, the son of Aaron, to fasten their censers about a brazen altar, as a monument for a warning to generations to come, that God Almighty is not to be deceived or imposed upon by human cunning. By this time it was evident, beyond all contradiction, that Aaron was not elevated to the pontificate through his own ambition, or his brother's particular favour, but by God's appointment; and that he held it ever after by the same title.

CHAP. IV.

What befel the Israelites in the desart, during the space of thirty eight years.

BUT all this did not yet wholly extinguish the spirit of rebellion among the people; for it was follow'd with another sedition, worse, if possible, than the former, which took its rise from such causes as in all likelihood would not be easily suppress'd; for when they had once taken up a persuasion that all things came to pass by providence, and by the will of God, they reckon'd every thing to be done for Moses's sake; so that all the severities of divine justice were charged to his account, as if God would not have been so rigorous against sinners, if Moses had not press'd him to it, and that it was not so much for their wickedness that they were punish'd, as to gratify Moses. "What was the fault, they cry'd, of "all those noble and excellent men who lost "their lives at Moses's instigation, but the ex- "cessive zeal and affection they had for the "worship of their God? and Moses, they "said, made his profit of theirs and of the "people's ruin, by confirming his brother in "the pontifical dignity, and intailing it upon "his line; for after paying so dear for the "competition, no body else would ever pre- "tend to it again for the future." Now this was a time for the relations of the deceas'd to manage with the multitude, and to dilate upon the absolute necessity of putting some timely check to the pride and exorbitant power of Moses; "which the people might easily "do, they said, and it concern'd them to take "it into their care." Moses found a storm coming, and very prudently to prevent the ill consequences that might probably follow upon such a tumultuary practice and disposition, he order'd an assembly to be call'd, where he heard their grievances, and without one word of answer, for fear of making matters worse, appointed the heads of the tribes to bring their rods, with the names of their tribes inscrib'd upon them, and he to be prefer'd to the dignity upon whose rod should be found any particular mark of God's favour: this they all agreed to, and brought their rods with inscriptions as directed, Aaron among the rest; and his rod bear the inscription of the tribe of Levi. Moses laid them up for the present in the tabernacle of God, and the next day produc'd them, which were easily known again; for the princes that brought them, and the rest of the people, saw their own marks upon them: they found all the rest of the rods just in the same condition as they left them the day before, only Aaron's sprouted out with branches and buds; and which was yet a greater wonder, bearing ripe almonds, the rod being of the wood of the almond-tree. The strangeness of this spectacle struck the people with the utmost surprize, and intirely extinguished that animosity and enmity which they had conceived against Moses and Aaron; and they all stood in admiration at the judgment of God, resign'd themselves to his holy pleasure, and yielded the right of the election to Aaron, who was now the third time confirm'd by God himself in the priesthood, where it rested for the future without any contradiction. This, in fine, put a happy period to the troubles of the Hebrews, after a long course of violence and sedition.

Ver. 14.

The Israelites impute all their calamities to Moses.

THE tribe of Levi being set apart for the service of God in holy offices and duties, Moses exempted them from the burden of all military charges; and for fear the care of providing necessaries for life might divert them from attending the duties of their function, he order'd it, that so soon as ever the land of Chanaan should by God's assistance come to be conquer'd, there should be forty eight of the best and choicest cities allotted for the entertainment of the Levites, with two thousand cubits of land round about, and contiguous to the walls of the place, beside the imposition of a tenth part of the yearly profits arising from the fruits of the earth, to be paid as a duty on the whole people, to the priests and Levites; which hath been religiously observ'd ever since. Let this suffice as to the revenue of this tribe upon the people, and we shall now come to what directly belongs to the priests themselves.

The Levites exempted from military offices.

The priests allowance.

MOSES provided, that of the eight and forty cities before mention'd, the Levites should yield thirteen of them to the priests, and the tenth part of the tithes, beside the first-fruits of all the products of the earth, as an offering to God. The firstling of all quadrupedes offer'd in sacrifice, if a male, was to be brought to the priests to sacrifice, to be eaten in the holy city with their family; but for those which the law of the country will not permit to be eaten, the owner shall present a shekel and a half * instead of a firstling, and for the first-born of a man five shekels; and there is a duty also to be allow'd upon wool and corn, and likewise a cake upon those that bake bread.

As

Of the Nazarenes, Numb. vi.

As for the Nazarenes that tie themſelves up by a vow, neither to cut their hair, nor to drink wine; when the time of their vow is expir'd, and they preſent themſelves to have their hair conſecrated, whatever they offer in ſacrifice belongs to the prieſts; and ſo for thoſe who call themſelves Corban, that is by interpretation, a gift of God, when they deſire to be diſcharg'd of their obligation and voluntary vow, there is a duty belongs to the prieſts, of fifty ſhekels for a man, and thirty for a woman; and they who have not ſo much money, muſt remit themſelves to the diſcretion of the prieſt.

THEY who kill beaſts for private uſe, and not for ſacrifice, muſt allow the prieſts the breaſt of the beaſt, and the right ſhoulder. This was the allotment of Moſes for the prieſts, beſide ſin-offerings, which we have ſpoken of in the laſt book before this. He ordain'd likewiſe, that in all contributions to the order of the prieſts, their wives, children, and ſervants ſhould have their ſhare, ſaving in ſin-offerings, and thoſe are only to be eaten by the prieſts that officiate. It muſt be in the temple too, and on the ſame day.

The ſedition cruſh'd, and Moſes decamps.

MATTERS being thus ſettled, and the ſedition cruſh'd, Moſes decamp'd, and with his whole army march'd to the borders of Idumea, ſending his ambaſſadors beforehand to the king thereof, to deſire a free paſſage for his troops through his country, upon aſſurance that he would give him no manner of trouble, and that whatever he had he would pay for. His paſſage was, however, refus'd, and an army drawn up to the frontiers, ready to oppoſe him, if he ſhould offer to force his way. Moſes had recourſe to God for advice, whoſe anſwer was, that he would not have him the aggreſſor; and ſo he withdrew to take his way by the deſart.

Moſes deſires a paſſage through Idumea, and the king refuſes it, Numb. xx. 14–21.

The death of Mariam the ſiſter of Moſes, Ver. 1.

AT this time died Mariam the ſiſter of Moſes, at the beginning of the month Xanthicus, and in the fortieth year compleat after the coming out of Egypt. She had a publick and a ſplendid burial upon a mountain known by the name of Sin; and after thirty days of mourning, Moſes purified the people.

Forms of purification, Numb. xix.

The prieſt took a young red heifer that had never known the yoke, brought it out a little way from the army, and there in a very clean place kill'd it, dipping his finger ſeven times in the blood, and therewith ſprinkling the tabernacle of God. After this, he put the heifer whole into the fire, ſkin, entrails and all, with a ſtick of cedar, hyſſop, and a little ſcarlet-coloured wool. When all was conſum'd, a young man of an unſpotted virgin chaſtity, was employ'd to gather up the aſhes, and lay them up in the cleaneſt place that could be found. Now whoever ſtood in need of being purified, either for touching a dead body, or for aſſiſting at a funeral, he had no more to do, than to caſt of theſe aſhes into fountain-water, dip a bunch of hyſſop in it, and ſprinkle himſelf with it on the third and the ſeventh day; and this was the ceremony of the purification, which Moſes commanded to be obſerv'd whenever the Hebrews ſhould come to be poſſeſs'd of the land which God had promiſed them.

AFTER this purification was over for the death of his ſiſter, Moſes led the army through the deſart into Arabia, and coming to their capital city, formerly call'd Arce, at preſent Petra, where there was a very high mountain, Aaron being foretold by Moſes that he was near his end, went up this mountain, took off his pontifical ſtole, and deliver'd it to his ſon Eleazar, as the next heir to the dignity; and in the ſight of the whole army ended his days there, in the hundred and twenty third year of his age, and in the firſt moon of the month which the Athenians call Hecatombæon, the Macedonians Lous, the Hebrews * Sabba, and the Romans Auguſtus. His ſiſter died alſo in the ſame year.

Sihon and Og defeated by Moſes, and their lands diſtributed by Lot to two tribes and a half of the Hebrews.

WHEN the mourning for Aaron was paſt, (which laſted thirty days,) Moſes march'd the army to the river Arnon, which falls from the mountains of Arabia, and running through the whole deſart, empties itſelf into the lake Aſphalitis, dividing the Moabites from the Amorites. The country is very fruitful, and wants for nothing. The king's name of the latter was Sihon, to whom Moſes ſent very reſpectfully for leave to march his army through his country, promiſing upon his word and honour that neither his country nor his people ſhould ſuffer any injury from his army. Sihon denied him paſſage, and march'd his army immediately to take poſſeſſion of the fords of the river, thereby to hinder his coming over. Ver. 29.

WHEN Moſes found that the Amorites were reſolved upon a war, he could hardly digeſt the affront, and ſo reckon'd it his beſt courſe for himſelf to give the firſt attack; for the Hebrews being a people of an intractable diſpoſition, he did not know but want and idleneſs might again renew in them the ſpirit of ſedition and rebellion; whereupon, for fear of the worſt, he conſulted God in the firſt place, whether he ſhould attempt the forcing of his way by the ſword, or not. This he did, and obtain'd not only a permiſſion to do it, but an aſſurance of victory. Moſes, upon this encouragement, animated the army into a confidence of ſucceſs, telling them, "That now was their "time to ſignalize their valour, when they "had both divine approbation and human au-"thority to ſecond their inclinations." Upon theſe words, without any heſitation or delay, they march'd up and made a furious charge upon the enemy. The king and his army fell into a pannick terror upon the very ſight of them, and after all their big words and menaces at a diſtance, they had not the heart ſo much as to face the Hebrews: their only hope was in their heels, and in their wall'd towns, if they could come at them; but they were ſo cloſe purſued, that their flight was but of very little ſervice to them: they fell into a direct rout upon the very firſt ſhock, and in that confuſion they all ran ſeveral ways to ſave themſelves; the Hebrews, light arm'd and ſwift of foot, at the heels of them, with their ſlings, darts, and arrows, killing thoſe at a diſtance whom they could not otherwiſe overtake. Vaſt numbers of them were cut off at the river where they ſtopped to quench their thirſt, for it was exceſſive hot weather, and amongſt the reſt Sihon their king. The ſlaughter, in fine, was terrible, and never a more abſolute victory. The Hebrews had the ſpoil of the field, a prodigious booty, and that which they moſt wanted, corn in abundance; for the harveſt was yet upon the ground. All was their own in ſhort: they went whither they would, did what they would, and took what they would, without either reſiſtance or controul; for there was hardly any left behind to oppoſe them, the flower of their men being deſtroy'd in the battle.

Sihon their king ſlain, Num. xxi. 24.

THIS befel the Amorites, for want both of conduct and courage; for they had neither forecſight to prevent the miſchief, nor reſolution to encounter it. This place, which the Hebrews had now made themſelves maſters of, is a kind of peninſula, betwixt three rivers; Arnon on the ſouth, Jaboc (that falls into the river Jordan) on the north, and the river Jordan itſelf on the weſt.

WHILE matters were in this condition, the Iſraelites found they had yet another enemy to cope with, which was Og the king of Galadene, and of Gaulonitis, who as he was advancing with a powerful army to the relief of Sihon his friend and ally, by the way met with the unwelcome news of the battle, and a total defeat. But this, however, was not ſufficient to deter him from running the hazard of a battle, relying on the valour of his ſoldiers, in confidence of which he hoped ſucceſs would attend his attempt; but his hopes deceived him; for he and his whole army were cut off, to a man. After this victory, Moſes paſs'd the river Jaboc, and made an inroad into Og's dominions, deſtroying all the cities wherever he came, and putting the inhabitants to the ſword, who were a people poſſeſs'd of greater riches, and a more fruitful ſoil than any of the inhabitants of the adjacent countries. The king himſelf was a man of courage and reſolution, of great ſtrength of body, and of a gigantick ſtature, as appeared by the dimenſions of a bed of his, which was found in his palace at Rabatha. The frame of it was of iron, the breadth of it four cubits, and the length nine. The fall of this man did not only ſettle the Iſraelites in a preſent ſtate of ſecurity and quiet, but laid the foundation of great advantages to come: for they poſſeſt themſelves of no leſs than ſixty of his ſtrong holds, and well fortify'd cities, and the whole army to a man, was at the ſame time moſt prodigiouſly enrich'd with the booty.

CHAP. VI.

Moſes maketh war upon the Madianites. The hiſtory of Balaak and Balaam. Zimri oppoſes Moſes. Phinees kills Zimri and Cosby.

SOON after this, Moſes remov'd his camp to a great plain over againſt Jericho, an opulent city, and famous for palm-trees and balſam. The Iſraelites were now ſo fluſh'd with victories that their minds were intent upon nothing ſo much as battles and war; and Moſes thought it pity this martial humour ſhould lie idle: ſo that after he had offer'd up to God ſacrifices of thankſgiving, and feaſted his army, he ſent away a detachment to lay waſte the country of the Madianites, and to deſtroy their cities. The ground of the war was this:

Moſes makes war upon the Madianites.

BALAAK, the king of the Moabites, and an antient ally of the Madianites, obſerving the growing power of the Iſraelites, began to have ſome apprehenſion for himſelf, and of his own ſafety. He did not know, it ſeems, that God had forbidden the Hebrews to attempt any other conqueſt than that of Chanaan; ſo that he was either not well inform'd, or not well adviſ'd upon this matter. As to the point of making war upon a people elevated, and puffed up with ſuch a courſe of ſucceſſes, it was a thing he durſt not ſo much as think of; but he was willing enough yet to put ſome ſtop to their farther progreſs, and ſo ſent his ambaſſadors to the Madianites, to conſult what might be done for the common ſecurity of them both. The Madianites ſent away preſently Balaak's ambaſſadors, and ſome men of honour with them, to one Balaam, who liv'd beyond the Euphrates; a famous prophet in thoſe parts, and their particular friend; deſiring him only to come over to them, and curſe the Iſraelites. After he had treated the ambaſſadors with great generoſity and reſpect, he asked counſel of God what return he ſhould make them. His order was, that he ſhould not comply with them, and ſo with that anſwer he went back, telling them that it was not for want of goodwill towards them that he did not gratify their deſires, but that God was againſt it, to whoſe goodneſs he ſtood indebted for the reputation he had gotten of a true prophet; declaring farther to them, that the army which they would have him to curſe, was highly in God's favour. And therefore it was his advice, that they ſhould rather addreſs themſelves to the Iſraelites, and ſecure a fair underſtanding with thoſe people upon what terms ſoever. With this reſolution he diſcharg'd the ambaſſadors: but the Madianites, upon the violent importunity of Balaak (who was much unſatisfy'd with the anſwer) ſent the ſame meſſengers a ſecond time, upon the ſame errand; and Balaam to ſhew a willingneſs to oblige them, went and conſulted God a ſecond time upon the ſame queſtion. "Why then you may go along with "the ambaſſadors," (ſays the oracle;) and Balaam, not conſidering with what air it was ſpoken, went ſimply along with them. As they were upon the way, an angel met them in a narrow place betwixt two walls, where there was not room enough for two to paſs. Balaam was mounted upon an aſs, which at the ſight of this viſion, ſtopt, and upon his ſtriking, and preſſing to make her go forward, ſhe ſqueez'd him up againſt the wall; the angel keeping the way ſtill, and the prophet ſtill correcting his aſs; but it pleaſed God at length to open the aſs's mouth, in a complaint of the injuſtice of her maſter, to beat her at that time for not going forward, when the angel of the Lord ſtood there in the paſſage, to divert him from doing what he was about to do. The aſs urging alſo, that this was the firſt time ſhe had ever ever disobey'd him. Balaam was surpriz'd, and affrighted to hear the ass talk like a man; and the angel rebuked Balaam for what he had done, telling him, "That it was not the "fault of the beast, but the fault of the pro-"phet, in presuming to take a journey, con-"trary to the declared will of God." The prophet would have gone back, but God bad him go forward, upon condition, that he should say nothing but what he himself put in his mouth.

Balaam goes to Balaak, Num. xxii. 36.

UPON the condition aforesaid, Balaam went to Balaak, and, after a very gracious reception, desir'd the king he might be conducted to some of the high mountains thereabouts, where he might take a view of the camp of the Hebrews. So Balaak himself took Balaam along with him, with his royal train, up to the top of a mountain, a matter of sixty furlongs from the army: and when the prophet had made his remarks, he directed seven altars to be rais'd, and seven bulls, and as many rams to be prepared for sacrifices; which was done out of hand, and the victims presently offer'd up in order to the forming of a judgment upon the matter in question betwixt the two armies. So soon as he had well digested his observations, he deliver'd the result of his presages with his face toward the army of the Israelites in these words.

Balaam looks toward the Israelites, and prophesies, Ver. 7--24.

"You are the happy people, says he, who "by the blessing and bounty of God, shall en-"joy plenty of all good things in abundance; "you shall have providence for your guide, "your protector, and support, and a reputa-"tion beyond all other mortals, for the inno-"cence of your lives, the probity of your man-"ners, and your love and practice of virtue; "and the fame of your posterity shall yet ex-"ceed that of your forefathers; for God will "take you into his peculiar care and protec-"tion, and make you, of all nations under "the sun, the most blessed. You shall enter "into possession of the Land of promise, whi-"ther God hath sent you, and it shall be to "you and your posterity for ever. The whole "earth and sea shall be full of your glory; "and you shall have so numerous an issue, that "in all parts of the world, there shall be "found of your stock and family. O thou "wonderful and blessed army! to grow to such "a vast number out of the loins of one single "man. The land of Chanaan must at present "content you, though a spot of ground not "answerable either to your dignity or num-"ber; but know that the time is a coming, "when you shall have the whole world for your "habitation. Your children shall people the "islands as well as the continent, and be as the "stars in the heavens for number. And yet in "that infinite multitude, you shall feel no "want of any thing: But God shall give you "plenty in peace; courage and victory in "war, and the children of your enemies shall "be your servants; wherefore may our ad-"versaries be yours too, for it shall be ruin "to them to rise against you, and the wives "and children of your adversaries shall have "little reason to thank their husbands, and "their fathers, for any news they shall bring "them from such an encounter. You are to "bless the providence of God, in fine, for "all these gifts and graces; that God, I say, "who alone can exalt or bring down, as the "case requires it."

THESE were the words of God, not of Balaam, for he was transported beyond himself, and under the power of a supernatural and prophetical spirit. Balaak all this while expressing his resentment, and upbraiding him, that he had not kept covenants, "Since, he "said, he had invited him over with great "rewards to curse the Israelites, and yet "when it came to the point, he had altoge-"ther pronounced them blessed." To which Balaam made this reply:

Balaak highly offended at Balaam, V. 25.

"AND does king Balaak think, says he, "that where prophets are upon the subject of "fatalities, and things to come, they are left "to their own liberty what to say, and what "not; and to make their own speeches? We "are only the passive instruments of the ora-"cle; the words are put in our mouths, and "we neither think, nor know what we say. "I remember very well, says he, that I was "invited hither with great earnestness, both "by yourself, and by the Madianites, and "that it was at your request I came, and with "a desire to do all that in me lay for your "service. But what am I able to do against "the will and power of God? Nay, I had "thoughts and wishes of doing what I found "afterwards I was not at liberty to do. When "once a superior power takes possession of us, "we are no longer under the government of "ourselves. I had not the least thought of "speaking one good word of the Israelites "army, or of the blessings that God hath in "store for them. But since God hath decreed "to make them great and happy, I have been "forced to speak as you have heard, instead "of what I had otherwise design'd to say. "But now to answer the very wishes, both of "yourself and the Madianites, with all pos-"sible decency and respect, let us erect other "altars, and provide new sacrifices, and try "yet once again, if God will give me leave "to curse these people." Balaak approv'd the motion, and the sacrifices were renew'd; but God would not yet be prevail'd upon for leave to curse the Israelites. Nay, on the contrary, he fell upon his face, and foretold the fate of several great kings, and famous cities; some not as yet in being, others now extant, that in our memory have answer'd the predictions, in several actions both at sea and land, from whence may be reasonably inferr'd, a probability also, that the other parts of the prophecy are not idle.

The credit of Balaam's predictions.

BALAAK was so provok'd at this disappointment of his hope and expectation, that he dismiss'd the prophet without either honour or reward, and so took his leave; but coming to Euphrates, he bethought himself, and sent to speak with Balaak, and the princes of the Madianites yet once more; and that which he had to say was to this purpose:

Numb. xxiv. 10.

"To the end, says he, that king Balaak, "and you the princes of Madian, may know "the great desire I have to please you, tho' "in some sort against the will of God, I "have bethought myself of an expedient that "may perhaps be for your service. Do not "flatter yourselves, that the Hebrews are "ever to be destroy'd by war, pestilence, fa-"mine, or any other of those common casual "calamities;

Balaam offers Balaak an expedient instead of cursing, Numb. xxiv. 16.

" calamities; for they are ſo ſecure under " God's ſpecial providence, that they are ne- " ver to be totally extinguiſhed by any of thoſe " depopulating judgments. Some temporary " afflictions they may ſuffer, and inevitably " they will; but in a little time they'll re- " cover, and be the better for them. Now if " the gaining of ſome ſmall and ſhort-liv'd " advantage over them may give you any ſa- " tisfaction, hearken to my advice. Send in- " to their camp a proceſſion of the loveliеſt " virgins you can pick out; dreſs them up " with all the ornaments of art to aſſiſt " nature; give them their leſſons, how to be- " have themſelves upon all occaſions of court- " ſhip and amour. When the young men ſhall " make their addreſſes to them on the ſubject " of love, let them receive them with a " ſeeming kindneſs and air of reſpect; but if " they proceed to any wanton importunities, " let them threaten immediately and perемp- " torily to be gone; and when the Hebrews " ſhall intreat them to ſtay longer, let them " not conſent, but upon expreſs condition, " that they will actually renounce the laws " of their country, and the honour of that " God who preſcrib'd them; and finally en- " gage themſelves to worſhip after the man- " ner of the Madianites and Moabites." This, ſays he, will provoke God, and draw a vengeance upon their heads; and ſo he departed.

The Madianites follow Balaam's counſel, Numb. xxv.

THE Madianites ſent their daughters with inſtructions, according to Balaam's advice, and the young men were preſently charm'd with their converſation and beauty, ſtill preſſing more and more upon them for further endearments and reſpect. The girls gave them the hearing, and allow'd them the liberty of careſſing and embracing them after an amorous and endearing manner. This had the effect they wiſh'd for; ſo when they found they had by their wiles and allurements ſtrongly ingaged their affections, the girls all on a ſudden made a pretence as if they were that inſtant to be gone; but upon affectionate ſupplications, with ſighs and tears, on the other hand, not to forſake them, and ſolemn oaths and vows over and above, of love and honour, with life and fortune, all at their feet, they were prevail'd upon to ſtay and treat a little longer. They found by this time that they had intirely got the aſcendant over them, and therefore the anſwer they gave them was to this effect:

They gain their point, ibid.

" IT is not for want, ſaid they, either of " fortune, or of credit; the love of our pa- " rents, or the kindneſs of our friends and " relations, nor for the proſtituting of our " beauties (ſuch as they are) that we are now " come, moſt illuſtrious young men, into your " quarters, but out of pure hoſpitality and " good-nature to you, as you are ſtrangers, " and may perhaps have need of us. For theſe " reaſons, and upon an opinion alſo that you " are men of honour, we have made no ſcru- " ple of treating you with an innocent and a " generous freedom. You ſay you love us, " and ſhould be very unwilling to part with " us. If ſo, we are not at all averſe to the " gratifying of your deſires; but you muſt " firſt ſecure us of a conjugal faith; (for no- " thing elſe will do,) and that the love we " have for your converſation, may be war- " ranted by the reputation of becoming your " wives; for we ſhould be loath to be turn'd " off for variety, and ſent back again to our " relations with ſcandal and reproach. You " will not blame us, we hope, for being a " little ſolicitous in ſo tender a point." The young men ſtuck at nothing that might advance the ends of their love, and ſo the virgins went on. " Since, ſaid they, we are thus far agreed, " it will become us to mind you of ſome " other conſiderable differences that remain " yet to be adjuſted. You have certain ways " of life and cuſtom, that are altogether pe- " culiar to yourſelves, even as to particular " meats and drinks. Now if we live toge- " ther, you muſt reſolve to do as we do, and " to worſhip as we worſhip; for by the reve- " rence you pay to our Gods, we ſhall be able " to judge of the affection you have for us. " No body will blame you for adoring the " Gods of the country where you are, and the " Gods in truth of almoſt all other countries " too; whereas yours is a ſingular God, that " is only to yourſelves." They left them in concluſion to this choice, either to live there, and conform to their country cuſtoms, or to depart to ſome other place, where they might do as they thought fit.

The Iſraelites fall from luſt to idolatry, ibid.

THE young men were ſo blinded with paſſion, and abandon'd to their pleaſures, that whatever the women propounded, they ſwallow'd it, though to the renouncing of the religion of their forefathers, and the laws of their country, without ever examining the conditions; ſo that they join'd with them immediately in the opinion of a plurality of Gods, in the manner of their worſhip, the common uſe of all meats indifferently; and for the womens ſakes, in ſhort, they ſtuck at nothing, though never ſo unwarrantable. This infection ſpread itſelf inſenſibly over the whole camp, and it was follow'd with a more dangerous ſedition than the former; inſomuch, that there was hardly any face left of the order, piety, and devotion of former times; for when the youth came once to have a hankering after the novelty of ſtrange cuſtoms and manners, there was no ſtopping of them in that career; but great and ſmall, one with another, were all corrupted and confounded in this apoſtaſy.

Zimri, an Hebrew, marries Coſbi, a Madianite, V. 6.

ZIMRI, one of the princes of the tribe of Simeon, married Cosbi a Madianite, the daughter of one Zur, a perſon of eminent quality in that country. This ſame Zimri, by the perſuaſion of his wife, and in contempt of the Moſaical rites and conſtitutions, made open profeſſion, both of a ſtrange worſhip, and a ſtrange marriage. While matters were in this diſorder, Moſes, for fear of worſe conſequences, called the people together, and there fell upon a diſcourſe, how unworthy a thing it was, and how great a ſcandal to the memory of their anceſtors, for them to value the gratifying of their luſts and appetites above the reverence they ow'd to their God, and their religion; how much it behoved them to repent in time, and to ſhew themſelves brave men; not in the violation of laws, but in the maſtery of unruly affections. He minded them how incongruous a thing it was too, for men who had been virtuous and modeſt in a deſart, to lead ſuch profligate lives in a good country, and ſquander away that in luxury, which they had honeſtly gotten together in the time of their their diſtreſs. He did this to try, whether either ſhame, reaſon, or conſcience would work upon them, but without pointing out any particular perſon all this while; for a perſonal particular reproof, he thought, might have made them deſperate; and it was his buſineſs to reclaim, not to expoſe them. This oblique diſcourſe of Moſes gave Zimri an occaſion to riſe and ſpeak.

Zimri breaks out into inſolent reflections upon Moſes.

"MOSES, ſays he, you are at liberty to "uſe your own laws. They have been a long "time in exerciſe, and that cuſtom is all that "is to be ſaid for their ſtrength, and credit. "If it had not been for this, you would have "found long ſince to your coſt that the He"brews are not to be impoſed upon; and I "myſelf am one of the number who will ne"ver truckle to your tyrannical oppreſſion; "for what's your buſineſs all this while, but "under a bare pretext, and talk of laws and "God, to bar us not only the exerciſe, but "the very deſire of liberty; to eſtabliſh your "own greatneſs upon our miſery and ruin, de"priving us of that freedom, which all peo"ple have a right to that are not under a "maſter? What are we the better for co"ming out of Egypt, if it be only in ex"change for a more grievous bondage under "Moſes? You are to make here what laws "you pleaſe, and we to abide the penalties of "them, at your will and pleaſure, when at "the ſame time 'tis only you yourſelf that de"ſerve to be puniſhed, for abrogating ſuch "cuſtoms and privileges as are authorized and "eſtabliſhed by the common conſent of na"tions, and ſetting up your own will and "fancy, againſt general practice and reaſon. "What I have done, I take to be well done, "and ſhall make no difficulty to confeſs and "juſtify it. I have, as you ſay, married a "ſtrange woman. I ſpeak this with the liber"ty of an honeſt man, and I care not who "knows it. I never meant to make a ſecret "of it, and you ſhall never need to look fur"ther for an informer. I do acknowledge, "that I have changed my way of worſhip too; "and I reckon it very reaſonable for a man "to examine all things who would find out "the truth, without being tied up, as if it "were in a deſpotick government, to the opi"nion and humour of one ſingle perſon; be"ſide that I ſhall not thank any man that "takes upon him to over-rule me in my own "affairs." Zimri was in this ſpeech the mouth of the faction, and the people when it was over, ſtood quietly waiting to ſee what would be the iſſue of ſo audacious an affront; for they were much afraid that miſchief would be the conſequence of it, eſpecially obſerving that Moſes gave not one ſyllable in return to ſo inſolent a provocation; for one word, he thought, might beget another, till it came to blows, eſpecially in a multitude diſpoſed already to take fire. Upon this conſideration, he immediately diſcharged the aſſembly; but this outrage, in all likelihood, would not have ſtopp'd there yet, if Zimri had not been ſoon after cut off, in ſuch manner as will now appear.

Zimri the mouth of the faction.

Moſes diſcharges the aſſembly.

THERE was one Phinees who reſented this contumacy of Zimri to the higheſt degree of indignation. He was one of the braveſt youths of his time, and as eminent for the honour of his extraction, as he was for his perſonal virtue. Eleazar the high-prieſt was his father, and Moſes his great uncle. This Phinees, was ſo ſenſible of the danger of letting ſuch an indignity paſs unpuniſhed, and of ſuffering the laws to be trampled upon and deſpiſed, that he took up a reſolution of a revenge upon the ringleader of this indignity; being very well aware, that in all ſuch caſes, the greater the man is, the greater is the neceſſity of inflicting puniſhment upon him, leaſt his example have a contagious influence upon others. Now as Phinees was a perſon both of body and mind, fit for the execution of ſuch an exploit; ſo without any more ado, he went directly to the tent of Zimri, and with his drawn ſword killed him and Cosbi, both at a thruſt. This glorious action created ſuch an emulation among thoſe of his cotemporaries, who had but any ſpark of honour in them, that they fell immediately upon the remainder of the faction; and they who eſcaped the ſword, died by the judgment of a peſtilence that followed ſoon after, which took away not only thoſe that had been actors in the ſedition, but thoſe of their kindred alſo, who by their intereſt or authority might have interpoſed to prevent it. This plague ſwept away to the number of fourteen thouſand ſouls *.

Phinees kills Zimri and Cosbi in their tent, Ver. 8.

The whole faction deſtroyed betwixt the ſword and the plague.

MOSES was ſo irritated by theſe practices of the Madianites, that he ſent out an army againſt them utterly to extirpate the nation. But we ſhall give an account hereafter of that branch of the ſtory, and in the mean time take up again where we left off. It would be but juſt and reaſonable, in this place, to extol the candor, and clear the generoſity of Moſes upon the matter. As to this Balaam who was invited by the Madianites to curſe the Hebrews, though he could not prevail for leave from God to do it, yet he gave the enemy ſuch counſel, as the Hebrews were almoſt ruined by it, in the miſleading and corrupting of them in their religion. Of this Balaam, Moſes, I ſay, makes honourable mention in his writings, inſerting his prophecies and predictions. If Moſes had not been very ſincere, he might have aſſumed the credit of them to himſelf, and not one witneſs upon the face of the earth to diſprove him; but he choſe rather to do right to his memory. People may think of this as they pleaſe. But to purſue my relation

The Hebrews obtain a notable victory over the Madianites.

MOSES, as I was ſaying, ſent twelve thouſand men againſt the Madianites; a thouſand out of every tribe, and Phinees to command them; by whoſe means the laws were vindicated; and Zimri the violator of them, juſtly puniſhed.

The zeal of Phinees, Num. xxv. 7, 8.

as their time would give them leave, and so put themselves in posture to stand a battle. The Madianites were utterly discomfited upon the first encounter, and the number of the slain was incredible. Their very kings themselves did not escape the slaughter, who were five, viz. Ochus, Sures, Robeas, Ures, and Recem. * The capital city of Arabia derived its name (which it still retains) from the last of these kings, who was the founder of it. They call it Rekem, and the Grecians, Petra. Upon this rout, the Hebrews laid waste the country, putting all to the sword, both men and women, save only such as had not known man, according to Moses his order to Phinees, who brought back the army safe and unhurt, with a memorable booty, as fifty two thousand and sixty seven oxen; sixty thousand asses; household plate and vessels of gold and silver, to an immense value; for the pomp and magnificence they lived in was beyond imagination. They brought away also a matter of thirty two thousand virgins.

Moses made a distribution of the booty; one fiftieth part to Eleazar, and the priests; another fiftieth to the Levites; and the rest to the people, which gave them the means of enjoying the fruits of their toils and hazards, in peace and plenty. Moses was now well stricken in years, and having received a command from God to leave Joshua his successor, he constituted, and declared him so, in the several functions of a prophet, a leader, and a governor, being trained up by himself to a perfect understanding of the laws both of God and man.

Moses now in years, leaves Joshua his successor, Numb. xxvii. 22, 23.

The two tribes of Gad and Reubel, and the one half of that of Manasses, joined about this time in a petition to Moses for a grant of the Amorites country; a place lately conquered, and an excellent ground for pasture, and therefore the more commodious for them who had such vast possessions in herds and other cattle. Moses took this request of theirs only for a pretext to avoid fighting, and charged them downright with tergiversation, sloth, and cowardice. "You have a mind, says he, to live in ease "and luxury, and by appropriating to your- "selves the advantages of a common war, to "abandon the rest of your companions. They "have a great deal of work yet upon their "hands, in carrying on their conquests be- "yond Jordan, and making their way (by "the overthrow and extirpation of their ene- "mies) into the land which God hath pro- "mised them." Moses discovering himself to be much unsatisfied, the petitioners excused themselves, that it was neither fear, nor laziness that mov'd them to do what they did, but only the desire of some convenient place to secure what they had got, that they might be the more at liberty to attend the war; setting forth, that if Moses would be pleased to assign them towns of safety for their wives, their children, and their goods, they were ready to march wherever they should be commanded, and venture their lives in the common cause. Moses was so well satisfied with what they said, that he call'd for Eleazar the high-priest, Joshua, and the rest of the magistrates; and in their presence gave them the land of the Amorites, according to their request; but upon condition that they should join with their countrymen in a league offensive and defensive, against the common enemy; and never lay down arms till the war should be intirely finish'd. Upon these terms they obtain'd what they desir'd, and were put in possession of strong cities, where their wives, children, baggage, and fortunes might be in safety.

THERE were ten cities built in that country by Moses, part of the forty eight heretofore mentioned. He made three of them sanctuaries, or places of refuge for those who fled thither, in the case of killing a man by chance-medley, and without malice prepense. The refugee was to continue in banishment during the life of the high-priest, under whose jurisdiction the homicide happened, and upon his decease he was permitted to return. During this banishment it was lawful for any of the kindred of the man that was slain, to kill the homicide, if he found him without the walls of the city of refuge; but it was not permitted to any other. The names of these cities of refuge were Bosor, on the borders of Arabia; Ariman, in the country of Galadene; and Gaulademan in the land of Batanæa. Moses provided also, that upon the taking of Chanaan there should be three places of refuge erected there also among the cities of the Levites, with the same privileges as the former.

ABOUT this time there died an eminent person of the tribe of Manasses, called Salophades, leaving no male children, but only daughters. Some of the chief men of the tribe consulted Moses, whether or no these daughters were to inherit. The resolution was given, that they were to inherit, if they married into the tribe, but not if they married out of it; upon which occasion he pass'd an ordinance, "That every tribe should keep its "own inheritance, without alienating or "transferring it."

The life and laws of Moses.

IT was now forty years within thirty days, since the Hebrews came out of Egypt, when Moses call'd the people together at a place known at present by the name of Abila, by the side of the river Jordan, near a field of palm-trees; and when the multitude were met, he deliver'd himself in a speech to them to this effect:

Moses calls the people together to Abila, Deut. xxxi.

"SINCE it is the will of God now in the "hundred and twentieth year of a wasted "troublesome life, to take me out of this "world, (the course of nature also requiring "it,) and so to order, that I can be no "longer useful to you, either with my arms, "or counsels, in your further progress be- "yond Jordan, toward the land of Chanaan; "it will be yet a great comfort to me at my "last hour, to leave my valiant fellow-sol- "diers, labourers, and sufferers, in so hope- "ful a prospect of all the good their own "hearts can wish. " my duty however, (even in this critical " extremity,) of conſulting your happineſs, " and ſo far as in me lies, of promoting it al- " ſo, by telling you what that happineſs is, " and directing you to the means of attaining " it; and in ſo doing I ſhall entitle myſelf " to an everlaſting eſteem in your memory. " I make no doubt but I ſhall find credit with " you, and I may take upon me to ſay, that I " deſerve it too, if it were but for the inde- " fatigable conſtancy of my endeavours to ad- " vance your welfare, wherein I never diſap- " pointed or deceived you: beſide, that the " words of a dying man are ſacred and ſin- " cere.

" As to the ſubject of human felicity, you " may aſſure yourſelves, that no man can be " happy, but in the favour of God, and that " it belongs to him alone to confer bleſſings " upon the righteous, and to take them away " from the wicked. Do but behave your- " ſelves anſwerably to what God requires at " your hands, or according to the precepts " and inſtructions which you have receiv'd " from me by his commiſſion, and you ſhall " be celebrated for your virtue, and envied " for your proſperity; and not only ſo neither, " but the bleſſings that you are poſſeſs'd of " ſhall be continued to you, and thoſe you " want ſhall be ſuperadded. Only reſign your- " ſelves to God's will, and obey his com- " mandments, and all this ſhall be made good " to you. But have a care how you give a " preference to any other laws, comparatively " with thoſe which God ſent you by me; or " how you allow yourſelves in any innova- " tions in matters of worſhip and religion. " Follow my advice, and you ſhall be victo- " rious and invincible; for when you have " God on your ſide, what matters it who is " againſt you? The rewards of virtue are " glorious and certain, over and above that " virtue itſelf is the greateſt, and that all " other advantages are caſt in by way of ac- " ceſſion. Practiſe it one with another, and " you ſhall be both happy yourſelves, and like- " wiſe make others ſo, to the comfort of your " preſent ſtate, and to your immortal honour " in times to come. All this you may pro- " miſe yourſelves, if you neither violate, nor " ſuffer to be violated, the written laws I " brought you by God's ſpecial direction; " and if you make the wiſdom and the righ- " teouſneſs of thoſe laws your daily medita- " tion and ſtudy. This will ſecure your eſta- " bliſhment; and if I may but ſee you now " in a ſtate of ſettlement before I leave the " world, I ſhall depart in peace. All I can " do towards it will be to recommend you to " the obſervance of thoſe precepts of piety " and prudence which are given you for your " inſtruction and practice, and to an obedient " compliance with the orders of your ſupe- " riors, that ſhall be appointed and provided " for your well-being and ſafety. That God, " under whoſe government you have acted " hitherto, and to whoſe goodneſs you ſtand " indebted for all the benefits you have re- " ceiv'd from me. That God, I ſay, will " never forſake you, but watch over you and " protect you ſo long as you worſhip him as " you ought to do. You ſhall not want ex- " cellent monitors neither, as Eleazar the " high-prieſt, Joſhua the ſenate, and the prin- " cipals of the tribes; treat them with all re- " verence, and without any thing of ſtubborn- " neſs and refractorineſs, as ever you hope to " be happy; for he who cannot obey well, can " never govern well, when it comes to his " turn. Have a care how you take mutiny " for liberty, as you have done formerly, and " how you ſet up for a privilege of thwarting " the commands of your governors, under that " notion. You have been too much addicted to " thisfault in times paſt; pray correct it for the " future, and your affairs will thrive the bet- " ter for it. God forbid you ſhall ever be ſo " impetuous and intemperate toward any of " my ſucceſſors, as you have, but too often, " been to me; inſomuch, that (as you know " very well) my life hath been more in danger " from you ſometimes, than from the enemy. " I do not ſpeak this to reproach you; for I " was not tranſported with paſſion, you ſaw, " at the doing of the thing, neither would I " afflict you with the memory of an ill thing " done, at a time when I am upon the very " point of taking my eternal leave of you; on- " ly be wiſer for the future, and be not puff'd " up with the wealth and plenty of the land " of Chanaan, when you ſhall come to take " poſſeſſion of it; but know it to be your in- " tereſt, as well as your duty, not to be- " have yourſelves contumelioufly to thoſe that " are ſet over you: for if ever wealth and lux- " ury ſhall make you inſolent, to the con- " tempt of religion, authority and virtue, God, " of a protector, will become your enemy. " You ſhall loſe that land again with infamy, " which you got with honour and courage; " and be ſcatter'd all over the face of the " earth, as the moſt deſpicable of mankind. " When it comes to that once, it will be " too late to wiſh things undone again, and " that you had contain'd yourſelves within the " bounds of your laws and duty. Now to " prevent the danger of this fatal apoſtaſy for " the time to come, give no quarter where- " ever you gain a victory, for in ſo doing you " cut off all danger of being ſeduced into ido- " latry, by mixing with the inhabitants of the " land, and thereby corrupting and departing " from the laws and religion of your anceſtors. " As for their temples, groves, and altars, let " every one of them be deſtroy'd with fire " and ſword wherever you come, even to the " extinction, if it were poſſible, of the very " memory of them. This, in fine, is the on- " ly way to ſecure yourſelves to all purpoſes; " but yet for fear of the worſt, and to aſſiſt " the ignorant toward the underſtanding of " their duties, I have written a body of laws " by the command of God himſelf; and ſuch " a form of adminiſtration, publick and pri- " vate, that you ſhall be certainly the hap- " pieſt people under the ſun, if you conform " yourſelves to thoſe rules and meaſures."

Moſes delivers them a book of laws and precepts for government and good manners, Deut. xxxi. 24.

WHEN Moſes had made an end of ſpeaking, he deliver'd them a book of laws and precepts in writing, with reſpect to government and good manners. This book was but the prologue to a final ſeparation, and brought ſeveral things to their mind, that made the whole multitude burſt out into an exceſſive weeping. Some of them were ſolicitous what ſhould become of them when Moſes was gone, being in deſpair of ever getting ſuch another commander, ſo highly in the intereſt and favour of God Almighty. Others were upon the ſubject of his bravery and conduct, what pains he had taken, and what dangers he had run, and how generouſly and chearfully he did every thing for their good. Some again were at a loſs for a mediator, who ſhould conſult God for them when they wanted advocates, or intercede for them when he was angry. But nothing more ſenſibly afflicted them than the memory of their outrages againſt Moſes in the deſart; upon which reflection they were all tranſported into ſuch violent lamentations, that what with ſhame and guilt, it carried them out of all government of themſelves, till Moſes at laſt, by his perſuaſion and authority, prevail'd with them to moderate their ſorrow, by firſt committing, and then recommending to them the ſtudy and uſe of his book of laws, and when he had done this, he diſmiſs'd the aſſembly.

An abſtract of the laws themſelves.

It will be worth my while now, before I paſs over to other matters, to inſert the laws themſelves, that the reader may ſee how anſwerable they are to the majeſty of the compiler of them, and the original of our uſages and cuſtoms. Every thing that he wrote is yet extant, and we muſt take it as he left it, without any room for ornament or variation. We have only taken the liberty of altering the method, and of reducing thoſe ſeveral laws which Moſes delivered one after another, as God was conſulted about them, into their proper and natural place and order. I have premoniſhed the reader of this, to prevent the calumny which ſome of our people might otherwiſe have raiſed upon it, as if Moſes had not been fairly dealt withal in this part of the relation. Now I ſhall only take notice in this place of the publick laws and conſtitutions which have regard to the policy of their government; but for matters of private dealing and contract, whether among ourſelves, or with ſtrangers, I ſhall treat of them in a commentary which I propoſe, God willing, to make publick, concerning the cuſtoms and reaſons of thoſe laws.

How the Iſraelites are to govern themſelves in the land of Chanaan, Deut. iv. 1, 2.

When you ſhall have made yourſelves abſolute maſters of the land of Chanaan, ſettled your plantations, and built your cities, you will have nothing more to do toward the maintaining of yourſelves in the full, ſafe, and eaſy enjoyment of your acquiſitions, than to love God, and keep theſe his following commandments, which will eſtabliſh your felicity upon a foundation never to be ſhaken.

One holy city.

Let there be one holy city in the land of Chanaan, to be erected in ſome certain place for the fruitfulneſs and beauty of the ſituation, which God by his prophet ſhall make choice of, and appoint. Let there be one temple in it, and one altar, and that altar to be made of unhewn ſtones out of the quarry, gather'd up here and there, and ſo put together and varniſh'd, for the better grace of the work, and to make it the more agreeable to the eye: the aſcent not to be made by ſtairs or ſteps, but by a gradual riſing of the ground for the decency of the approach. But there muſt be no more temples or altars in any other city; for the Hebrews are but one nation, and worſhip but one God.

One temple, and one altar.

Blaſphemy made death.

Whoever ſhall blaſpheme the holy name of God, let him be ſtoned to death; his body expoſed upon a gibbet for one day, and afterwards thrown into the ground with infamy and contempt.

The whole nation to worſhip thrice a year at Jeruſalem, Deut. xvi. 16.

Let the whole nation of the Hebrews come up from all quarters to this holy city and temple, to worſhip thrice a year, and offering up thankſgivings for benefits receiv'd, to implore future bleſſings; and ſo by the freedom of a chearful tenderneſs of converſation, to create friendly diſpoſitions, and promote mutual love, one toward another. It is a matter of common convenience for people of the ſame ſtock, intereſt, and profeſſion, to be thoroughly acquainted; for there is a wonderful force many times in the impreſſion of a word, a look, or an action; as on the contrary, without theſe meetings and interviews, all the comforts and advantages of communication are loſt to us.

Tenths, Deut. xviii. 1--8.

Let there be alſo reſerved to the value of another tenth of the fruits of the earth (over and above the dues to the prieſts and Levites) out of the ſale of them in the market, to be laid out in ſacrifices and entertainments, which ſhall be celebrated in this city; as it is but reaſonable to dedicate the fruits of the land to him, who of his own free bounty, gives us the propriety and poſſeſſion of it.

Not to offer the hire of a harlot, Deut. xxiii. 18.

Thou ſhalt not offer in ſacrifice the hire of a proſtitute, for God is not pleaſed with any thing that is wicked or impure; and there is no fouler impurity than this mixture of bodies. And ſo in like manner for the hire of a bitch to keep up the breed of a hound, or a ſheep-dog, as it is for the hire of a ſtrumpet. Let no man ſpeak ill of the Gods of other nations, nor rifle their temples, nor take away any thing out of them that is dedicated to divine uſe or worſhip.

Only the prieſt to wear a mixed garment, Deut. xxii. 11.

Let no Iſraelite wear a mixt garment of wool and linnen, unleſs he be a * prieſt; to whom alone it belongs.

The prieſt to read the law upon the feaſt of tabernacles.

In every ſeventh year when the feaſt of tabernacles ſhall be celebrated in the holy city, let the prieſt, from a high pulpit, where he may be heard by the whole congregation, read the book of the law, and all ſorts of people without exception, women, children, yea and ſlaves themſelves too, be admitted to the hearing of it: for when the law is once thoroughly imprinted in people's minds, it will never out of their memories: beſide that it takes away the common plea of pretended ignorance. Laws have more force alſo upon the conſciencies of offenders, when they tell them before hand what they are to truſt to in caſe of diſobedience, and mingle terror with authority. What men receive by the ear ſinks into their minds, and they find themſelves ſo far convinced of the intent and reaſon of laws, that they continually carry along with them their own accuſers upon the tranſgreſſion of them.

Children to be early inſtructed in the law.

Above all things let children be early inſtructed in theſe laws, as the moſt neceſſary and profitable diſcipline they can be trained up to. Wherefore let them twice a day, morning and evening, be conſtantly put in mind of the goodneſs of God that brought them out of the land of Egypt; and ſo of his other mercies; for it is equally reaſonable to give God thanks for

for former bleſſings, as to pray for new ones. Let them have memorials of God's power and bounty, by inſcriptions upon their doors, their heads, about their arms, &c. ſo that which way ſoever they turn themſelves, remembrancers of God's providence may ſtill preſent themſelves before their eyes.

Memorials of God's mercy, Deut. vi. 8, 9.

LET every city have a council of ſeven magiſtrates; men of exemplary virtue, and lovers of righteouſneſs*, and to each of theſe rulers let there be two Levites. Let the dignity of the ſeat of judgment be kept ſacred, and no man preſume to utter an irreverent or intemperate word in the face of the court; for the practice of this veneration toward political governors will, by degrees, introduce an habitual love and awe of piety, as well as of common juſtice, and an affectionate ſenſe of our duty to God himſelf, in the deference we pay to his miniſters. There muſt be no appeal from the ſentence of the judge, unleſs in caſe of maniſeſt error and corruption. Juſtice is the main end of judgment, and it is to be adminiſter'd without any regard either to power, intereſt, or affection. It is a reproach to the divine power and goodneſs, to be more afraid of a great man than of God himſelf, as if the latter were the weaker of the two; and this is in truth the caſe of ſuch partialities. If it ſhall ſo fall out that the judges are either not informed at all, or miſinformed, and conſequently ſtrangers to the queſtion, and ſo incompetent, (which many times happens;) let the cauſe be carried up entire to the holy city, for the high-prieſt, the prophet, and the ſenate to decide the controverſy.

A council of ſeven in every city.

Magiſtracy to be honoured.

LET no accuſation be admitted, but from the mouth of two, three, or more witneſſes; and let them be men of probity too, and an unſpotted reputation.

No men condemned under two or more witneſſes, and men of probity, Deut. xvii. 6. & xix. 15.

THE teſtimony of a woman ſhall not be reputed a warrantable evidence, becauſe of the natural levity of the ſex, and that they talk too much at random.

A woman's teſtimony not to be admitted.

No ſlave ſhall be allowed of as a competent witneſs, becauſe of the ſervile and mercenary condition of his mind and quality; and becauſe he may probably be wrought upon, either by fear, or by profit, to give a falſe teſtimony.

No ſlave to be a witneſs.

WHOEVER ſhall be convict of a falſe oath, ſhall be liable to the ſame puniſhment that the accuſed ſhould have ſuffered, if the charge had been proved upon him.

The puniſhment of a falſe oath, Deut. xix. 16, &c.

IN the caſe of homicide, when a man ſhall be found dead in a field, and he who kill'd him doth not appear, nor any perſonal jealouſy of a malice prepenſe againſt him, let there be a ſtrict enquiry upon the life of the man, and publick rewards offered by proclamation for the diſcovery. If after all this ſearch and diligence, it ſhall not yet be made out how he came by his death, let the magiſtracy, and the neighbouring townſhips meet together, and take an exact meaſure which of them was neareſt to the place where the dead body was found; and let the inhabitants of the place who ſhall be found neareſt, provide a heifer, and bring it into a rough ſpot of ground that is neither fit for planting nor ſowing, and there let the ſinews of the neck be cut, the prieſts, Levites, and elders waſhing their hands with water over the head of the heifer, and purging themſelves by an open proteſtation that they know nothing, either directly or indirectly, of the homicide; concluding the ceremony with prayers to Almighty God to preſerve that place and people from the guilt of blood for the time to come.

Puniſhment in the caſe of blood, Deut. xxi.

AS to the matter of government, Ariſtocracy is the beſt form; wherefore let the Hebrews ſtick to it, and maintain it; for whenever they caſt it off, it will be to their loſs; for they have nothing above them but the laws, and thoſe laws are a ſtanding rule what they are to do; and therefore I think it may ſuffice them that they have God for their king, and their ſupreme governor.

Ariſtocracy the beſt form of government.

NOW after all this, if you ſhould come to fall in love with monarchical government, be ſure you chuſe your king out of your own ſtock and lineage; a perſon eminent for juſtice, and all other virtues; one who ſhall depend upon the direction of God and the laws, more than upon his own wiſdom; one who ſhall take the advice of the high-prieſt and elders along with him in all he does, without ſetting his mind upon a multitude of wives, or the pomp of treaſure and horſes, for fear the ambitious affectation of this power and magnificence ſhould tranſport him into encroachments upon your laws and liberties, and make him greater, in fine, than would comport with your intereſt and convenience.

Advice in the choice of a king, Deut. xvii. 14, &c.

REMOVE no boundaries, or land-marks, whether your own or your neighbour's; for they are the beſt ſecurity we have for a common peace. Let them be kept as firm as the foundation of the earth, and as if providence itſelf had fixed them there. The breaking in upon theſe bounds opens a certain way to wars and tumults; and what avarice does in one caſe, ambition does in the other. The firſt fruits of trees which bear before the fourth year from their planting, are not either to be offered to God, or to be eaten by man; for coming before their time, they are rather abortions than a natural production. But in the fourth year, when the fruit comes to maturity, let all be gathered, and convey'd into the holy city, to be there ſpent by the owner, together with the tenths of other fruits,) in treating his friends and acquaintance, widows and orphans. But in the fifth year, the proprietor may take the whole product to his own uſe.

No land-marks to be removed, Deut. xix.

Of the firſt fruits of trees under four years growth.

LET no ground be ſowed which is planted with vines; for it is ſufficient for the earth to afford nouriſhment for the ſupport of that plant, without the ſuperfluous vexations of the plow over and above.

Planting of vines.

LET the earth be plowed with oxen alone; for beaſts of ſeveral kinds are not to draw in the ſame yoke.

To plow with oxen alone.

LET the ſeeds to be ſown be ſimple and unmix'd, not two or three ſorts together; for the confuſion of ſuch diverſities is unnatural.

The ſeed to be ſimple.

LET there be no adulterate mixtures betwixt the female of one kind, and the male of another, leſt men ſhould be tempted alſo by the corruption of this unnatural example into the liberty of inordinate luſts; as the fouleſt

No adulterate mixtures.

extravagances have taken their rise many times from trivial beginnings, wherefore let nothing be permitted in human conversation, that by a perverse hint of applying it, may tend to the depravation of good manners; so that it is not for laws to pass over in neglect, even the smallest things in appearance, when so great matters depend upon them.

Gleanings of corn and grapes to be left for the poor, Deut. xxiv.

LET not the harvest-reapers sweep away the whole crop, but leave a large allowance of gleanings for the necessities of the poor; and so for clusters of grapes upon the vintage, and wind-falls upon the gathering of olives, let there be a compassionate remainder left for those who have nothing to eat of their own. The reward of the charity will infinitely more than countervail the charge of the bounty; for God will bless the land with fertility, and the owner of it with plenty, when a man has a regard to the wants of the necessitous, as well as to his own convenience. The ox is not to be muzzled when he treads out the corn; for it would be unreasonable to deny any creature a part in the fruit of its own labours.

No muzzling of the ox when he treads out the corn, Deut. xxv.

Deny no passenger fruit that is a gathering, upon a journey.

LET no passenger upon a journey be refused to taste of ripe fruit if he desires it, whether of the country, or a stranger; but let him take and eat and welcome, as if it were his own, provided he carry none away with him.

Give grapes to a passenger upon the way as they go to the press.

LET no man in bearing grapes to the press, refuse a bunch of them to a traveller that meets him upon the way; for it would be very hard to deny any man so small a proportion of the good things which God had bestowed upon mankind gratis, and in such abundance, especially considering that is the most fruitful season of the year, and which, according to the course of providence, will be soon over. Nay, if men should be so scrupulous upon a point of modesty, as to forbear touching or desiring any thing, let them be invited and entreated to take and please themselves. If they be Israelites, they are to be look'd upon as partners and fellow-sharers in what you have, being all of the same blood and brotherhood: If strangers, let them be desired to accept of such a respect as a present of hospitality out of God's bounty. We are not to account any thing lost that is thus bestowed; for when it pleases God to shower down his blessings upon the sons of men, it is not for this or that man's sake, or use alone, but a depositum with them as trustees for the common service of those that want. Neither can men do a greater right to God's magnificence towards themselves, than by communicating part of the blessings to others. Whoever shall presume to act contrary to what is here prescrib'd, shall receive forty lashes save one from the hand of the common executioner; a servile punishment, but good enough for a mercenary freeman, who sacrifices his dignity to his avarice. It is but just and reasonable, says Moses, that those people who suffer'd so many hardships themselves in Egypt and the wilderness, should from the experience of their own misery contract somewhat of tenderness and compassion for their neighbours; so far at least, as being in plenty themselves, to assist the needy in some degree out of their abundance.

A third to the poor.

BESIDE the two yearly tenths already appointed to be paid, the one to the Levites, the other to the holy feasts, there remains yet a third to be every third year divided among the poor widows and orphans.

The first fruits to the temple, Deut. xxvi.

LET every man carry his first fruits to the temple, and after thanksgivings to God for the earth that brought them forth, and sacrifices celebrated in due form of law, let him give them to the priests; and this being done, and the tenth with the first fruits for the Levites and the festivals, presented according to custom, let him when he is ready to go home again, give God thanks before the door of the temple for delivering the Hebrews from their grievous slavery, and putting them in possession of so fair and plentiful a country; publickly declaring, that he has paid his tenths according to the law and appointment of Moses. Let him then pray to God, both for himself and for the publick, to grant them not only a continuance of his graces and mercies toward them, but by his infinite power and goodness, to vouchsafe them an augmentation of those blessings.

The choice of a wife.

WHEN men are of years to marry, let them make their choice out of virgins that are well born, and well educated, and the children of virtuous parents; but let not him that will not marry a virgin, presume to seduce the wife of another man, to the disquiet and affliction of her husband.

Love is no plea for a freeman who marries a bond-woman.

LET not a freeman marry a bond woman, and then plead love in his defence; for a man forfeits his dignity when he can no longer command his passions.

Let no man marry a harlot.

LET no man presume to contract marriage with a harlot; for God will not receive a nuptial sacrifice from an unclean body; besides, libidinous marriages generally produce a libidinous and vicious offspring, and such as are intirely void of sobriety and honour.

The case of a woman that marries for a virgin, and is none, Deut. xxiv.

IF any man thinks he has married a virgin, and finds afterwards that he was mistaken, let him put the cause upon a trial, and bring his proofs, while on the other side the father, the brother, and the next a-kin may appear on the behalf of the woman; if she be acquitted, her accuser shall be bound to live in wedlock with her, and that marriage never after to be dissolv'd, unless upon positive evidence beyond contradiction; but whoever shall be found in such a case as this, rashly and scandalously to calumniate an innocent person, let him have the corporal punishment of nine and thirty stripes, and stand condemn'd in a mulct of fifty sickles, to the father of the woman. But if it shall be made out that she was corrupted before her marriage, she shall be stoned to death for her incontinence, if a person of a mean quality; or if otherwise, as of the family of a priest, let her be burnt alive.

No transferring the right of primogeniture to a younger child, Deut. xxi. 15--17.

IF a man have two wives, and a much greater value for the one than for the other, (whether upon the account of beauty, inclination, or what other motive soever,) in case the husband shall be prevail'd upon by the favourite wife to demand a right of primogeniture for her younger son, to the prejudice of an elder son by another wife, (for by my laws, says Moses, the seniority entitles him to a double portion) let it not be allow'd of; for it is unjust that the elder son should be robb'd of his birth-birthright for the partiality of the father to one wife more than the other.

Of debauching a woman contracted to another man, Deut. xxii. 23, 24, 25, 26, 27.

IF any man shall debauch a virgin contracted to another man, they are both guilty, and shall both suffer death; the man for corrupting the woman, and the woman for consenting; the one for seducing the woman into the preference of a scandalous uncleanness to an honourable marriage; the other for yielding herself a prostitute, either for lust or profit. But if a man shall be found to have forced a woman alone, and no body within distance of coming to her relief, the man only shall die.

The penalty of corrupting a virgin that's free, Ver. 28, 29.

HE who shall corrupt a virgin that is under no obligation to any other man, let him marry her; or if her father will not agree to it, let him give him fifty shekels for a composition.

The case of a man's parting with his wife.

IF a man has a mind to part from his wife upon what cause soever, as there are pretences in abundance, let him give it under his hand that he will never have any thing more to do with her; hereby she may be empower'd to marry another man, but without such a discharge she cannot, neither will the divorce stand good; but in case she marry a second husband, and he chance to die, and the woman have a mind to go back to her first again, it is not to be permitted.

The case of a husband that dies and leaves his wife without issue.

IF a husband dies and leaves his wife without issue, let the brother of the deceased marry the widow, and in case of a son by the second husband, let him bear the name of the family, and inherit the estate; for it concerns the publick that names and families should be preserv'd, their possessions kept entire, and it is a relief to the woman to live with so near a relation to her first husband. But if the brother refuse to marry her, let her complain to the senate, that whereas she offer'd herself to stay in the family, and to bring children to it, her husband's brother had given her the repulse, and put a dishonour upon the memory of her dead husband. The elders shall then interrogate the brother upon the reason of his refusal, and whether his reasons be strong or weak, the issue will be this in the conclusion: the widow shall loosen the lappet of the brother's shoe, and spit in his face, telling him that he deserv'd all this, for casting a dishonour upon the memory of the deceased. After this he departs the court, stigmatiz'd with infamy as long as he lives; and so the widow is left at liberty to marry again where she pleases.

A maid, widow, or wife that is taken prisoner, and then marries, Deut. xxi.

IF any man takes a maid, widow, or wife, prisoner, and hath a mind to marry her, they are not to have conversation together as man and wife, till the prisoner shall have shaved her head, and run through the whole course of her mourning for the friends and relations she lost in the battle; and this ceremony being over, she is at liberty to enjoy the comforts of mirth and marriage. It is nothing but just and reasonable that he who takes a woman to have children by her, should indulge the will and affections of his wife, and not so absolutely pursue his own satisfactions, as to neglect her's. But after thirty days mourning, which is enough for any person of discretion, it may be seasonable to marry. If the man should prove fickle, and grow weary of her, he must not think to make her a slave again, for she hath purchased her freedom to go whither she pleases.

Of undutiful children.

IF children shall behave themselves undutifully and contemptuously toward their parents, without any regard to filial reverence, piety, or good manners, let the father and mother in the first place (whom nature has made their judges) instruct and tutor them by some discourse to this or the like purpose.

Good advice to children.

"You should consider, children, that the "conscientious end of marriage is not either "wealth or pleasure, but first to have children, "as a blessing which we are to acknowledge "with joy and thankfulness, and then to "train up those children to the knowledge "and exercise of virtue and submission, that "they may so live, as to be a comfort and "support to their aged parents. You cannot "say that we have spar'd for any thing in the "care of your institution, that might honestly "qualify you for all the agreeable advantages "of a happy life: And what return at last "for all this tenderness? But youth is rash "and frail, and the errors of it are not un-"pardonable. Come, children, you have been "to blame; be so no more, but repent and "amend, before it be too late. You are not "aware, perhaps, how God himself is wound-"ed in your unnatural perverseness to those, "from whom, next under him, you received "your being; and that your heavenly father "imputes all the faults committed against "your earthly father, as done to himself, un-"der the analogy of that common appella-"tion, being the father of all flesh living; "to say nothing of the inevitable severity of "the law in that point, which I had rather "you should understand by discourse than ex-"perience."

IF this way of reasoning take effect, it will be but a piece of charitable justice to forgive it as a mere slip of ignorance; beside that it would be for the honour of governors, and the comfort of parents, that their children never fall under the lash of the law; but if neither authority, nor advice can prevail, and that rebellious children will still persist in an incorrigible contumacy, there is no way left then, but to turn the laws loose upon them, which will have them carried out of the city, and there stoned to death; the bodies to be exposed for a publick spectacle for one day, and at night to be taken down and buried.

Incorrigible obstinacy in children to be punished with death, Deut. xxi. 18--21.

THE same thing is to be done in all other cases of capital punishment; publick enemies are not to be denied burial; the dead must be allowed earth to cover them; the law prescribes the punishment, and it would be injustice to go beyond the sentence.

Publick enemies to be allow'd burial.

IT is not lawful for one Hebrew to lend unto another who is poor, either meat or drink upon usury; for it is not fair to make advantage of the necessities of a brother. Let it suffice, that the conscience of a good office does more than countervail the profit of it; so that the very charity is clear gain, if men would but trust God Almighty for their reward, which never fails, sooner or later, to follow good works. As for those who borrow either money or fruits, wet or dry, let them be sure to make a chearful repayment of it so soon as ever God shall put them in a condition so to do; which is no more than depositing so much in another hand for your own use, to be in readiness upon the like occasion.

No lending betwixt Hebrews upon usury, Deut. xxiii.

Debtor and creditor, Deut. xxiv. 10, 11.

IN caſe of a debtor, who hath neither the ſhame, nor the conſcience to reſtore what he borrow'd, the creditor ſhall not enter into his houſe to take a pledge, but demand it at the door, where the debtor himſelf is to deliver it, but upon the order of the judge in favour of the creditor, there muſt be no oppoſing of it. If he who has given the pawn can conveniently ſpare it, let the creditor keep it till he receives ſatisfaction; but if he be very indigent, and wants it, let it be return'd before ſun-ſet, eſpecially if it be a garment, leſt he ſhould want it to keep him warm in the night. Such is the tenderneſs of Almighty God in favour of the poor.

The penalty of ſtealing a labouring beaſt, Ver. 1.

HE who ſhall ſteal a labouring beaſt ſhall be condemn'd in four times the value of it, unleſs it be an ox, and then the penalty ſhall be fivefold in value; but if the party be not able to pay the fine, let him be turn'd over for a ſlave to the perſon he has wrong'd.

The caſe of ſelling one Hebrew to another, Lev. xxv. 39--43.

IF one Hebrew be ſold to another, he ſhall ſerve ſix years, and be made free the ſeventh; but if it ſhould ſo fall out, that he hath children in his maſter's houſe by any of his female fellow-ſervants, and ſhall think fit, out of ſome particular inclination to continue in ſervitude beyond his time, he ſhall, in the year of Jubilee, which is every fiftieth year, be ſet free with his wife and children.

Finding gold and ſilver upon the way, Deut. xxii 1, 2, 3.

IF any man ſhall find gold and ſilver upon the way, let him ſeek and enquire, by the common crier, who it was that loſt it, in order to the reſtoring of it; for it would be inhuman to make profit of another man's misfortune; and ſo for cattle which ſhould be ſeen aſtray, and wandering in a deſart, either let the maſter be found out to whom they belong, or let the finder keep them to himſelf, till the right owner may be heard of, calling God to witneſs that he does not covet the goods of any other men.

Ver. 4.

Set a traveller into his right way.

Striking upon a ſudden quarrel, Exod. xxi. 18, 19.

IF one man ſtrikes another upon a ſudden quarrel, and not with a ſword, let juſtice be immediately done upon the aggreſſor, by the ſame number of blows that he gave the other; but if he who was ſtruck be carried home, lie ſick for ſeveral days, and then die, there ſhall lie no action of murder in the caſe; but if he recovers, the other ſhall bear the whole charge of his cure, doctors, apothecaries, ſurgeons, attendance, and the like.

Of beating a woman, and making her miſcarry, Ver. 22.

IF any man ſhall kick a woman with child, ſo that ſhe miſcarries, the judges ſhall condemn him in a ſum of money for the loſs of a ſubject, beſide another ſum by the way of a fine to her husband; but if ſhe dies of the ſtroke, the man muſt die too, for life muſt anſwer for life.

Finding a mortal poiſon in the poſſeſſion of an Iſraelite.

IF there ſhall be found in the poſſeſſion of an Iſraelite, the preparation of any mortal or dangerous poiſon, he ſhall ſuffer death for it, to anſwer for the lives of thoſe againſt whom it ſhall appear to have been deſign'd.

An eye for an eye, Ver. 24.

HE who ſtrikes out another man's eye, ſhall forfeit his own, and make ſatisfaction in kind, an eye for an eye, unleſs he ſhall otherwiſe think fit to compound for it with money; for the law will ſo far allow a man to be a judge in his own caſe, where he ſhall think fit to moderate the rigour of a penalty for an injury done to himſelf.

The caſe of an ox that gores, Exod. xxi. 28--32.

IF an ox be miſchievous, and given to goring, let his maſter kill him. If an ox kill any body, let him be immediately ſton'd to death, and no man preſume to eat of his fleſh; but if it ſhall appear that the maſter had been forewarn'd of the fierceneſs of this beaſt, and gave no heed to it, he himſelf ſhall ſuffer death for not preventing the death of another man. If an ox ſhall kill a man or a maid-ſervant, the ox ſhall be ſton'd, and the owner of the ox ſhall ſtand condemned in thirty ſhekels to the maſter of the ſlave that was ſlain. If one ox ſhall kill another, let the living and the dead be both ſold, and the money divided betwixt their two maſters.

Let no pit or well lie open, Ver. 33, 34.

IF any man digs a pit or a well, let him cover it with boards, and caſt up a mound about it when he goes from it, not to engroſs the water, but to give notice of the danger, and to keep man and beaſt from falling into it; or in caſe any beaſt ſhall drop in at unawares, and be loſt for want of ſuch a fence, or cover, the owner of the ground ſhall make ſatisfaction to the value of the beaſt.

A depoſitum is a truſt that is ſacred, Exod. xxii. 7, 8, 9.

IF any man ſhall receive a depoſitum, that is to ſay, ſomewhat in truſt for the uſe of another, let him preſerve it as a thing ſacred, and not to be touch'd by man, woman, or child, though immenſe riches were to be gotten by it, to the prejudice of the creditors; and witneſs or no witneſs, either to the truſt, or to the fraud, does not alter the caſe one jot. The conſcience is the only judge and evidence of what we ought to do, and of what we do, and whether we do well or ill; and according to that inward teſtimony we ſtand or fall to a God that is not to be impos'd upon. But now ſuppoſing the depoſitum to be loſt in reality, and he who had it in charge not to blame neither: where it ſo falls out, let the truſtee apply himſelf to the ſeven judges, and there make oath in the preſence of God, that he never employ'd any part of it to his own uſe, and that neither directly nor indirectly he had any hand or privity in the loſing of it; and this ſhall be ſufficient to acquit him of having perform'd his truſt. But yet if it ſhall afterward be made appear, that he ever converted any particle of this depoſitum to his own proper uſe, he ſhall be obliged to make good the whole.

GOD will have the ſame ſtrictneſs of juſtice to be alſo obſerved in the punctuality of paying ing the labourer his hire, which conſiſts partly in not defrauding him of any portion of his due, and partly in not delaying the payment of it; but upon the ſame day, when he makes an end of his work, let him receive his wages.

Children not to ſuffer for their father's ſins, Ezek. xviii. 20.

CHILDREN are not to be puniſh'd for the iniquity of their fathers, but where they are good, they deſerve rather to be pity'd, for lying under the lot of having ſuch fathers: beſide the equity of reſpecting them for their own virtues rather than making them odious for the failing of others. Neither is the lewdneſs of children in all caſes to be imputed to their parents; for there are ſome natures ſo harſh, and intractable, that all the gentleneſs of good example, care, and diſcipline, can never work upon them.

THERE are an abominable ſort of people, who out of ſome unnatural affectation, make themſelves Eunuchs; and in ſo doing, deſtroy as much as in them lies, the very intent of nature and providence, in male and female; cutting off the means of encreaſing, and conſequently of poſterity, both at once, to the diſappointment of the main end of their creation. Their minds were firſt corrupted, before they came to make this experiment upon their bodies. Theſe men are to be avoided, and deteſted as the worſt of monſters, wherefore let nothing be caſtrated, neither man nor any other living creature, for it is a departure from the very inſtitution of nature.

All caſtrations forbid.

THESE are the laws you are to obſerve in times of peace, and I hope by the bleſſing of God, they will be continu'd unchangeably ſacred, and inviolable, to yourſelves, and your children after you for ever. But yet, in regard of the uncertainty of human affairs; and that upon ſome ground or other, whether of malice, or miſadventure, difficulties and troubles will inevitably ariſe, I ſhall endeavour in a few words, the beſt I can, to prepare you for the obviating of thoſe contingencies, ſo far at leaſt as a reaſonable, and a political foreſight of things may enable me, that you may not be taken unprovided how to acquit yourſelves upon occaſion.

An exhortation to unity, and the obſervation of the law.

I WISH with all my heart you may continue in a quiet poſſeſſion of the land which God hath allotted you; and that you may come to reap the fruit of your induſtry and patience, in peace, and plenty, without the hazard, either of open enemies from abroad, or of worſe in your own bowels; for inteſtine diſcord would endanger the overturning of the laws, cuſtoms, diſcipline, and religion of your forefathers; which are no other than the ordinances of God himſelf, being warranted by the ſtamp and authority of his divine approbation. From theſe conſtitutions you are never to depart.

Not to go to war without firſt ſending embaſſadors.

BUT if it ſhall be your fortune, either now or hereafter, to fall under the neceſſity of a war, God grant it may be a foreign one, and for the decency of the proceeding, let it be advanced in form. You ſhall do well to let your heralds or embaſſadors be ſent in the firſt place with memorials, and declarations upon the matter in queſtion; for according to the courſe of reaſon and nature, words ſhould go before blows. You may give them to underſtand that your buſineſs is not to enrich yourſelves with priſoners, or booty: how unwilling you are to put things to extremities, and how deſirous of peace, upon any terms; notwithſtanding all the advantages of numbers, horſe, arms, military proviſions, and more than all the reſt, of an Almighty and a gracious God to fight your battles. But if your competitor ſhall yet think fit to put the cauſe upon a trial of war, draw out your men againſt him, committing the government of the whole to God, and next under him to the braveſt man of arms, policy, and courage, that you can pitch upon, as his deputy. Have a care of many heads; for they do commonly more hurt than good: not only for want of agreement, but in the matter of execution and diſpatch. Look to the choice of your levies; for the minds of men muſt be conſider'd as well as their bodies. Let them be daring as well as robuſt, for the leaſt mixture of cowardice may be enough to diſcourage and diſpirit a whole army.

Advice in the choice of a general.

No cowards to be choſen for ſoldiers.

You ſhall except out of the militia, the maſters of new-built houſes which they have not yet liv'd a year in: the planters of vineyards who have not as yet taſted the fruit of their own vines; and new-marry'd men that have not taken their wives home with them yet, who, when they ſhould be venturing their lives for their country, will be indulging them for their pleaſure.

Perſons excepted out of the militia, Deut. xxiv.

KEEP good order in your camp, and allow no liberties that are harſh and cruel. When you want wood at any time upon a ſiege, as for an engine, or ſome military uſe, ſpare all fruit-trees, upon this conſideration, that they were both created and planted for other uſes. If they had tongues they would expoſtulate the matter with you, why thoſe that were no cauſe of the war ſhould be deſtroy'd for the ſervice of it; and for their parts, if they were at liberty to tranſplant themſelves they could be as well elſewhere.

Obſerve good order in the camp.

Cut down no fruit-trees for common uſe. Deut. xx. 19.

WHEN you have the fortune to overcome in battle, give no quarter to thoſe of your enemies that were obſtinate and ſtood it out, but preſerve the reſt, and make them your tributaries, ſaving only the Chanaanites; and thoſe you are to extirpate, even the whole nation of them, root and branch.

No quarter to the obſtinate.

* LET no man appear in a woman's dreſs or habit, nor any woman in a man's; but eſpecially in a military action.

No man to put on a woman's habit, nor a woman a man's, Deut. xxii. 5.

THIS was the form and polity of the Hebrew commonwealth as Moſes left it, and he delivered other laws alſo that he had written ſome forty years before: of which in another tract.

The form of the Hebrew commonwealth.

HE held aſſemblies ſeveral days after this, ſucceſſively; beſtowing his benedictions upon thoſe who liv'd in obedience to his holy laws, and purſuing the malicious tranſgreſſors of them with bitter maledictions. He then recited a kind of a prophetical canticle in Hexameter verſe, containing a diſcourſe of things to come, and in the very order as they fell out after, without any variation either in the matter itſelf, or in the ſeries of the ſtory. This he left in writing to be kept in the oratory. He delivered his books to the prieſts, and alſo the ark, wherein were the ten commandments, written in two tables, leaving it in charge to the people, that ſo ſoon as ever they ſhould come to be maſters of the promis'd land, and ſettle their plantations, they ſhould take their revenge of the Amalekites, for the indignities they had formerly put upon them in the deſart.

The Chanaanites to be deſtroy'd, and an altar erected betwixt mount Garizim and Gebal, Deut. xxvii. xxviii.

HE commanded alſo that upon the taking of Chanaan, and putting the whole multitude to the ſword, they ſhould raiſe an altar to the eaſtward, not far from Sichem, betwixt two mountains, Garizim on the right hand, and Gebal on the left, and ſo dividing their army into twice ſix tribes, they were to diſpoſe of thoſe two diviſions upon theſe two mountains, together with the prieſts and Levites. They were to pray in their turns, and Garizim to lead the office, imploring all ſorts of bleſſings from Almighty God upon thoſe that kept his holy commandments and walked in the ways of his ſervant Moſes: the tribes upon Gebal, by way of reſponſe, at the cloſe, returning their acclamations, in token of approving what the other had done. And then after the ſame manner they follow'd with their maledictions, which were pronounced and ratify'd with the ſame ſolemnity as before. Theſe bleſſings and imprecations were at that time committed to writing, for a perpetual memory of the thing. He cauſed them alſo, when he was dying, to be engraven on each ſide of the altar, the people aſſiſting and offering up ſacrifices and burnt-offerings: a thing after that time not warrantable in itſelf, and therefore not to be brought into precedent. You have here the ordinances and conſtitutions of Moſes, which the Hebrews obſerve moſt religiouſly to this day.

Bleſſings and maledictions, ibid.

The people under an oath to obſerve God's laws, Deut. xxix.

UPON the day following, the whole multitude being gather'd together, men, women, and children, the meaneſt of ſlaves themſelves not excepted, Moſes bound them with an oath to the obſervance of theſe laws according to the will of God, and that neither favour, terror, nor any other pretence, ſhould ever make them depart from their obedience to thoſe precepts; but that if any ſingle perſon, though never ſo near or dear to them, or any body of men, ſhould ever attempt an innovation, they would join as one man againſt him and them, to perſecute the people, eraze their cities, and not leave them ſo much as one ſtone upon another, if they had power to compaſs it. But otherwiſe, in caſe of inſuperable difficulties, they would at leaſt make a publick proteſtation againſt the wickedneſs, and utterly deny their aſſent to it. This was the ſum and ſubſtance of the oath the multitude took upon this occaſion. Moſes inſtructed them further alſo, how they ſhould govern themſelves in their ſacrifices, and what meaſures they were to take in all great enterprizes; to know whether they had God's approbation or not, by obſerving the ſtones upon Aaron's breaſtplate, as is already ſet forth.

Joſhua's predictions, Deut. xxxiv. 9.

WHILE Moſes was yet alive, Joſhua foretold, by the ſpirit of prophecy, what he himſelf was to do for the welfare of the people, either in war abroad, or in a legal adminiſtration at home, preparing the multitude by his diſcourſes, for the entertainment of their new way of diſcipline. He told them alſo, that what he ſaid was by a divine impulſe, and that if ever they ſhould depart from the religion of their country, they would fall into great calamities; their land ſhould be over-run with foreigners, their cities ſack'd, their temple laid in aſhes, and themſelves ſold for ſlaves to a people who would treat them without mercy or compaſſion, till they came at laſt to a late and unprofitable repentance; not but that God would be pleaſed in time to come to reſtore them to their cities and their temple. But yet that after ſuch a reſtoration, they were ſtill in the future, to be loſt over and over again.

Joſhua order'd to march againſt the Chanaanites, Deut. xxxi. 7, 8.

MOSES being now ready to diſcharge himſelf of his commiſſion, order'd Joſhua to march with his army againſt the Chanaanites, in a full aſſurance that God would proſper him in his undertaking, and not without preſages likewiſe of all ſorts of bleſſings to the people, of whom he took his laſt leave in the following words:

Moſes's laſt ſpeech and advice to the people, Deut. xxxiii. xxxiv.

"SINCE it is the will of the Almighty to "call me to my fathers, and ſo to order it, "that this very day is to be the laſt of my "life, it will become me, while I am yet "living, and in your preſence, to give God "thanks for all his cares and providences ex"tended to you, and your affairs; not only "in your deliverances from all manner of ca"lamities, but in the bounty of innumerable "bleſſings and benefits; and I muſt likewiſe "acknowledge his infinite goodneſs to myſelf, "in proſpering and aſſiſting all my reaſonable "endeavours for your comfort and advantage; "wherein my part hath been only ſubſervient "and miniſterial toward your well-being, "while God himſelf was the firſt mover and "perfecter of it; for all which providences, "his holy name be praiſed; and to his gra"cious protection, now as a dying man, I "reckon it a duty to recommend you. It is "my duty likewiſe to mind you of the ho"nour and veneration you owe to that Al"mighty power, which alone, and no other, "you are to worſhip and adore; and pray ye "have a care to put a true value alſo upon "the laws he hath given you, as the moſt ſa"cred and ineſtimable of all his bounties. "Suppoſe it the caſe but of a common law"giver, to have his ordinances trampled up"on, and his authority deſpiſed, how unpar"donable an affront would this be, even from "one man to another? But who ſhall be "able to ſtand againſt the indignation of an "incenſed God then, who is your divine law"giver, when he ſhall be provoked to call "you to an account for the contempt of his "commandments?"

THESE laſt words of his were accompanied with a thouſand benedictions to the tribes, and not without ſeveral prophetical preſages of things afterward to befal them, and which accordingly came to paſs. The multitude fell all into a violent fit of weeping at this diſcourſe of Moſes; the women beating their breaſts, and their very children under a miſerable impatience of lamentation. Such was the tenderneſs, that even theſe poor innocents had for the dignity and virtue of ſo great a man, upon the apprehenſion of his approaching end. There was, in fine, a ſort of conteſt betwixt the young and old, who ſhould exceed each other in grief. The young were afflicted to think what would become of them for the time to come; the old to conſider how ill they had treated him in time paſt, and that they never underſtood the value of the bleſſing they enjoy'd, till they were now to be for ever deprived of it. But the force of this impreſſion preſſion did not appear in any thing ſo much, as in the effect it had upon the conſtancy and magnanimity, even of the comforter himſelf; for after all his philoſophizing upon the contempt of death, and his conſolatory counſels of reſignation and ſubmiſſion to the will of God, and to the law of nature, he yielded himſelf up at laſt to the weakneſs he condemn'd, and wept for company. While he was now moving toward his laſt retreat, and the multitude all in tears attending him, he gave a ſign with his hand to thoſe at a diſtance to ſtop where they were, and deſired thoſe nearer hand not to trouble the peace of his laſt hour with thoſe fruitleſs and unſeaſonable importunities. So they kept back to gratify his intimation, but ſtill looking after him with weeping eyes and ſad hearts, as far as they could ſee him. He took along with him only the elders, Eleazar the high-prieſt, and Joſhua his ſucceſſor. When he came to Abarim, a very high mountain over-againſt Jericho, he took a view of the fair and fruitful country of Chanaan, diſcharged the ſenators, and after a final leave taken of Eleazar and Joſhua, with mutual embraces, Moſes was taken away from them in a cloud, while they were yet diſcourſing, and tranſlated into a certain valley. The holy ſcripture ſays he died, leſt people ſhould imagine him, becauſe of the excellency of his perſon, to be yet alive, and with God. He lived a hundred and twenty years; and within one month of a third part of that time bore command over the Hebrews. He departed this life in the laſt month of the year, and the firſt day of the month, which the Macedonians call Dyſtrus, and we Adar.

The age and death of Moſes, Ver. 7.

HE was a man of admirable wiſdom; and one who made the beſt uſe of what he underſtood; an excellent orator, and no man better skill'd in moving the affections of the people than himſelf; ſo great a maſter of his paſſions, that he liv'd as if he had none, and as if he had known them only by their names; or elſe as he obſerv'd them in other men; never a greater captain, nor a prophet equal to him; for all his words were oracles. The people mourned for him thirty days, and the death of this holy man was the moſt ſenſible mortification they ever felt; and this was not only his character among thoſe that knew him in his life and death, but he has made himſelf as famous to poſterity in his writings, as he was to the age he liv'd in, for his actions. This is all we have to ſay concerning the end of Moſes.

CHAP. I.

Joshua succeeds Moses in his command over the Hebrews, fights and subdues the Chanaanites, and divides their lands by lot among the tribes.

Josh. i.

MOSES being now translated, as aforesaid, the last duties paid to his memory, and the mourning ceremony over, Joshua order'd the people to be in readiness to march, and sent away his spies to Jericho, to learn how the people stood affected, and to view the strength and condition of the town. After this he decamp'd, with a design to pass the river Jordan by the first opportunity. Upon this occasion he conven'd the princes of the tribes of Reubel, Gad, and Manasses; (for one half of Manasses was allow'd to plant and settle in the country of the Amorites, which was a seventh part of the land of Chanaan,) minding them of their promises to Moses, and desiring them, both for his sake, and their own, that they would now be as good as their words, in assisting their brethren; and do it chearfully too, as a justice to the memory of their glorious patron, who had always express'd such a particular care for them, even to his last breath. They exhibited their assistance very willingly; insomuch, that Joshua march'd from Abila with fifty thousand men, a matter of sixty furlongs, toward the banks of the river Jordan. Immediately upon their encamping, the spies brought Joshua an account of the state of Jericho, and what the Chanaanites were a-doing. They came thither as strangers, they said, and so went whither they would, and saw whatever they had a mind to, without any stop or question. They took a view of the walls, the gates, and the ramparts; all the weaknesses and strengths of the town, passing the whole day for men of curiosity only, and not in the least suspected of any design. They took up toward evening, in an inn near the wall, where they refreshed themselves; and after eating, news was brought them, as they were discoursing how to get back again, that information had been given to the king as he was at supper, of some certain spies who were come out of the Hebrew camp, and lay hid in the house of * Rachab; and that order was given immediately for the ſeizing of them, and putting them to the torture to know their buſineſs. So ſoon as Rachab underſtood that the houſe was to be ſearch'd, ſhe cover'd the ſpies under a parcel of flax that lay a drying upon the wall; and upon the coming of the meſſengers to look for theſe people, Rachab told them, indeed, of certain ſtrangers who had been there in the evening about ſun-ſet, but went their way again after ſupper; and if they were men ſuſpected to the king, as dangerous to the ſtate, they might be eaſily overtaken. The woman talk'd and look'd with ſuch an air of ſeriouſneſs, that the officers, without ever ſearching the houſe, poſted away toward the river Jordan, narrowly examining every road which they thought they might have taken; but having loſt their labour without making any diſcovery, they gave over the ſearch. So ſoon as the hurry was over, Rachab called forth her gueſts; minded them of the riſque ſhe had run for their ſakes; for that if they had been diſcover'd, it would certainly have coſt her and her family their lives; "Wherefore, ſays ſhe, whenever you "come to take this place, (as I have a reve-"lation from God that it will be ſo,) do you "take as much care of mine, and my people's "lives, as we have done of yours." And with theſe words ſhe diſmiſs'd them. The ſpies promiſed, with oaths, that her kindneſs ſhould be punctually requited, and therefore adviſed her, in order to it, that whenever ſhe found the town in danger of being taken, ſhe ſhould withdraw with what friends and goods ſhe had, into her own houſe, and hang out a ſcarlet cloth before her door. The general, they ſaid, ſhould be told of the token, and of the meaning of it, and would undoubtedly provide for the ſafety of whatever ſhould be found within thoſe walls. "She might depend upon "it, they ſaid, that they would be true to "what they had ſworn; only if any of them "ſhould be ſlain in actual hoſtility, they would "be quit from the obligation of their oath, "and the blame lie at her door, not theirs." Upon theſe conditions they parted; Rachab having provided them a rope to let themſelves down from the wall, by which means they made their eſcapes, and returned to the camp with the intelligence of what they had ſeen and obſerv'd, and the whole buſineſs of Rachab, with all the circumſtances; that of the oath eſpecially, in which caſe the general conſulted Eleazar the high-prieſt, and the elders, who did authoritatively pronounce the oath to be binding, and ſo ratified the obligation.

THE Hebrews were now encamped upon the banks of the river Jordan, on their way to Jericho; but the waters being out, the current of itſelf rapid and impetuous, not ſo much as a boat or a bridge to help them over, nor the means of building any, with an enemy over and above ſo near, and the town at laſt on the wrong ſide of the water, the general for ſome time was not a little diſcouraged under the apprehenſion of ſo many invincible difficulties, till it pleaſed God to aſſure him by a comfortable revelation, that thoſe obſtacles ſhould be removed, and the river made fordable for the tranſporting of his troops.

The Hebrews encamp upon Jordan, Joſh. iii.

AFTER two days expectation of this miraculous providence, Joſhua paſs'd the river with his army. In the firſt place went the prieſts, with the ark; the Levites after them with the tabernacle and the holy veſſels; after the Levites, follow'd the whole army; which was ranged according to the order of their ſeveral tribes; the women and the children in the middle, the better to ſecure them againſt the violence of the ſtream. It was obſerved upon the prieſt's firſt entrance into this paſſage, that the fierceneſs of the current abated, and the water fell: they found the bottom firm, and by degrees the channel came to be as dry as a pavement; ſo that the whole multitude forded it over, without any farther doubt or trouble, when they ſaw every thing ſucceeded according to what God had foretold them. But the prieſts continued ſtill in the middle, till the people were all paſs'd over, and ſafe landed on the other ſide. So ſoon as the army was got aſhore, the prieſts follow'd them, and left the river to its natural courſe again, which immediately fill'd up the channel, and put every thing into the ſame ſtate as before.

The order of their march, ibid.

THE army marched from thence fifty furlongs toward Jericho, and there encamped within ten furlongs more of the place. Here it was that Joſhua erected an altar of the twelve ſtones, which twelve princes of the ſeveral tribes brought along with them out of the bottom of the river, by the prophet's order and command, for a token and a memorial to future ages of the ſtream of the river thus miraculouſly ſtanding ſtill; and upon this altar did Joſhua ſacrifice, celebrating the feaſt of the paſſover alſo in the ſame place, and in a ſtate of plenty and abundance, equal to the degree of want and miſery, which they had hitherto endur'd; for the Chanaanites harveſt was at this time ripe upon the ground, cattle, and other booty every where expos'd, and the Hebrews had it all at mercy; only the manna fail'd them now at laſt, after a ſubſiſtence of forty years upon it in the wilderneſs.

THE Iſraelites living thus at diſcretion upon the Chanaanites country, without any ſort of check or controul, gave the Hebrew general to underſtand, that the enemy was not to be drawn out of their holds, by any provocation or affront whatſoever; ſo that he bethought himſelf of making ſome trial rather what might be done by a ſiege. Upon the firſt day of the feſtival, the prieſts took up the ark, and ſo marched forward with it in the middle of a guard of ſoldiers; ſeven other prieſts going before them, with ſeven horns ſounding, to animate the army to behave themſelves like men. And thus they went round about the walls of the city with the elders after them; but the prieſts only ſounding; and when they had gone the circuit of the city, they went back again to their camp without any more ceremony. This was the firſt day's work; and when they had done the ſame thing over again for ſix days ſucceſſively, Joſhua called the army and the people together on the ſeventh, and told them for news, that the town ſhould that day be delivered up to them, without any hazard or trouble; for the very walls ſhould fall down of their own accord, and leave the place naked; giving them in charge at the ſame time, to make a total deſtruction of every creature that had life in it; and that neither wearineſs of doing execution, tenderneſs of nature, or any other conſideration of booty or flight, ſhould prevail upon them to hold their hands; but that they ſhould put all to the ſword, without reſerving any thing of the ſpoil to their own advantage. What gold or ſilver ſoever ſhould be found, they were order'd to lay it in one maſs altogether; for it ſhould be dedicated to God, as the firſt-fruits of the victory obtain'd over that city; ſaving only that Rachab, with her family and relations, ſhould be preſerv'd for the ſake of the oath ſworn to her by the ſpies.

WITH theſe words he marched with his army toward the city, and went the round of it with the prieſts, the ſenate, and the ſoldiers, in the ſame order as before. Upon the ſeventh time going about it, they made a little ſtop, and the wall fell down all on a ſudden, without any engine or force bent againſt it. This terrible ſurprize put the people into ſuch an amazement, that they had not the hearts left to make the leaſt reſiſtance; ſo that the Hebrews entered the breach, and cut off all before them, without the leaſt hazard or oppoſition; ſome in the ſtreets, others in their houſes; ſome in one place, and ſome in another, till it came, in fine, to an univerſal ſlaughter, without ſparing either women or children; ſo that the city was only a pile of dead bodies in the concluſion, and not one of the inhabitants found means to eſcape the common fate. This deſolation ended in the burning of the city, and the adjacent country; only Rachab, and her friends and family were reſcued by the ſpies, who being brought to the general, received his acknowledgments for the good office ſhe had done his agents; promiſing withal, that ſhe ſhould not fail of a ſuitable reward, which he quickly made good to her, by conferring on her a conſiderable eſtate in lands. Nor was this all; for he never fail'd afterwards to ſhew his eſteem and value for her upon all occaſions. What the fire had ſpared, was deſtroyed by the ſword, with a prophetical curſe upon any man that ſhould ever preſume afterward to rebuild it, wiſhing that whoever ſhould take upon him to lay the firſt ſtone of a new foundation, might loſe his eldeſt ſon, and he that ſhould finiſh the work, his youngeſt; and God would not ſuffer this malediction to paſs in vain neither, as we ſhall ſhew hereafter. There was taken in this town gold, ſilver, and braſs, to an ineſtimable value, without any diminution of it for the profit of any particular perſon; but Joſhua deliver'd it up to the prieſts, to be depoſited in their treaſury; and this was the fate of Jericho.

BUT it ſo fell out that one * Achar, the ſon of Zebedee, and of the tribe of Judah, had gotten a rich cloak of the king's, of cloth of gold, and a huge maſs of the ſame metal, weighing two hundred ſhekels †. This man thought it ſomewhat unreaſonable to give that to God which he had no need of, and for which he himſelf had ventured his life, and had ſo much occaſion to make uſe of; ſo that he digged a hole in the ground under his tent, and there hid it; imagining that ſo long as his fellow-ſoldiers knew nothing of it, the concealment might paſs upon God himſelf. The army at that time was encamped at a place called ‡ Galgala, which ſignifies liberty; for being now paſſed the river, they reckon'd themſelves as good as ſecured from the ſlavery of Egypt, and the miſeries of the deſart.

SOME few days after the razing of Jericho, Joſhua ſent out a detachment of three thouſand men to Ain, a city a little above, higher in the country, where they engaged the enemy, and were beaten back with the loſs of ſix and thirty men. The tidings of this repulſe put the Iſraelites to a terrible anxiety of thought, not ſo much for the number of the ſlain, (tho' their near relations and men of valour and worth,) but for the ill-boding of the diſappointment; for they looked upon the difficulties of the war (even according to God's promiſe) to be all over, and that they were as good as maſters of the land; but their enemies had now taken heart again, they ſaid; and immediately, upon this reflection, they put on ſackcloth, and ſpent that whole day in faſting, weeping, and mourning; ſo grievous was the ſenſe they had of the diſgrace that was befallen them. The ſpirits of the army were ſo ſunk upon this diſaſter, and caſt down into ſuch a deſperation of better things for the future, that Joſhua, upon this occaſion, addreſſed himſelf with a more than ordinary aſſurance to Almighty God, ſaying, † A Shekel (according to Dr. Arbuthnot) reduced to Engliſh Troy weight, weigh'd nine penny weights, two grains, and four ſevenths; two hundred ſhekels therefore muſt weigh ſeven pounds, ſeven ounces, one penny weight, and ten grains; or ninety one ounces, one penny weight, and ten grains, which, reckoning gold at four pound the ounce, amounted to three hundred ſixty four pounds, five ſhillings, and eight pence of our money, or thereabouts. The ſhekel of gold, which was alſo a particular coin among the Jews, according to the beſt authors, was worth one pound, ſixteen ſhillings, and ſix pence of our money, two hundred of which amount exactly to three hundred and ſixty five pounds, which comes very near the aboveſaid ſum.

We think it not improper here to obſerve to the reader, that there is great diſagreement among learned men, about the value of the Jewiſh ſhekel of ſilver. Some ſay it was worth but two ſhillings and a penny, ſome two ſhillings and three pence farthing, and half farthing; others two ſhillings and ſix pence in our money. But as Joſephus, more than once, avers it was equivalent to the Attick Tetradrachm, ſeveral of which we having lately had the opportunity of ſeeing and weighing, and finding them generally ſomething heavier than our half-crown, we rather chuſe to fix it at two ſhillings and ſeven pence, conformable whereunto is all that we have hitherto ſaid upon this ſubject, ſave only in two places, viz. in Book I. Chap. xv. where 'tis ſaid Abraham gave Ephraim four hundred ſhekels for a burying-place, which (according to the opinion of them who think a ſhekel was worth no more than two ſhillings and a penny,) ſhould there have been computed at forty one pounds, thirteen ſhillings, and four pence, Engliſh money; but according to our preſent valuation of it, at fifty one pounds, thirteen ſhillings, and four pence. So in Book IV. Chap. iv. p. 114. the note at the bottom ought to be three ſhillings and ten pence half penny in our money. Theſe emendations, we hope, will attone for the inconſiſtency we have herein been guilty of, and obviate, or at leaſt anſwer the juſt objections that either have, or otherwiſe might be made by our candid readers upon this head.

‡ Scrip. Gilgal. Maſius in his commentary upon the fifth chapter of Joſhua ſhews this to be an error.

God bids him purge the army of ſacrilege, and caſt lots to find out the offender, Joſh. vii. 13.

JOSHUA delivered this ejaculatory prayer proſtrate, with his face upon the ground, till upon finiſhing, God bid him " Riſe and purge
" the army from a pollution that had defiled
" it; for there was a ſacrilegious fraud that " lay unaccounted for among them; and that " corruption was the true cauſe of the miſ-
" chief that had lately befallen them; but,
" ſays the oracle, let there be lots caſt, to " find out the criminal, and then let him be " puniſhed on whom the lot falls, and the If-" raelites ſhall certainly carry their cauſe, and
" be victorious." Joſhua made a report of all this to the people, and calling to him Eleazar the high-prieſt, and the princes of the tribes, he put the tribes to the firſt teſt of the lot; and the lot falling upon the tribe of Judah, they caſt lots next upon the ſeveral families of that tribe, and the lot fell upon the family of Zacharias; bringing the queſtion, in fine, upon a perſonal examination of man by man, they came at laſt to find out the very individual perſon that was guilty of the ſacrilege, the lot falling upon Achar, who thereupon was forthwith taken into cuſtody, and finding that there was no trifling with divine juſtice, his conſcience alſo being his accuſer, confeſs'd the ſacrilegious theft, and delivered it up in the ſight of the people; whereupon he was immediately put to an ignominious death, and his body buried by night in a ſcandalous manner, like a common malefactor.

The lot falls upon Achar, Ver. 18.

Who confeſſes the fact, and is ſtoned to death, Ver. 20, &c.

WHEN the army was purged, Joſhua drew them out toward the city of *Ain, planted his ambuſhes, and early next morning preſented himſelf in ſight of the enemy with his main body. The Ainites were ſo elevated with their former ſucceſs, that ſo ſoon as they had the Iſraelites in their eye, they immediately advanced in a furious manner againſt them to give them battle; the one giving way by little and little, as for fear, and the other preſſing upon them as in a full aſſurance of a certain victory. By this ſtratagem of a pretended flight, the Ainites were drawn from their city; when immediately upon a ſignal given, Joſhua put a ſtop to the army, and the ambuſh almoſt in the ſame inſtant, entered the town, with little or no oppoſition; for the inhabitants were moſt of them gotten together upon the walls, out of a curioſity to ſee the action, and inferring from the countenance of things, that the day was as good as their own already. It came however to a terrible ſlaughter; and in the mean time, the army being totally routed before the town, had no other retreat left them, but to fly back again to the city for ſanctuary: which was the courſe they ſteer'd; upon a preſumption that the place was ſtill in the ſame ſtate they left it. But when they came to find it taken, their houſes rifled and burnt, and their wives and children, either deſtroyed or priſoners, the miſerable remainder of them who eſcaped the ſword, were forced to betake themſelves to the wild fields and woods for refuge. It was an incredible booty that was taken upon this encounter: a world of women, children, and bondſlaves; plate, and coſtly furniture, to a prodigious value; a great many flocks, and herds of cattle, and mighty ſums of current money. The country, in ſhort, was exceſſively rich, and the whole ſpoil of it was divided among the ſoldiers, who were then encamped in Galgala.

The Chanaanites routed, Ver. 22--26.

An ineſtimable booty.

WHEN the Gibeonites (being near neighbours to Jeruſalem) came to hear of the miſerable fate of Jericho and Ain, they began to conſider that their own turn might be next; but however, being prepoſſeſſed with an expectation that the whole nation of the Chanaanites were to be rooted out, they thought it not worth their while to make any barefac'd application to the Hebrews for favour. They invited however their neighbours the Chephirites, and thoſe of Kiriath-jearim, to join with them in the propoſal of a fair alliance with the Hebrews; telling them, unleſs they took proper meaſures to evade the approaching danger, they would be involv'd in the ſame ruin with the reſt of their countrymen; but that if they wou'd take their advice, means might be found out to avoid it. The advice was found reaſonable, and ſo they diſpatched away an embaſſy to Joſhua, of the fitteſt men they could pick out to manage ſuch a commiſſion. They had it in their inſtructions, not upon any terms to own themſelves for Chanaanites, but rather to inſinuate, that they lived a great way off, and had no manner of dealing with thoſe people. " They had heard much, they ſaid, of the re" putation of the Hebrews, and they were " now come to attend their General upon this
" occaſion. It might be ſeen by their clothes, " that they had come a great way; for they " were new when they ſet out, and they were " now worn threadbare by the length of their " journey." Now they had purpoſely put on clothes that were coarſe and threadbare, for the better credit of the impoſture. In this habit they preſented themſelves before the aſſembly, with their teſtimonials, that they came as commiſſioners from the Gibeonites, and their neighbouring cities to enter into a treaty of friendſhip with them, ſaving only the rights and privileges of their country; for they found, that by God's grace and bounty, the land of Chanaan was given them for an inheritance, wherein they congratulated their good fortunes, deſiring to make a league of friendſhip and confederacy with them; thereby thinking to ſecure their liberties and property, making an oſtentation of their rags all this while, as the evidence of their ſincerity. so much credit to the pretences, both of their words, and clothes, that taking for granted they were not Chanaanites, he ſtruck up a league with them, Eleazar the high-prieſt, and the elders, at the ſame time giving them the oaths of friends and allies, and that they ſhould never do any thing contrary to the tenor of that obligation. The agreement was ſolemnly executed, in the preſence, and with the approbation of the whole multitude. By this artifice they gained their point, and ſo returned to their own home. It happened ſoon after this, that upon Joſhua's drawing his army to that quarter of the Chanaanites which looks toward the plains, he was given to underſtand that theſe Gibeonites did not live far from Jeruſalem, and that they were of the ſame ſtock with the Chanaanites: ſo he ſent for ſome of the chief men of the country to come to him, and told them plainly that they had not dealt with him like men of truth and honour. They excuſed themſelves upon the neceſſity of the caſe; for, ſaid they, "we had no other way "left to ſave our ſelves." Upon this difficulty, the high-prieſt, and the elders were conſulted as to the obligation of the treaty, and were all poſitive in their opinion, that an oath ſo circumſtanced, and ſo ratified, was abſolutely ſacred and inviolable; but that the point might yet in ſome ſort be modified, by ſetting them apart for the doing of ſervile offices in the publick drudgery; which was the condition they ſtood afterwards condemned to; and upon theſe terms they avoided a much worſe fate, which otherwiſe would moſt certainly have befallen them.

The Gibeonites made drudges, Ver. 27.

WHEN the king of Jeruſalem came to be informed that the Gibeonites were revolted, and gone over into alliance with the Hebrews, he ſo highly reſented it, that he preſently ſent to four neighbouring kings to join with him in a war againſt them. They debated the matter, and came immediately to a reſolution, drew their troops together, and encamped near a certain fountain not far from the city, which they were then preparing to beſiege; the Gibeonites being apprehenſive the ſtorm would fall upon them, apply'd to Joſhua for aſſiſtance. Matters were now come to this paſs, that they were to be ruined by their own people, and forced to fly for protection to thoſe who were in arms purpoſely to root out the inhabitants of Chanaan. But ſo it was, however, that they had no other hope of ſafety under the ſun but in their new friendſhip. Upon the firſt intelligence of this enterprize, Joſhua marched with his whole army, night and day, to ſuccour the Gibeonites, and fell upon the enemy early in the morning, as they were juſt about to attack the town, routed, and had the chace of them along the hills, till they came to the valley of Bethora. The hand of God was never more viſible in any human action than it was in this battle; for, over and above the dreadful thunder and lightning of that day, with a violent tempeſt of hail-ſtones of a prodigious ſize, there was yet one prodigy ſtranger than all the reſt, and ſuch a one as was never heard of before: The ſun itſelf ſtood ſtill in the firmament, that the Hebrews might not want day-light for the perfecting of their victory. Upon this rout, the five kings were purſued to the cave of Makkeda, where they were found by Joſhua, taken, and all put to death. The miracle of the lengthening of this day beyond its natural meaſure, and of the ſun's ſtopping in its courſe, is moſt expreſly atteſted in the holy ſcriptures, according to the copies reſerved in the temple.

Five kings taken, and put to death in the cave of Makkeda, Ver. 22--26.

AFTER this defeat of the five kings that made war upon the Gibeonites, Joſhua went back again to the mountainous part of Chanaan, where he put a great many people to the ſword, and ſeized a vaſt number of cattle; which done, he marched back with the army to Gilgal.

THE fame of the Hebrews for their martial exploits, and the numbers of the ſlain, made ſo great a noiſe every where, that the very reputation of their arms carried a terror along with it. But this did not yet hinder the Chanaanite kings of mount Libanus and thereabouts, nor thoſe of the plains, together with the Philiſtines, from joining in a confederacy againſt them; for they drew their forces together, and encamped at * Berothe, a city of Galilee, not far from the upper Cœdeſa, which is alſo in the country of Galilee. Their whole ſtrength was computed to amount to three hundren thouſand foot, ten thouſand horſe, and two thouſand chariots. The thought of this formidable power caſt ſuch a damp upon the ſpirits, not only of the Iſraelites in general, but upon Joſhua himſelf, that the dread they had for ſo unequal an encounter, fell little ſhort of a downright deſpair: but upon God's reproving them for their faint-heartedneſs and diſtruſt, and encouraging them with freſh aſſurances of victory and protection, commanding them likewiſe to hamſtring the enemies horſes, and burn their chariots, the general took heart upon it, and forthwith marched with a full aſſurance of ſucceſs toward the enemy. Upon the fifth day he came up to them, and fought them. The encounter was obſtinate, and ſo bloody, that the truth of the action would be almoſt incredible; but however, the confederates were abſolutely broken, vaſt numbers kill'd in the purſuit; all the kings ſlain, and the whole army, in effect, entirely cut off: nay, ſuch was the rage of the victors againſt the conquer'd party, that when they had no more men to kill, they wreak'd their fury upon the horſes and chariots. The fortune, in fine, of this day, made Joſhua abſolute maſter of the country. He took their towns, kill'd all he could come at, did what he thought fit, and no creature left to oppoſe him. Their country, in ſhort, was wholly depopulated, and the very nation itſelf extirpated, ſaving only ſome few ſtragglers, who had the good hap to provide for their ſafety by flying into ſtrong holds. And all theſe diſtreſſes were but the miſerable devaſtations of one five years war.

UPON this fatal overthrow, Joſhua decamped from Gilgal, and marched up the mountains toward Siloe, where he planted the holy tabernacle, with an intent to wait a while there, for the firſt opportunity of erecting a temple: the ſituation of the place being both commodious and delicious, and in all reſpects agreeable to the deſign. From thence he took all the people along with him to Sichem, where he erected an altar, as Moſes in time paſt had foretold and appointed. This being done, he divided his army; one half he ſent to Mount Garizim, and the other to Mount Gibal*, where there was likewiſe another altar built; the prieſts and Levites being alſo divided. Here they offer'd ſacrifices, and when they had denounced the maledictions, formerly mentioned, and engraven them upon the altar, they returned to Siloe.

Joſhua marches in two bodies to Mount Garizim and Gebal, where they raiſe a third altar.

Joſhua calls an aſſembly at Siloe, Joſh. xxiii.

JOSHUA was now far gone in years, and conſidering that the Chanaanites had yet ſeveral places of ſtrength left them, which betwixt art and nature were in a manner impregnable, (for the Chanaanites having intelligence from the very firſt departure of the Iſraelites out of Egypt, that they had a deſign to invade their country, let no time ſlip to ſecure and fortify themſelves;) Joſhua, I ſay, being aware of all this, call'd a general aſſembly of the people to meet at Siloe, where the appearance was very great. Joſhua, upon this occaſion, ſummed up what he had to ſay in few words, and laid the matter in hand before them. He gave them a ſhort hiſtory of the great things they had done and ſucceeded in already, by the aſſiſtance of God's favour and protection, as a people that religiouſly obſerv'd his laws. He minded them how God had given them victory over one and thirty kings, that had the confidence to take up arms againſt them, deſtroying their moſt numerous armies, and rooting out the very generations of their enemies. But in regard that the conqueſt was as yet but imperfect, ſome of their cities being already taken, and a great many others remaining in their hands that were better mann'd and fortified, and that it would be a work of time to reduce them, he thought it adviſeable, in the firſt place, to diſmiſs thoſe of their friends who came from beyond Jordan, to join in the hazard of the common cauſe; and with all due reſpects and acknowledgments, to ſend them back to the lot of their inheritance again. And ſecondly, that commiſſioners ſhould be choſen reſpectively out of every tribe; men of approved skill and integrity, and their buſineſs ſhould be, to take an exact ſurvey of the country, and to make a full report of it, without fraud or delay.

And minds the people of the great things God had done for them, ibid.

Joſhua adviſes the diſmiſſing of the two tribes and a half that came from beyond Jordan, Joſh. xxii. 4.

And the ſending of commiſſioners to ſurvey the country, Joſh. xviii. 8, 9.

THE people, every man of them, were highly pleaſed with the motion, and ſo Joſhua preſently order'd his agents to enter upon the work, appointing them for their aſſiſtants, men well skill'd in ſurveying; whereby they could not ſo well be impos'd upon, or miſled in the account.

Commiſſioners are choſen, ibid.

With inſtructions to make an eſtimate, not upon quantity, but equivalence.

THEY had it in their inſtructions alſo, notwithſtanding the ſurvey upon meaſure, to make a final eſtimate upon the quality or goodneſs of the land, as one quarter might fall out to be better or worſe than another; for there are in Chanaan a great many fair large fields, which being put in balance with ſome others, might be allow'd vaſtly to have the preference for corn, and all ſorts of fruits; but if compared with the land about Jericho or Jeruſalem, they would be found to be prodigiouſly inferior in worth. The country, indeed, is not large, and a good part of it mountainous; but for the plenty, growth, and beauty of the productions, no place whatſoever goes beyond it. For this reaſon it was concluded, not to value the lots barely by the meaſure, but by the virtue of them; for one acre ſometimes might fall out to be worth a thouſand. There were ten men employ'd upon this commiſſion to anſwer the ſame number of tribes concern'd in the queſtion. Theſe ten commiſſioners took both a view and an eſtimate of the country, and within ſeven months after, they came back again with the whole ſtate of the computation to Siloe, which was at that time the ſeat of the tabernacle.

The tabernacle at Siloe

A partition of the whole by lot into nine parts, to anſwer the nine tribes and a half, Joſh. xiii, xiv, xv, xvi, xvii, xviii, xix.

JOSHUA then calling to his aſſiſtance Eleazar the high-prieſt, with the elders and princes of the tribes, made a partition of the whole, into ſo many ſhares, to be divided among nine tribes, and one half tribe of Manaſſes; every one to have in proportion, according to the rate and equity of the diſtribution.

The lot of Judah.

UPON putting it to the lot, the tribe of Judah had for their lot all the Upper Judea, reaching in length to Jeruſalem, and in breadth to the lake of Sodom; comprehending alſo the cities of Aſcalon and Gaza.

Simeon.

THE tribe of Simeon, had that part of Idumea which borders upon Egypt and Arabia.

Benjamin.

THE tribe of Benjamin had that part of the country, which, in length, extends from the river Jordan to the ſea; and, in breadth, from Jeruſalem to Bethel. This, for compaſs, was the ſmalleſt lot: but the quality makes amends for the quantity; for Jericho and Jeruſalem are comprized in it.

Ephraim.

THE tribe of Ephraim had for their lot the country in length from Jordan to Gadara, and in breadth from Bethel to the large plain.

The half tribe of Manaſſes.

THE half tribe of Manaſſes had their lot lengthways, from Jordan to the city Dora; and breadthways to Bethſana, which is now known by the name of Scythopolis.

Iſſachar.

THE tribe of Iſſachar had for their lot, all betwixt Jordan and Mount Carmel, which reaches out in breadth to Mount Itabyr †.

Zabulon.

THE tribe of Zabulon had for its lot, the whole country that borders upon Mount Carmel and the ſea, and ſo far as Genezareth.

Aſſer.

THE tribe of Aſſer had for its lot, the country behind mount Carmel, over-againſt Sidon, reckoning the city of Arce ‡ alſo, otherwiſe Actipus.

Nephthali.

THE tribe of Nephthali had for their lot the Upper Galilee, and the country eaſtward to the city of Damaſcus, Mount Libanus, and the head of the river Jordan, which has its riſe from that ſide of it that borders upon the city Arce, toward the north.

Dan.

THE tribe of Dan had the vallies toward the weſt, which are bounded by Azotus and Dora; and to them likewiſe belong the cities of Jamnia and Gittha, and the whole country from Aceron to the mountain, where the portion of the tribe of Judah begins.

THIS was the diviſion that Joſhua made of ſix provinces of the Chanaanites, which took their names from ſo many of the ſons of Chanaan; and of this country did he deliver the poſſeſſion to the aforeſaid nine tribes and a half; but as to Amorrhæa, ſo call'd from one of the ſons of Chanaan, Moſes had diſpoſed of it long ſince to the two other tribes and a half, as we have shewn above; but then the regions of the Sidonians, the Aruccans, Amathcans, and Aritheans, are not comprized in this division, not being at that time inhabited.

WHILE Joshua was now struggling with the infirmities of old age, and the cares of the government, he found evidently that as he was no longer able to discharge the offices of his function in his own person, so there was no depending upon those whom he deputed to act for him in the publick administration; for they had not a due regard, he saw, to the common good; wherefore he gave it in charge to every tribe respectively, not to tolerate any of the race of the Chanaanites in the land God had allotted them, but to root out the very remains of them; minding them how solemnly Moses had declar'd himself in this matter, to whose advice and opinion he doubted not of their giving both heed and credit: beside, that their own security, and that of their laws, rights, and religion, depended all upon it, and that he had experience, as well as authority for what he said. He enjoin'd them farther, to deliver up to the Levites the thirty eight cities that were design'd them, being in possession of ten already in * Amorrhæa, on the other side of the river. Three of these were to be cities of privilege or refuge. In the tribe of Judah, the city of Hebron; in the tribe of Ephraim, Sichem; and in the tribe of Nephthali †, Cedese, in the Upper Galilee: to all which they readily agreed, out of a veneration they had for the observance of the laws and customs of Moses. He proceeded after this, to a distribution of the booty, which in herds and flocks, money, plate, furniture, and other pillage amounted to an immense value; for it was a large and plentiful country, and the Israelites, one and all, from the highest to the lowest, made their fortunes out of the spoil.

Josh. xxiii. 2.

THE next thing Joshua had to do, was the calling together of his auxiliaries, who came to him from beyond Jordan, and had their part in the honour of his late conquest: they were computed to be a matter of fifty thousand men, and upon their meeting, Joshua deliver'd himself to them to this effect:

Joshua's speech to his troops from beyond Jordan, Josh. xxiii. 2--8

"SINCE it has been the good-will and "pleasure of our heavenly Lord and father "first to put us in the possession of this land; "and then to promise the continuance of it "to our posterity; and since God has been "likewise pleased to make use of your ready "and cheerful assistance toward the execution "of this holy purpose, it is but reason, for "you who have born so great a part in the "dangers and difficulties of this war, to be "partakers also in the comforts and blessings "of a common peace; to which end, we think "it but justice to discharge you from any far-"ther attendance at present; not doubting of "the same affection and good-will from you "for the future, if ever there should be such "another occasion. We are now to give you "a thousand acknowledgments for all the toils "and hazards you have hitherto undergone "with us; and pray let the sense of good "offices gone and past, be improv'd into a "mutual and an inviolable league of friend-"ship for the time to come; remembring that "we stand indebted for the advantages that at "this instant we enjoy, next under God, to "the force of this reciprocal assistance; and "that providence hath evidently made us ne-"cessary one to another. It may be consider'd "also, after all you have done and suffer'd, "that your services are not unrewarded, so "far at least as an inestimable booty in gold, "silver, and whatever else is most precious, "may pass for a recompence: beside the en-"gaging of friends in us, who shall never for-"get the obligation, but shall always be ready "to do you good offices; for you have most "religiously executed the last will of Moses, "and left nothing undone that we could take "kindly at your hands; wherefore we shall "now leave you at liberty to depart to the "lot of your inheritance, which we wish you "much joy in. But pray ye, let no distance "of place set limits to our friendship; the "interposition of rivers must never divide our "affections; for on which bank soever, we "are all Hebrews still. Abraham was the "common father of us all, let our abode be "where it will, and it was from one and the "same God that all our forefathers received "their being; and that God we are all to "worship, according to the ordinances and in-"stitutions left us by Moses. So long as we "stand firm to that way of religion, we may "be sure of the favour and protection of that "God for our comfort. But whenever you "apostatize from this, and espouse another re-"ligion, and other gods, the God of your "fathers will cast you off." With these words he took a solemn and distinct leave, both of the princes, and of the people, to whom he addres's'd his speech; who upon this dismission return'd to the place whence they came, the rest conducting them some part of their way, till after much weeping and reluctancy, they came with great difficulty in the end to a final separation; Joshua continuing still in the same place where he was.

THE tribes of Reubel and Gad were no sooner pass'd the river, with those of Manasses that followed them, but they erected an altar upon the farther bank, to remain as a monumental record to posterity of the alliance that was then contracted betwixt the borderers on both sides of the Jordan. The news of this altar was immediately carried over to their friends on the other side of the water, without one word of the intent and meaning of it; which put their associates into so outragious a jealousy of their confederates, as apostates and innovators, that they presently betook themselves to their arms, for the vindication of the worship and religion of their forefathers, and to avenge the cause of God upon the heads and authors of this defection. In this heat they took up a resolution, with sword in hand, to pass the river, and to do justice upon the principals of this desertion, without any respect to the dignity of persons, or the nearness of relations; for it was God's cause, they said, and in the case of his service they were absolv'd from all other obligations. In the flame of this transport, the general, the high-priest, and the elders, betwixt authority and advice, so far prevail'd upon the headstrong multitude, as to suspend the execution of so extravagant a revenge, till they might be certainly inform'd

whether their brethren were guilty of this abomination or not; and if they found them guilty, they ſhould be then left at liberty to fall upon them without mercy. They agreed to the motion, and ſo made choice of Phinees, the ſon of Eleazar, and ten other perſons of eminent note among the people, to go over to their countrymen, and learn what was the true end of building that altar. They departed upon this embaſſy, and ſo ſoon as ever they got croſs the water, there was ſummon'd an aſſembly, wherein Phinees diſcharg'd himſelf of his commiſſion in words to this effect:

Phinees, and ten eminent men ſent upon an embaſſy to the diſcontented tribes, Joſh. xxii. 13.

An aſſembly call'd, Ver. 15--21.

Phinees to the Reubelites, ibid.

"WE underſtand very well, that the crime "charg'd upon you at preſent, is too heinous "to be puniſh'd only with words; but yet we "have not taken up arms now, inconſiderately and raſhly to execute a vengeance according to the degree of the iniquity; for it is "out of reſpect to conſanguinity, and in hope "that ſecond and ſounder thoughts may bring "you to better reaſon, that we are engaged "upon this embaſſy, and to ſpeak in this aſſembly. We do but deſire to be ſincerely "inform'd, upon what motives, and with "what deſign you have now raiſed this altar. "If you have done it out of any pious end, "we have no quarrel to you; but if you are "gone over to a falſe worſhip, it is for our "God and our religion that we muſt draw our "ſwords againſt you. We ſpeak our fears; "for we cannot think it credible yet, that a "people ſo well inſtructed in the will, and in "the laws of God, our friends and allies that "we have but juſt now parted with, a people "newly eſtabliſhed in the lot of a plentiful "poſſeſſion, by God's ſpecial grace and providence: We cannot, I ſay, believe you "to be ſo inſenſible and ungrateful, as to abandon the holy tabernacle, the ark, the altar, "and the worſhip of your forefathers, to join "with the Chanaanites in the adoration of "their falſe gods; or if unhappily you ſhould "have been ſo miſled, do but repent and diſclaim your error, and return to that reverence you owe to the laws of God, and of "your country, and you ſhall be yet received. "But if you ſhall obſtinately perſiſt, there is "no labour or danger that we ſhall think too "great for the defence of our laws and worſhip. If that be the caſe, we muſt immediately break in upon you by force of arms, "and put no difference at all betwixt Apoſtate Iſraelites and profeſs'd Chanaanites, but "deſtroy the one indifferently with the other. "Do not perſuade yourſelves, that becauſe "you are out of our bounds, and a river betwixt us, you are therefore out of the reach "of God's power and providence; for you "are upon his ground wherever you are, and "under his juriſdiction. If you are not able "to withſtand the temptations of the place "you live in, take your fortune in a new diviſion of lands, and quit the country, let it "be never ſo fruitful. Be wiſe and temperate "in time, and do not ſuffer yourſelves to be "carried away with a wanton and profane deſire after new things. This we beg of you, "for the ſake of your wives and children, "and whatever elſe may be dear to you. Do "not force us upon the neceſſity of ſuch a war, "as we tremble at the very thoughts of; but "it is at your choice ſtill, whether you will "rather ſubmit to be overcome by reaſonable "words, or to put the main cauſe to the dint "of a battle."

WHEN Phinees had made an end of ſpeaking, the rulers of the aſſembly, in the name of themſelves, and of the whole multitude, returned this anſwer in their own juſtification.

The Reubelites reply, Ver. 21--29.

"WE are not conſcious of having ever de-"parted from your alliance; neither are we, "in any ſort, guilty of that affectation of no-"velty in the erecting of this altar, which is "now charged upon us. We know but one "God, and that God is the God of all the "Hebrews; and but one altar, which is the "brazen altar before the tabernacle. As for "this altar here, which we are ſuſpected for, "it was never intended for any religious uſe, "but only for a civil memorial to future times "of our fellowſhip and alliance; and rather "to keep us ſteddy to our antient religion, "than to be any ways introductive to the vio-"lation of it. We can ſafely appeal to God, "that we had no ſuch thought in the ſetting "up of this altar as is imputed to us; where-"fore pray have a better opinion of your bre-"thren for the future, than to think us guilty "of ſo mortal an apoſtaſy from the rites and "cuſtoms of our progenitors; a ſin not to be "expiated in any of the ſons of Abraham, but "with the loſs of his life."

All miſunderſtandings remov'd, Ver. 31, 32, 33.

PHINEES was overjoy'd at ſo firm and ſatisfactory a declaration, and returning immediately to Joſhua, gave him a particular account of every thing, in the hearing of the people, who were all infinitely pleaſed with the reſult of this embaſſy, when they ſaw things brought to ſo amicable a concluſion, without any danger of a civil war, or of bloodſhed. Hereupon they ſacrificed, and gave God thanks, after which Joſhua diſmiſs'd the multitude to their ſeveral homes, while he himſelf took up his abode in Sichem.

Joſhua takes up at Sichem, Joſh. xxiv.

IN the twentieth year after this, Joſhua being being now extremely old, and too infirm for the executing of publick buſineſs, he call'd a general aſſembly of the heads of the cities, the elders, and magiſtrates, and as many of the common people as could be gotten together upon that occaſion. At this meeting he addreſs'd himſelf to them in a pious and pertinent diſcourſe, upon the ſubject of God's infinite mercies and providences towards them:

Joſhua extremely old.

He appoints a general aſſembly, ibid.

Joſhua upon God's mercies and providence, ibid.

"Setting forth, how he had preſerv'd them "all in their calamities, relieved them in all "their wants and diſtreſſes, and now advanced "them at laſt, out of the moſt deſpicable con-"dition of ignominy, penury, and oppreſſion, "to the higheſt degree of reputation and "plenty. He laid it as an injunction upon "them for the future, ſo to behave themſelves "toward that God, that they might not loſe "his favour; minding them withal, that they "had no other way of preſerving themſelves, "than by leading their lives in the fear and "love of that Almighty power, and in the "obſervance of his commandments. He ad-"jured them alſo, to take thoſe his laſt words "and counſels in good part; for he was now "leaving the world, and could not end his "days better than in the diſcharge of that "duty."

The death of Joſhua, xxiv. 29.

WITH theſe laſt words in his mouth he departed this life, in the hundred and tenth year of his age, having ſpent forty of them under the diſcipline of Moſes, and twenty five years more more in the administration, as his successor, after his death. He was a man of political prudence, and endu'd also with a singular felicity of popular eloquence in expressing his thoughts; brave and indefatigable in war, and no less just and dexterous in peace; and in short, a person qualify'd for all great purposes. He was bury'd in Thamna †, a city belonging to the tribe of Ephraim. Eleazar the high-priest dy'd also about the same time, the priesthood descending by succession to his son Phinees. His sepulchre is at this day to be seen in the city Gabatha.

Joshua's character.

The death of Eleazar the high-priest, Josh. xxiv. 33.

AFTER the death of Joshua and Eleazar, the people consulted Phinees about God's farther will and pleasure in the prosecution of the war against the Canaanites; whose answer was, that they should go on with it; but that the sovereign command and direction of it should be committed to the tribe of Judah; who engaging that of Simeon to their assistance, undertook the war: upon condition, that after a total extirpation of the Canaanites out of the former tribe, the other should see the same thing done in theirs too, according to that example.

CHAP. II.

Adonibezec defeated, and taken prisoner. Jerusalem besieg'd. Hebron taken. A dismal story of a Levite and his wife. A dreadful civil war.

THE Canaanites were at this time very strong; and waiting with a great army near the city of Bezec *, under the command of Adonibezec, that is to say, in Hebrew, Lord of Bezec, to give the Israelites battle. The thing they most depended upon for encouragement and hope of success, was the Israelites disappointment in the loss of their general; but the two aforesaid tribes, encountering them, after an obstinate dispute, kill'd ten thousand upon the spot, and had the chace of the rest. Their leader Adonibezec they took prisoner, and cut off his fingers and toes; wherein he acknowledged the just judgment of God upon him, having formerly served seventy two kings himself after the same manner. They carry'd him off alive, with these maims upon him, toward Jerusalem, where he dy'd, and there they bury'd him: the Israelites, advancing farther after this, ravaged the country; taking and destroying town after town, till in the end they laid siege to Jerusalem itself. They made themselves masters of the lower town, putting all they found in it to the sword; but for the city itself, that stood above, what with artificial fortifications, the strength of the walls, and the natural situation of the place, it was so strong, that they were forc'd to quit it, and remove to Hebron, which they enter'd by assault, and cut off all before them, without giving any quarter. There were found among the slain, divers bodies of the race of the giants, which for bulk, stature, and countenance, were so much differing from the ordinary appearance of other men, that the very people that saw them, could hardly believe them to be of human extraction; for they had quite another sort of voice and aspect; and there are some of their bones exposed for a kind of prodigy, even to this day. This town, being a place of consideration, was given to the Levites, with two thousand cubits of ground about it; the remaining part of the territory belonging to it was conferr'd on Caleb, according to the fore-appointment of Moses. Now this Caleb was one of the spies who had been formerly sent by Moses into Chanaan, to discover the land. There was a dividend given also to the sons of Jethro, the Madianite, Moses's father-in-law, who abandon'd their native country to join in the expedition, and to bear their part with the adventurers in all the difficulties and hazards of the war, and of the desart.

THESE two tribes took several of the Chananitish cities upon the mountains; and some others upon the plain also, near the sea, as Ascalon, and Azotus: but for Gaza and Acaron, which lay in the flat country, and were strong in chariots, which was a desperate way of fighting; these cities made good their defence, and scap'd better than many of their neighbours.

Several Chanaanitish cities taken; as Ascalon, Azotus, &c. Ver. 18.

THE two enterprizing tribes of Judah and Simeon, being now grown prodigiously rich by the spoil of the war, returned to their possessions, laid down their arms, and betook themselves to the arts and business of good husbandry and peace. The Benjamites, to whose lot Jerusalem fell, came to an agreement with the inhabitants, upon a composition, and so under the protection of tributaries, both sides thought themselves secure; the one from violence, and the other from sedition; and in this prospect of tranquility, they apply'd themselves to the cultivating of the land under their care. The same thing was also done by other tribes after the example of the Benjamites, contenting themselves upon the same conditions of taxes and tributes, to let the Chanaanites enjoy themselves in peace.

The tribes of Judah and Simeon betake themselves to the arts and business of peace. The Benjamites make the people of Jerusalem tributaries, Ver. 21.

Other tribes do the like. Ver. 22, &c.

THE tribe of Ephraim had been now a long while before Bethel, without making any great advance toward the taking of it, considering how much time and trouble the siege had cost them; for they made a very obstinate defence on the one side, and the work was as resolutely carry'd on by the other: but it so fell out at last, that a townsman of the place fell into the hands of the Ephraimites, as he was conveying provision into the city. They treated with him, and came in the end to an agreement upon oath on both sides; the citizen to let them secretly into the town, and the Ephraimites to save him, and his friends and relations upon their entering the city, which was performed on both parts; the Ephraimites being introduced, the citizen and his friends were preserv'd, but all the rest put to the sword; the Ephraimites now remaining masters of the city.

Bethel betray'd to the Israelites by a wile, Ver. 24, 25.

THE hearts of the Israelites began now to soften toward the people of Chanaan, and instead of extirpating them by the prosecution of a war, they bethought themselves rather how to make advantage of their labour, in planting and tillage, by the good husbandry of an industrious peace; but their hearts being set upon wealth and pleasure, they presently gave up themſelves to their luſts and appetites, without any regard at all to God's will and worſhip, or to the laws and diſcipline of their anceſtors. God, in his wrath, for theſe indignities gave them to underſtand by a prophet, that they had none of his commiſſion for the ſparing of the Chanaanites, and that it would not be long before they ſhould pay dear for that unſeaſonable mercy, by cruelties they ſhould ſuffer from the Chanaanites themſelves. They were ſtartled at this remonſtrance from Heaven, but not enough yet to advance a war upon it, Religion being the leaſt thing in their thought; and as to the matter of any military exploit, their luxury had quite unmann'd them; beſide, the great advantage they made of their tribute and labour, was an argument ſufficiently prevalent to reſtrain them from committing any act of hoſtilities againſt the Chanaanites.

The Iſraelites diſpenſe with God's order, Judg ii. 1--4.

THE form of government was depraved, the authority of the elders ſlighted, the choice of the ſenators, and other magiſtrates, nothing ſo regular as formerly; but every man for advancing his own private ends, without any regard to the good of the publick. In the courſe of this diſſolution of government and good manners, there happen'd an occaſion of a terrible ſedition, which ſoon after broke forth into a civil war, and the caſe was this:

A total diſſolution of government and good manners.

THERE was within the lot of Ephraim, a certain Levite, of an ordinary extraction, who married a wife of the city of Bethlem, belonging to the tribe of Judah. She was wonderfully beautiful; and the man had a paſſionate tenderneſs for her; but to his great affliction, ſhe made him little or no return of his kindneſs. This diſagreement begat daily diſputes, inſomuch, that the woman, under an impatience of theſe expoſtulations, went away from her husband in the fourth month after they were married, to her own parents. The husband, out of an ardent affection, follow'd her to her father's houſe, where he was received with all hoſpitality and reſpect, and by the mediation of her parents a reconciliation made betwixt them. When he had been there preciſely four days, he propoſed upon the fifth to be going home again; but friends were loth to part, and ſo they made it late before they ſet out: they went their way, however, he and his wife together, with only one ſervant, and an aſs for the woman to ride upon. When they had travelled a matter of thirty furlongs, and being then not far from Jeruſalem, the ſervants adviſed them to take up a lodging ſomewhere near hand, before it was too late, to avoid the danger of travelling in the night, eſpecially in an enemy's country; beſide that late hours are ſuſpicious, even among friends: but the husband had no mind to truſt himſelf among ſtrangers, and the city was at that time in the poſſeſſion of the Chanaanites; ſo that he choſe rather to venture twenty furlongs farther, where he might lodge among his friends and allies. Travelling forward to Gaba, a city belonging to the tribe of Benjamin, it was ſo late, that he was at a loſs for a lodging. It happen'd, however, that an ancient man of the tribe of Ephraim, coming juſt at that time out of the country to a houſe he had at Gabaa *, ſaw this man, and ask'd him what he was, and what made him abroad at ſo unſeaſonable an hour. He told him that he was a Levite, and carrying his wife home with him from her father's to his own houſe, in the lot of Ephraim. The old man, out of reſpect to tribe and conſanguinity, and likewiſe for the ſake of hoſpitality itſelf, took the Levite home with him. Some young men of the town taking notice, it ſeems, of the Levite's wife in the ſtreet, for a very beautiful woman, follow'd her to the houſe of this ancient man, knock'd at the door, and demanded the woman. The people of the houſe were not able to make any conſiderable oppoſition, but the old man ſpar'd for no importunities to perſuade them to moderation, and quietly to go their ways, without offering any violence or indignity to his gueſt. All the anſwer he could get, was this: Deliver up the woman, and you ſhall have no farther trouble. The other pleaded the relation of a kinſwoman, the wife of a Levite, and laid great ſtreſs upon the hideouſneſs of ſo brutal an outrage, under ſo many tender circumſtances, againſt all the laws of religion, honour, humanity, and common juſtice. But the gravity of theſe reaſonings and counſels ſerv'd only for matter of deriſion, with terrible threats in the concluſion, that if he did not immediately deliver up the woman, they would forthwith cut his throat. When the good man found himſelf brought to the laſt neceſſity, either of yielding, or compounding, he made them an offer of his own daughter in exchange for that ſtranger, as the leſs evil of the two; for this way he did but ſacrifice the reputation of a private family; whereas in violating the rights of hoſpitality, he ſhould have been guilty of an affront upon the publick faith of human ſociety. But ſupplications and arguments were to no manner of purpoſe with men ſo peremptorily reſolved upon that woman, and that no other ſhould content them. In this heat they took her away by force, to their own quarters, where they ſpent that whole night in all manner of beſtial liberties, and then ſent her back again next morning. She fell into ſuch a confuſion of thought upon her return, for what had befallen her that night, that betwixt ſhame and indignation it broke the very heart of her. As to her husband's part, he looked upon the wound to be utterly incurable, and had not the confidence ſo much as to look him in the face after it; but as ſhe came near him, ſhe fell down upon the ground and died. Her husband took it at firſt only for an oppreſſion of wearineſs for want of ſleep; or at the worſt, but for ſome fainting fit; and ſo he tried to awake her, and bring her to herſelf again, by telling her for her comfort, that this violence had not at all derogated from the dignity of her unſpotted innocence and virtue. But all this came too late; for the woman was dead, and the Levite behaved himſelf with a wonderful preſence and conſtancy of mind upon it, conſidering the quality of ſo mortal a ſurprize. He took up the body of his dead wife, laid it upon his aſs, and carried it directly home with him. Being come to his own houſe, he divided the body into twelve parts, to be diſtributed among the twelve tribes, ſending to each tribe one of them. The ſeveral bearers had their inſtructions tions to acquaint the tribes where they went, with the whole hiſtory of this villainy; the authors of it, and the barbarous circumſtances of the fact itſelf. They all agreed the wickedneſs to be ſo far beyond example, that the like was never ſeen or heard of before. The horror, in ſhort, of this action, tranſported them into ſuch a rage, that they immediately gather'd together in Siloe before the tabernacle, with a reſolution the firſt thing they did, to aſſault Gaba. The elders, upon this, put a little check to the firſt heat, by telling them, "That it would not do well, rathly and unadviſedly thus to make war upon their allies, without a ſtrict enquiry firſt into the merits of the cauſe; a thing, they ſaid, that the laws and practices of the Iſraelites would not allow, even toward ſtrangers, without ſome previous embaſſy, or treaty to bring the matter itſelf, if poſſible, to ſome reaſonable terms of ſatisfaction, or compoſition: Wherefore the beſt way would be, in purſuance of this legal method, to ſend to the Gibeonites to demand the criminals that committed this inſolence; who, in caſe they give them up, ought in their own perſons to bear the puniſhment due to their crimes; but if they refuſe, you are then at liberty to do yourſelves right by force of arms."

The Iſraelites demand the perſons of the criminals, Judg. xx. 13.

Upon this motion they ſent to the Gibeonites, to deliver up the profligate malefactors that had committed this brutal violence upon the Levite's wife, that juſtice might be done upon them. They demanded thoſe individual men, they ſaid, becauſe they would not involve the publick in a particular cauſe. Upon the reſult, the Gibeonites would not give up the raviſhers, nor did they think it honourable, for fear of a war, to ſubmit to rules of other people's preſcribing. They wanted neither courage, ſkill, nor numbers, they ſaid; the whole tribe declaring themſelves to be all of a-piece, and all of a mind, and reſolved to ſtand by one another to the laſt man in the cauſe of a common defence.

And march againſt them with four hundred thouſand fighting men, Judg. xx. 17.

The Iſraelites routed, and loſe twenty-two thouſand upon the place, Ver. 21.

The Iſraelites loſe eighteen thouſand more upon a ſecond battle, Ver. 25.

The Iſraelites reſented this report of this anſwer, that they preſently entered into an oath not to intermarry with the tribe of Benjamin, and to carry on a fiercer war againſt the Benjamites than ever their forefathers did againſt the Chanaanites. Upon this occaſion they took the field, with an army of four hundred thouſand fighting men. The ſtrength of the Benjamites was twenty five thouſand and ſix hundred, in which number there were five hundred left-handed ſlingers, who were all excellent markſmen. The two armies fought near Gaba, where the Iſraelites were routed by the Benjamites, with the loſs of two and twenty thouſand upon the place; and the ſlaughter had been much greater, if the night had not parted them; the Iſraelites returning to the body of their army in a confuſion, upon the ſenſe of this diſaſter, while the Benjamites went back again to the city in triumph. It came again to a ſecond battle the next day, when the Iſraelites loſt eighteen thouſand men more; and theſe two defeats ſtruck them with ſuch a terror, that they quitted their camp, and moved a little way off to Bethel, where they ſpent the next day in faſting and prayer, beſeeching Almighty God, by the mouth of Phinees the high-prieſt, that he would be pleaſed, after the judgment of two ſuch overthrows, to put a ſtop to the courſe of his high diſpleaſure, and grant them victory over their enemies.

The Iſraelites draw the Benjamites into an ambuſh, Ver. 31--33.

Their prayers being heard, and a favourable anſwer return'd to them by the ſame prophet, they divided their army into two bodies; one half they planted in certain ambuſhes about the city, while the other ſtood drawn up in readineſs to give the enemy battle. The Iſraelites, upon the firſt charge, gave way, not that they were not able to ſtand the ſhock, but, in truth, with a deſign to draw the Benjamites farther off from the town; ſo that the Iſraelites by little and little loſt ground; and ſtill as they retreated, the other, in proportion, preſſed ſo much the harder upon them; inſomuch, that the people of the town looked upon it as an abſolute defeat, and came trooping out, young and old, without any doubt of a victory, to take part of the ſpoil. When the Benjamites were gotten far enough from home, and within reach of the ambuſh, the Iſraelites faced about, rallied and charged, giving the ſignal at the ſame time to their companions, to fall upon the rear. This ſurprize put the Benjamites into ſo deſperate a ſtreight, that they were forced to retire into a bottom, where they were ſurrounded and kill'd with darts at a diſtance, like ſo many beaſts in a toil; only a ſelect body of ſix hundred reſolute men cut their way through the middle of the enemies troops, up to a mountain there at hand, where they poſted themſelves for the preſent, and ſo eſcaped. All the reſt periſhed, to the number of about five and twenty thouſand men. The Iſraelites, after this, burnt Gaba, ſparing neither men, women, nor male children; and they did the like too in ſeveral other of the Benjamite cities. Nay, to ſuch a degree did the rage they had conceived in this quarrel tranſport them, that they ſent twelve thouſand men againſt * Jabes, a city of Gilead, who took the town, and put all in it to the ſword, men, women, and children, ſave only four hundred virgins; and all this barely for refuſing to join with the Iſraelites againſt the Benjamites.

Five and twenty thouſand Benjamites cut off, Ver. 44--45.

Jabes taken, and all put to the ſword, except four hundred virgins, Judg. xxi. 10, 11, 12.

This was the bloody event of the reſentment and revenge that the Iſraelites executed upon the Benjamites for the abuſe of a woman, carried to a more outrageous height by the loſs they ſuſtained in the two firſt days engagements. But when they came in cold blood to reflect on the calamities they had brought upon their brethren the Benjamites, they, in ſome degree, repented of what they had done, that tribe being in a manner cut off from the main body. Upon the whole matter, they propoſed a faſt, but not as conſcious of having done an unjuſt thing in puniſhing the breach of the law. In this tenderneſs of thought they ſent commiſſioners to invite the ſix hundred men back again, who were fled into the mountains, where they found them upon a rock called Rhoa, in the deſart. Theſe miniſters condoled with them, not for their own miſery alone, but for that of their relations and friends, adviſing them to bear their lot like men, returning to their community, and as much as in them lay to prevent the utter extermination of that tribe, which would be the conſequence of withdrawing themſelves from the fellowſhip. Theſe commiſſioners told them withal, that for their lands and cattle, every thing ſhould be reſtored, and themſelves put in poſſeſſion as before. Theſe men could not but confeſs themſelves to have been in the wrong, and acknowledged the righteous judgment of God in what they had ſuffered, and ſo returned to their obedience, and to their tribe, upon this invitation.

THE next queſtion was, how to provide them wives, the Iſraelites having bound themſelves by an oath, before the war, not to marry any of their daughters into the tribe of Benjamin. Some would have the oath to be a nullity, as being made raſhly in a fit of paſſion, without any previous conſideration or judgment. Others were of opinion, that the very neceſſity diſcharged the oath, and that it would not be ſo pleaſing to God to hazard a whole tribe, as to diſpenſe with ſuch an obligation; alledging perjury, in caſes of extraordinary neceſſity, without malice prepenſe, to be no ſin; but the elders would not endure any thought of perjury, under what cover or countenance ſoever: they had provided wives already for four hundred of the ſix, out of the virgins that were taken at Jabes; and for the remaining two hundred, one of the ſenators offered this expedient for the doing of the buſineſs, without ſtraining an oath.

The four hundred virgins given in marriage to four hundred Benjamites, Judg. xxi. 14.

"HERE is, ſays he, a cuſtomary ſolemnity "of a publick feſtival that is celebrated thrice "a year in Siloe, and our wives and daugh- "ters are commonly part of the company. "Leave the Benjamites upon this occaſion at "liberty to ſeize, and take to wife as many "of the virgins as they can catch, without "your interpoſing your authority, either for "or againſt it. If the fathers ſhall complain, "and appeal for juſtice, the anſwer will be "ſhort, that they ſhould have took more care "of their daughters, and that the Iſraelites "ought not to proſecute their reſentment "againſt their brethren the Benjamites any "farther, having taken too ſevere a revenge "on them already." Upon this motion it was agreed, that the Benjamites ſhould be connived at, in providing themſelves of wives after this manner by force. The ſolemnity being now at hand, the two hundred men that wanted wives, planted themſelves about the town in vineyards, and corners out of ſight, by two and three, and ſuch numbers as they thought fit, to watch for the coming of the virgins. As the virgins came ſporting along, not appris'd of any deſign againſt them, the Benjamites took their opportunity, and ſallied out amongſt them; every man ſeizing one for his wife, and carrying her off to his own inheritance, where they made it their buſineſs, by induſtry and good husbandry, to eſtabliſh themſelves happily in the world yet once again. By this means, and by the prudence of the Iſraelites, was the tribe of Benjamin recovered out of a hopeleſs condition, and came ſoon after into a flouriſhing eſtate, both for wealth, people, and power.

Ver. 23.

THIS was the end of the war with the Benjamites; nor were the affairs of the children of Dan in a much better poſture. The Iſraelites being now quite gone over from the ſtudy and practice of arms, to the rural employments of tillage and agriculture, the Chanaanites made advantage of this degenerate change of humour, and in contempt of the people entered into a formed confederacy againſt them; not that they were apprehenſive of any danger from them, or hurt they could do them at preſent, but in hopes of reducing them ſo low, that they ſhould never be able to give them any farther trouble for the time to come. They made mighty levies of men, and proviſions of chariots; trained up their people to martial diſcipline; beſides that, they had already drawn over to them, Aſcaloe and Accaron, from the tribe of Judah, and ſeveral cities of the plains; inſomuch, that the Danites were forced up to the mountains for ſanctuary, and not one foot of ground in the campaign that they could call their own. Their circumſtances, briefly, were ſuch, that they were neither ſtrong enough to do themſelves right by war, nor had they land enough for their people to ſubſiſt upon in a ſtate of peace; wherefore they ſent five of their people into the inland countries to find out ſome commodious place of reſidence, where they might plant and ſettle. When theſe commiſſioners had travelled a matter of a day's journey from the great plain of Sidon, and were advanced as far as Mount Libanus, and the head of the leſſer Jordan, they found themſelves in a fruitful and well-conditioned country, and gave their tribe an account of their opinion of the place, who forthwith march'd with their army directly thither; building a city there, by the name of Dan, ſo called from one of the ſons of Jacob of that name, from whence the whole tribe alſo had its appellation.

The Danites forced for ſanctuary to the mountains.

THE Iſraelites were at this time ſo abandoned to ſloth and luxury, and ſo unconcerned about religion and buſineſs, that all their affairs went to wreck upon it; the government looſe, and out of frame; men lived without any reſtraint either of ſhame or of law; the corruptions of the Chanaanites, like a ſtrong inundation, overwhelming them every where without controul.

Chuſarth ſubdues the Iſraelites, and keeps them eight years in ſubjection.

THIS general defection was ſo provoking in the ſight of God, that the Iſraelites, being left to themſelves by a total diſſolution of piety, diſcipline, and good manners, put a ſhort end to all the hopes and pretences of happineſs, that with much toil and induſtry they had been ſo long a raiſing. While they were in this abandon'd ſtate of looſeneſs and debauchery, Chuſarth *, the king of the Aſſyrians made war upon them; kill'd them a great many men in battle, ſeiz'd their towns, ſome by force, others by treaty, and laid heavy taxes upon the people; plaguing them, in fine, with all kinds of indignities whatſoever. This was the wretched ſtate they were in for eight years; after which time they were deliver'd out of the hands of their oppreſſors after the following manner.

Kenaz, a great man of the tribe of Judah. Othniel the ſon of Kenaz, Judg. iii. 9.

THERE was one Kenaz, of the tribe of Judah; a man of ſenſe, buſineſs, and courage. This perſon being animated by a ſecret impulſe from heaven to make ſome bold and generous attempt, for the relief of the Hebrews in this extremity of their diſtreſs, communicated the privacy to ſome few of his particular friends, whom he knew to be men of honour and reſolution, and diſſatisfied with the preſent ſtate of things. Upon concerting the matter they came to this concluſion, that the firſt thing to be done toward the eaſing of the Hebrews, muſt be the ſurprizal of the king's guards, and putting the garriſon to the ſword. This was agreed upon, and accordingly executed: and the ſucceſs of this exploit gave ſuch a reputation, and brought ſo many over to his intereſt and party, that in a ſhort time he gave the Aſſyrians a fair battle; routed, and beat them over the Euphrates, and conſequently ſet the people at liberty; who in acknowledgment of the obligation they had to Kenaz for their deliverance, by the means of his bravery and conduct, made him a preſent of the government, which he accepted of, and when he had ruled them forty years in the quality of a judge, he ended his life in the ſame ſtation.

The Iſraelites oppreſs'd by Eglon, and deliver'd by Ehud.

BY the death of Kenaz, the Iſraelites were left once again without a head; and then as they fell more and more off from their duty to God, and the laws, they were ſtill more and more expoſed to freſh and greater afflictions. Their converſation was ſuch, that Eglon himſelf, the king of the Moabites, had them in contempt for their want even of policy and order, and this very conſideration encourag'd him to make war upon them. In one word, he worſted them upon ſeveral encounters, and humbled them to that degree, that he made them his tributaries: after which, he remov'd his court to Jericho, and for eighteen years ſucceſſively omitted nothing of rigour or oppreſſion that might make the people miſerable, even to the degree almoſt of ſtarving them. But it pleaſed God at laſt, in compaſſion to their ſufferings, and in mercy to their prayers, to deliver them from the tyranny of the Moabites, by this means:

Eglon worſts the Iſraelites in ſeveral encounters, and makes them his tributaries, Ver. 14.

THERE was a certain young man that dwelt at Jericho; the ſon of Gera, of the tribe of Benjamin, and his name Jodes *. He was a vigorous and a daring man, of a robuſt force of body, and had both hands at command, if not the left the better of the two. He was of a make, in fine, for any bold and hazardous undertaking. This Jodes order'd the matter ſo as to make himſelf familiarly known to Eglon, by the means of preſents, and other court-offices; inſomuch that his particular favour with the king had made him a great many friends at court. Being one day to make the king a preſent, he came attended with two ſervants, having girded a ſhort poniard upon his right thigh, which he concealed under his clothes, out of ſight; and in this manner of addreſs he was admitted to the king. This was in the heat of the ſummer, and the middle of the day; none of the guards ſtirring, and moſt people being retir'd to dinner. When this young man had made his preſent, the king being withdrawn into a cool place of refreſhment, Jodes ſignify'd to him that he had ſomething of importance that required privacy to communicate to him; whereupon the king ſent away his ſervants out of the preſence, being himſelf ſeated upon his throne. Jodes was all this while in pain, for fear of miſſing his aim when he came to do the execution. So that to give the king occaſion to riſe, that he might have the fairer opportunity to diſpatch him, he told him that he had ſomewhat to ſay to him from God Almighty, about a certain dream of his. The king had a kind of impatient curioſity upon him, to hear what it was, and ſo ſtanding up to hearken to it, Jodes in that very inſtant plung'd a dagger into his heart, and forthwith went his way, ſhutting the doors after him, and leaving the dagger in the wound. The king's ſervants were ſtill and ſilent all this while, for fear of waking the king, who they ſuppoſed might be aſleep.

Jodes a Benjamite, curries favour with Eglon king of the Moabites, Ver. 17.

Jodes ſtabs Eglon, V. 21.

JODES upon this, immediately gave private intelligence to the inhabitants of Jericho, that he had kill'd the king, in order to the ſetting of the people at liberty. The news was ſo welcome to them, that they ſent their trumpets immediately upon it all over the whole country; this being their way of calling the people together. It was a long time before the king's ſervants diſcover'd the matter; but toward evening ſome of them apprehending ſome accident more than ordinary, enter'd the ſummer-parlour, and there lay the king dead, which was ſo ſurprizing a ſpectacle, that it ſtruck them all dumb and ſenſeleſs. The guards were preſently ſent for; but the Iſraelites, in great bodies broke in upon the palace, before they could be drawn together. Some they kill'd in the firſt heat; others, to the number of ten thouſand, made away to the river, toward the country of Moab; but the Iſraelites having prepoſſeſſed themſelves of all the fords and paſſes, intercepted them in their flight; ſo that they were wholly cut off, without ſo much as one man of them getting over. By this means the Hebrews ſhook off the yoke of the Moabites; and Jodes, for an acknowledgment, had the honour of the government conferr'd upon him by the people; in which office, at the end of eighty years adminiſtration, he died. He was a perſon, that over and above the merit of this generous exploit, deſerv'd upon ſeveral other accounts to have his name and memory celebrated to poſterity. The Iſraelites paſs from one ſlavery to another, and are deliver'd in the concluſion by Deborah and Barak.

The Iſraelites harden'd in their iniquities, Judg. iv. 1.

THE Iſraelites, notwithſtanding the calamities they had ſuffered, were not thereby reclaim'd, but continuing in the evil of their ways, added iniquity to iniquity, intirely forſaking the worſhip of God, and altogether acting in diſobedience to his laws and commandments; inſomuch, that before they were well quit of one ſlavery, they fell into another; as upon this revolution they only exchang'd the tyranny of Eglon, the king of the Moabites, for that of Jabin, king of the Chanaanites, who was their next maſter. This Jabin kept his court at Azor, upon the lake Samachonitis, having an army in pay of * three hundred thouſand foot, ten thouſand horſe, and three thouſand chariots †, under the command of Siſera, a great favourite of the king's, for the ſervices he had done in reducing the Iſraelites, whom he worſted upon ſeveral encounters from time to time, and would never give over the purſuit, till he brought them at laſt to be abſolute ſlaves and tributaries to his maſter. When they had languiſhed out a matter of twenty years in this ſcandalous ſervitude, without daring ſo much as to open their mouths againſt their oppreſſors, (God in his providence having thought fit to continue theſe judgments upon them for their impiety and ingratitude,) they came at laſt to ſome ſort of repentance, and to a conviction, that theſe miſeries had befallen them as a juſt puniſhment for their contempt of the laws of their forefathers. Under this ſenſe of their condition, they went to a famous propheteſs called Deborah, (in Hebrew a bee,) deſiring her interceſſion on their behalf, that God would be pleaſed in mercy to forgive them, and reſcue them out of the hands of their cruel Chanaanitiſh perſecutors. At her mediation, God was prevailed upon to promiſe them a deliverance, and made choice of Barak, of the tribe of Nephthali, for the inſtrument, as general of the army, to work their deliverance. So Deborah ſent for Barak, (which word in Hebrew ſignifies lightening,) and order'd him to march directly toward the enemy, with a body of ten thouſand choice men, that number, though ſmall, being ſufficient, ſo long as providence had undertaken for the ſucceſs. Barak expoſtulated the matter with Deborah, flatly refuſing to meddle with the command, unleſs ſhe herſelf would go along with him. To which Deborah replying with ſome heat and reſentment, ſaid, "And are not you a doughty captain now, to transfer the honour of a command to a woman, when God has given it to yourſelf! But however, ſays ſhe, I ſhall not decline the office." So they drew out their number, and pitched their tents upon Mount Tabor, Siſera, by the king's order, marching out to meet them. The two armies lay encamped one within ſight of another; but the Iſraelites were ſtruck with ſuch a terror at the infinite odds of the enemy in number, that both general and ſoldiers were once upon the very point of retreating, without ſo much as ſtriking a blow; but upon Deborah's aſſurance that it was the cauſe of God, and that he himſelf would aſſiſt and bring them off, they were prevail'd upon to ſtand the ſhock of a battle. The armies were no ſooner engag'd, but there aroſe a violent wind, with a moſt impetuous tempeſt of rain and hail along with it ‖. This ſtorm driving juſt in the face of the Chanaanites, made their bows and their ſlings uſeleſs to them, and ſo for other weapons for a cloſe fight; for they could not ſo much as open their eyes againſt the weather, and their fingers were ſo benumb'd with cold too, that they could not handle their ſwords. Now the Iſraelites, with this tempeſt at their backs, had all advantages on the one hand, without the inconveniencies on the other; beſide the encouragements given them by ſo ſignal a manifeſtation of God's eſpouſing their cauſe. It came to this in the concluſion, that the Chanaanites army was broken, diſpers'd, and cut to pieces; ſo that betwixt thoſe that fell by the ſword, thoſe that were trampled to death under the horſes feet, thoſe that were torn to pieces by the chariots, and thoſe that fled away, and fell into the hands of the Iſraelites in their flight, this prodigious army was in effect totally deſtroy'd. Siſera finding the day irrecoverably loſt, and his men flying every where before the enemy, he leap'd from his chariot, and betook himſelf to the houſe of one Jael a Kenite, for ſanctuary; who receiv'd him with a countenance of readineſs to do him a good office. Siſera was quite ſpent with the toil and fatigue of the day, and calling for ſomewhat to drink, Jael brought him a draught of ſour milk, which he drank very heartily, and ſo fell aſleep. When Jael found that ſhe had him faſt and ſure, ſhe took a hammer, with an iron nail, and drove it into his temples, ſhewing him for a ſpectacle to the Iſraelites that came to look after him, where ſhe had pinn'd him to the ground. This made good Deborah's preſage, when ſhe told Barak that a woman ſhould have the honour of a title to the victory. Barak after this march'd with the army toward Azor, where he encounter'd Jabin by the way, and ſlew him. The king being kill'd, Barak laid the city level with the ground, and afterward govern'd Iſrael for a matter of forty years.

DEBORAH and Barak died much about a time, and it was not long after, when the Madianites enter'd into an aſſociation with the Amalekites and the Arabians againſt the Iſraelites; marched with an army againſt them, fought, and overcame them, deſtroying the fruits of the ground, and carrying away their cattle, with a great booty. harraſs'd them for full ſeven years together, forcing them from the plains to the mountains for refuge, where they digg'd themſelves vaults and caves, partly for the ſecurity of their perſons, and partly for the concealment of what ſtores and proviſions they were able to ſave from the hands of the enemy. Now the Madianites were well enough content to let the Iſraelites till the ground in the winter, when they themſelves were ſure to reap the fruits of their labours in the following ſummer. By theſe means the Iſraelites were reduced to the utmoſt penury, and no hope of relief left them in this their ſtarving extremity, but prayers and ſupplications to God Almighty, which were ſtill their laſt refuge.

Ver. 1. IT happen'd one time, that as Gideon the ſon of Joſus, * and a principal man in the tribe of Manaſſes, was threſhing a little corn by ſtealth, at a wine-preſs, which he durſt not venture to do in a publick place, for fear of diſcovery, there appeared a viſion to him in the figure of a young man, who greeted him as a happy perſon, and exceedingly in God's favour. "One would hardly think ſo, ſays "Gideon, of a man under my circumſtances, "that is oblig'd to make a preſs to do the office "of a ſlave." The apparition bad him have a good heart, and immediately ſet his thoughts to work how he might deliver his country. "Alas, ſays Gideon, it is impoſſible for me to "do any thing towards it; our tribe is the "leaſt of any, and not able to furniſh a ſuf-"ficient number of men for ſuch an attempt; "beſides I am but a young man, and not of "practice and experience enough to manage "ſuch a deſign." The apparition made him anſwer, "That whatever he fell ſhort in, "God would ſupply; and that if he would "but frankly take upon him the command of "a body of men, the Iſraelites ſhould gain a "victory under his conduct." Gideon communicated this affair, with all the circumſtances, to ſome young men of his acquaintance, who aſcribed ſo much to the authority and credit of this revelation, that they had preſently an army of ten thouſand choice men in readineſs to run any hazard for the common cauſe.

WHILE this was in agitation, the voice of God ſpoke to Gideon again in a dream, in words to this effect: "It is but natural for "fleſh and blood to overween, and for men "to value themſelves, upon the providential "operations of an Almighty power, as the "effects of their own force and wiſdom, "eſpecially when the work may ſeem to be "brought about purely by the mediation of "common cauſes. But to ſhew you now, ſays "the voice, that victory is influenced from "above, and that the arm of fleſh is not able "to do any thing without a divine aſſiſtance, "take your army to the river Jordan, in the "parching heat of the ſun at mid-day, and "make your obſervations upon the manner of "the ſoldiers drinking. Thoſe who lie down "upon the bank, and compoſe themſelves to "drink at leiſure, you may depend upon to "be for your purpoſe, and men of courage; "but for them who ſcoop up the water in their "hands, and drink in a hurry, they have the "fear of an enemy in their hearts, and there's "no truſting to them." Gideon did as he was order'd, and found but bare three hundred of the former ſort in the whole army, who drank out of the hollow of their hands †, without ſtaring about them. With this ſmall detachment of three hundred men, God commanded Gideon to attack the enemy in the night; to which end he poſted himſelf upon the ſide of the river, the day before the exploit was to be put in execution, and not without great apprehenſions what might be the iſſue of that enterprize. The voice, upon this diffidence, bad him take a ſoldier with him, and ſteal over that night to the camp of the Madianites, where he ſhould learn ſomewhat that ſhould put him in heart again. He went as he was bid, and taking a ſoldier along with him, they ſtole ſoftly to one of the enemy's tents, (where they were yet waking,) and there over-heard a ſoldier telling his comrade of a ſtrange dream he had. "Methought, ſays he, "I ſaw a barley loaf, (the coarſeſt of all "grains, and not fit for a man to eat,) come "tumbling into the camp, where it over-ran "all the tents that ſtood in the way; the "king's tent in the firſt place, and ſo the reſt "indifferently one after another." "Well, "ſays this dreamer's fellow-ſoldier, and what "can this overturning of all the tents ſignify, "but the total deſtruction of our army? Bar-"ley is, as you ſay, the coarſeſt of grains; "and ſo are the Iſraelites the vileſt and the "moſt abject of all the people in Aſia. Gideon "is now at the head of an army againſt us, "and I am afraid that the barley loaf over-"throwing our tents, prognoſticates Gideon's "overrunning us with his Iſraelitiſh army." Upon the good omen of this dream, Gideon returned preſently to his people, full of hope and comfort at the preſage; and his men were no leſs animated upon the hearing of it; for they put themſelves immediately in readineſs for the word of command, toward any hazardous adventure whatſoever.

The enemy had ſuch a multitude of camels, and ſo many ſeveral nations in their diſtinct lodgments, that the camp muſt needs take up a huge content of ground, but ſtill one common line incloſing the whole. Upon the Hebrews approach toward the enemy, it was given them in command, that upon the ſignal of ſounding trumpets, and breaking pitchers, they ſhould make a ſally with ſhouts, and their lamps in their hands, as to an aſſured victory, by the bleſſing of God upon Gideon ‡. this ſtratagem the enemy were ſtruck with ſo judicial a conſternation, betwixt ſleeping and waking, (the horror of the night affrighting the imagination too) that being in the dark, in a medley of ſeveral languages, and under a terror that knows no difference betwixt friend and foe, they fell foul in the confuſion, upon one another; every man taking him who was next him for an enemy. There was, in fine, a prodigious ſlaughter; but the greateſt execution incomparably was done by them one upon another.

The Iſraelites put all to the ſword, Oreb and Zeb among the reſt, Ver. 25.

So ſoon as the fame of this notable defeat came to the ears of the reſt of the Iſraelites, they preſently ſent out armed troops to all the difficult paſſes upon the mountains, rivers, and torrents, to obſtruct and cut off their retreat, putting all to the ſword they could lay hand on, and two kings, Oreb and Zeb, among the reſt. But for the remainder, to the number of ſome eighteen thouſand men, that had made a ſhift to get off in a body under the command of their proper officers, thoſe troops poſted themſelves as far from the Iſraelites camp as they could. Gideon's troops had been extremely harraſs'd in the late action, but this did not yet hinder him from preſſing this party of the enemy upon the rear, and engaging them ſoon after with his whole army. In this encounter, he put them to an abſolute rout, deſtroying the whole body of them to a man, and taking their two leaders, the princes, Zebin † and Hezarbon, priſoners. There were ſlain of the Madianites and their aſſociates, in theſe encounters, near one hundred and twenty thouſand men; to ſay nothing of the booty in gold, ſilver, rich ſtuffs, camels, aſſes, &c. that fell to the Hebrews. When Gideon came afterward into his own native country of Ephraim, he put to death the two kings of the Madianites above mentioned: but the tribe of Ephraim, out of an envy to the glory of his atchievements, had a great mind to pick a quarrel with him for engaging in a publick act of hoſtility, being a member of that tribe, without their privity and conſent: inſomuch that they were juſt upon the point of making war upon him. But Gideon, who being a man of modeſty and prudence, as well as bravery, diverted the ſtorm by telling them that this was God's war, and not Gideon's; for what he did he was commanded to do, and that the honour of the victory was theirs ſtill, though the labouring part of the action fell by providence to his lot. The ſoftneſs and diſcretion of theſe words was more worth to the Hebrews than the defeat; for it prevented the great miſchief of a civil war, which was then ready to break out. But this invidious ſpiteful cavil coſt them dear in the concluſion, as we ſhall ſee hereafter in its proper place.

WHEN Gideon had ſet his country at liberty, he would fain have diſcharged himſelf of his commiſſion; but the people were ſo unanimouſly reſolved not to part with him, that he was forced to continue it; which he did for the ſpace of forty years, exerciſing all the parts of a careful ruler over them, in preſcribing laws, adminiſtring juſtice, deciding controverſies, and doing right betwixt man and man; acquitting himſelf upon the whole, with the character of this reputation, that no man ever complained of, or appealed from his ſentence. The tyranny and death of Abimelech. Iſrael enſlaved by the Ammonites and Philiſtines. Jephtha ſets them free; overthrows the Ephraimites; and after the death of Jothan, Aſpan, Elon, and Abdon, govern Iſrael.

GIDEON had ſeventy legitimate ſons by ſeveral wives; and by Druma, his concubine, one natural ſon, whoſe name was Abimelech. This Abimelech, after the death of his father, went to Sichem, to the relations of his mother, who was born there. They ſupplied him with money; and Abimelech finding them to be men for his turn, and lewd and deſperate enough to adventure upon any thing, let it be never ſo hazardous or wicked, he ſtraight returned to his father's houſe, taking a cabal of theſe profligate wretches along with him. His firſt exploit there was to murder all his brothers, ſave only Jothan *, who ſlipt out of the way, ſo that they could not find him. When Abimelech had once by this means poſſeſſed himſelf of the government, he knew no other law than that of his own will and pleaſure, profeſſing an open enmity to juſtice itſelf, and all its abettors; neither was he himſelf leſs hateful to all good men than they were to him.

IT happened one time, upon a great day of ſolemnity in Sichem, and a vaſt number of people gathered together there, that Jothan, (who had made an eſcape, as we ſaid,) upon this feſtival, was got up to the top of the mountain Garizim which overlooks Sichem: and thence called out aloud to the multitude, deſiring only their patience for a few words he had to ſay. They put themſelves preſently into a poſture of attention; and the ſpeech was to this effect.

Jothan upon a feſtival gets up to the top of the mountain Garizim, and thence ſpeaks to the people, Ver. 7--20.

"THERE was a time (ſays he) when the "trees had their meetings and conferences, "and talked after the manner of men. In thoſe "days, and in a great council, upon the ſubject of who ſhould command, the major "part of the plants made their addreſs to the "fig-tree, to take care of the government; "but the fig-tree modeſtly declined the ho"nour, as being amply ſatisfied with the eſ"teem it had in the world for the fruit it bore, "ſaying alſo, that it had no ambition to be "greater, or other than it was. The trees, "after this refuſal, made the ſame requeſt to "the olive-tree, and to the vine, and they "both agreed in returning the very ſame an"ſwer. They went next to the bramble, be"ing an excellent ſort of fuel, with the ſame "propoſals. Well, ſays the bramble, if you "are in earneſt, I'll take the government up"on me; but then you muſt reſolve to reſt "quietly under my ſhadow: for if you offer "to be unruly, there ſhall come a fire out of "me that ſhall deſtroy you". This is no tale told, ſays Jothan, to make you merry, but to move you to bethink yourſelves what you are now a doing; that after ſo many ſacred obligations to Gideon, can yet ſuffer Abimelech, the murderer of the children of your deliverer, to uſurp, and reign over you. This Abimelech is the very fire in the fable I have told you.

UPON theſe words he withdrew, and was forced, for three years after, to live concealed in the mountains, and keep out of the way of Abimelech's rage and revenge. The Sichemites came, however, in a ſhort time to be ſenſible of the wickedneſs of that horrid barbarity upon the ſons of Gideon, and ſo forced Abimelech out of the city and tribe; who, upon this indignity, ſet his wits at work how to be revenged on them.

Abimelech driven out of Sichem, Judg. ix. 23.

THE ſeaſon of the vintage was now at hand, and the people durſt not venture out of town to gather the grapes, for fear of ſome ſurprize or miſchief from Abimelech. There happened to come to Sichem, juſt at that time, a certain prince of the country, whoſe name was Gales, * with a band of ſoldiers, and ſeveral of his relations. The townſ-men petitioned him for a guard, only to ſecure them during the time of the vintage, and he allowed it them. They entered upon the work, and brought off their grapes at firſt ſecurely enough, and without interruption, inveighing againſt Abimelech, in the liberty of their cups, with all the bitterneſs that could be thought of; and cutting off ſeveral of his men that fell into their ambuſhes. While matters were in this ſtate, Zebel, † one of the chief of the Sichemites, and Abimelech's hoſt, gave him intelligence by an expreſs, how buſy Gales was to irritate the people againſt him; but, ſays he, if you can but diſpoſe of an ambuſh, in ſome convenient place near the city, I will undertake to put Gales into your power to requite him as he deſerves: Beſide, that when all this is done, I will become anſwerable to ſettle a fair underſtanding betwixt you and the people. Abimelech followed Zebel's advice, and planted his ambuſh; Gales unwarily ſtaying longer in the ſuburbs with Zebel than he ſhould have done, ſome of Abimelech's troops being by this time within ſight of the town, Gales called out to Zebel, that the enemy was there upon their march. No, no, ſays Zebel, that's only the ſhadow of the mountains. "Well, but I tell "you again (ſays Gales) upon their coming "nearer, that they are bands of men and not "ſhadows." Nay, ſays Zebel again, and if it be as you ſay, how comes it that you, who will have Abimelech to be a coward, do not now prove yourſelf to be the braver man of the two, and go out and fight him? Gales preſently advanced toward the enemy (though in ſome little diſorder) and receiv'd the firſt ſhock: But finding himſelf too weak, and having loſt ſeveral of his men, he fled into the town. Zebel laid hold of this occaſion to calumniate Gales with cowardice, and ſo got him expelled the city. Abimelech, in the mean time, being informed from very good hands, that the Sichemites would come out again to gather the remainder of their vintage, hid ſeveral ambuſcades ready to ſurprize them. And accordingly, upon their firſt coming out, he ſent a third part of his army to take poſſeſſion of the city gates, and by that means, to cut off the retreat of thoſe that were come out of the town; who were ſo hard preſſed, and ſcattered up and down, that there was a very great ſlaughter made upon the purſuit; the city itſelf, in this interim, being taken upon the firſt aſſault, levelled with the earth, and finally ſowed with ſalt, as the laſt inſult of a triumphing enemy. This was the end of this miſerable place and people. There were yet remaining conſiderable numbers of ſtragglers and fugitives, that had hitherto eſcaped the edge of the ſword, and theſe having gathered themſelves into a body fled to a rock for ſanctuary. The place was naturally ſtrong, beſide that they ordered the running up of a wall about it, to make it impregnable. This they deſigned for a retreat of refuge; but Abimelech, appriz'd of their deſign, came upon them with his army before they could fortify it, and ſurrounding it with a mighty pile of dry wood and faggots, ſet fire to it; ſo that men, women, and children were all burnt to aſhes, without ſo much as one individual perſon eſcaping. The calamitous fate of this wretched people would have deſerved compaſſion, if it had not been a juſt judgment upon them for their inhuman ingratitude to a perſon who had deſerved ſo well at their hands.

THIS cruelty of Abimelech to the Sichemites was ſo far inſtructive and exemplary to the Iſraelites, as to ſhew them what they were to truſt to, if ever it ſhould be their lot to fall into the ſame hands: the uſurper being reſolved never to be quiet till he ſhould have brought all to a thorough devaſtation.

IT was not long after this, when he marched with his army againſt Thebes, ‖ where he took the out-town by aſſault, but the garriſon made their retreat into a ſtrong caſtle belonging to it; Abimelech puſhing the attack up to the very gates, with a reſolution either to force or put fire to it. As he was gotten juſt under the wall, a woman from above dropt a heavy piece of a mill-ſtone upon his head, which ſtruck him to the ground. Upon coming a little to his ſenſes, and finding that the wound was mortal, he called for his armour-bearer, and bad him kill him immediately, that it might not be ſaid Abimelech fell by the hand of a woman. The officer did according to his order; ſo that Abimelech paid dear for his inhuman outrages againſt his brothers and the Sichemites, as Jothan had foretold he ſhould. Upon Abimelech's death, the army diſbanded, and returned every man to his own home.

THE government of Iſrael, after this, fell to Jair, a Gileadite, of the tribe of Manaſſes; a man every way happy, but moſt of all in the bleſſing of a numerous and a virtuous iſſue. He was the father of thirty ſons, men of courage and reſolution every one of them, and of eminent authority and reputation in their country. He held the government two and twenty years, died in a good old age, and his body was interred at Camon, a city in Gilead.

The government comes to Jair a Gileadite, Judg. x. 3.

THE Hebrews were by this time exceedingly degenerated in their manners and religion; for they had neither moral honeſty, nor a ſenſe of civil obedience, religion, law, or common juſtice left them. The Ammonites and the Philiſtines having them in contempt upon this account, made ſuch advantage of their weakneſs, that they broke into their country with a vaſt army, and laid it waſte: And not contenting themſelves to ſpoil, harraſs, and take poſſeſſion of all beyond Jordan, they were preparing alſo to croſs the river, and make a thorough conqueſt of it on both ſides.

Affliction brings the Iſraelites to a ſenſe of their duty, Judg. x. 15.

THESE afflictions brought the Iſraelites to their prayers and ſacrifices again; which they ſtill made uſe of as the laſt reſort they had, upon all their miſdoings. By theſe ſupplications, and penitent addreſſes, God was, however, prevailed upon for a grant and promiſe of mercy and relief. The Ammonites being now entered with an army into the country of Gilead, the inhabitants put themſelves in arms with a reſolution to oppoſe them: but wanting a head, there was one Jephtha propoſed; a perſon in high eſteem with the people for conduct and valour, both upon his father's account and his own; for he had at that time a conſiderable army of his own which he kept in pay. Upon theſe conſiderations, they applied themſelves to him by conſent, with the preſent ſtate of their caſe, and an humble deſire that he would be pleaſed to join forces with them, and accept of a commiſſion from them, as general for life of the whole army. Jephtha refuſed at firſt, not without ſome admiration, that they ſhould apply to him for help now when they themſelves were in diſtreſs, who had formerly deny'd their aſſiſtance to him when he ſtood in need of them; and was to their knowledge ſo palpably wronged by his brothers. "I was, ſays he, the ſon of a "ſtrange woman, you told me, who came in- "to the family you knew not how, and you "would have nothing to do with me. Upon "this pretence was I driven out from among "you, and forced into the land of Gilead, "where I have continued ever ſince, liſting all "people who voluntarily offered themſelves "to my ſervice." The Iſraelites would not take this for an anſwer; but continued to preſs him with further importunities and intreaties, till at laſt he was wrought upon to eſpouſe their cauſe, and to take charge of the army, upon their oaths of fidelity to him as their general.

UPON this agreement, the two bodies were immediately incorporated; and ſo ſoon as ever Jephtha had given the neceſſary orders for what was firſt to be done, he marched away with the army to Mizpeh: and from thence ſent an expoſtulatory embaſſy to the king of the Ammonites; taxing him with an unjuſt invaſion of a country where he had nothing to do. The anſwer was only a retort of the ſame charge upon the Iſraelites, who being no more than fugitives out of Egypt, took poſſeſſion by arms of the land and territories of other people; and therefore warned them to depart out of the country of the Ammonites, as belonging to them in the right of their fathers. Jephtha on the other hand replied, that inſtead of charging the Iſraelites with taking away Amorrhæa from them, they ſhould rather have acknowledged the obligation of giving them Ammon; and Moſes might have had that too: but the laſt reſult was this; that as for the lands which they had been now three hundred years poſſeſſed of, they would not part with them, but by God's aſſiſtance defend them with their ſwords. This peremptory declaration put a ſhort end to the treaty, and the embaſſadors were diſmiſſed.

The king recriminates, Ver. 13.

THE matter being brought to this point, that the controverſy was to be decided by arms, Jephtha made a vow, that if ever he returned alive and victorious from the battle, he would offer up to God in ſacrifice the firſt living creature he ſhould meet with after he came home again. Shortly after this he came to an engagement with the enemy, gave them a total overthrow, and had the chace of them to the city of Maniath; forcing his paſſage alſo into the country of Ammon; where he laid ſeveral cities waſte, and gave the ſoldiers the ſpoil. This action, in fine, ſet the people at liberty, after a ſlaviſh ſervitude of eighteen years continuance.

Jephtha's raſh vow, Ver. 30.

Jephtha overthrows the Ammonites, V. 33.

JEPHTHA acquitted himſelf in this war with great honour; but upon returning home again, there happened to him ſo grievous a calamity in his own family, that it took off the reliſh of all his publick ſatisfactions. For the firſt living creature he ſet his eye upon was an only virgin daughter he had, juſt coming out of the door, big with joy to receive, and bid him welcome. This encounter ſtruck him to the very heart, and exceedingly troubled he was at her officiouſneſs to come out to meet him, telling her the ſtory of the vow, by which he had oblig'd himſelf, upon ſuch terms, to offer her to God for a ſacrifice. She was not at all dejected at the tidings, but told her father with a generous conſtancy, "That ſhe ſhould "never think much to part with her life up- "on the condition of ſecuring her father's ho- "nour and ſucceſs, and the liberty of her "country; only ſhe begg'd two months time "firſt, for a parting lamentation with her com- "panions, and after that he might be pleaſed "to perform his vow." Her requeſt was granted, and at the end of the two months, this innocent devotee was offered up for a burnt-offering, without any reverence, either to religion, law, or common fame; ſo far was Jephtha tranſported with a blind zeal into a contempt of all other conſiderations. †

AFTER

† The ſcripture no where, in expreſs words, condemns this act of Jephtha's ſacrificing his daughter, as contrary to the laws of his country, or diſpleaſing to God; for which reaſon a great many chriſtian writers have rejected this opinion, though vouch'd by the authority of Joſephus, and a great many other antient and learned writers; conceiving in this oblation not a natural but a civil kind of death, and a ſeparation only unto the Lord: for that he purſued not his vow to a literal oblation, there want not arguments both from the text and reaſon.

For firſt, it is evident that ſhe deplored her virginity, and not her death; "Let me go up and down the moun- "tains, and bewail my virginity, I and my fellows" Secondly, when it is ſaid, that Jephtha did unto her according unto his vow, it is immediately ſubjoin'd, "And ſhe knew no man;" which, as immediate in words, was moſt probably neareſt in ſenſe unto the vow. Thirdly, it is ſaid in the text, that "The daughters of Iſrael went yearly [to talk with] the daughter of Jephtha four days in the year," which had ſhe been ſacrificed in a literal ſenſe, they could not have done. For whereas the word is ſometimes tranſlated [to lament] yet doth it alſo ſignify [to talk, or have conference with one] and it is in this ſenſe tranſlated: "Ibant filiæ Iſraelitarum ad confabulandum cum filia Jephthæ, quatuor diebus quotannis:" and ſo it is alſo ſet down in the marginal notes of our tranſlation.

It is alſo repugnant to reaſon; for the offering mankind was againſt the law of God; and therefore the ſcripture with indignation often makes mention of human ſacrifices among the Gentiles. It being therefore a ſacrifice ſo abominable unto God, although he had purſued it, it is not probable the prieſts and wiſdom of Iſrael would have permitted it.

AFTER Jephtha's victory over the Ammonites, and the ſettling of the people in a ſtate, or at leaſt in a fair proſpect of peace and freedom, the envious Ephraimites ſtarted a freſh cauſe of quarrel. "Why ſhould he engage "in ſuch an expedition without them, they "cried, but only out of an ambitious and co-"vetous deſign of engroſſing the honour and "profit of the adventure wholly to himſelf, "and not allowing them any ſhare or part in "it?" Jephtha made anſwer in his own defence, "That they knew very well their allies "were oppreſs'd; nay, and that they themſelves were ſolicited to come into their aſſiſtance, but never came; though men of honour, in ſuch a caſe, would not have ſtaid "for an invitation." And then he charged them farther, with a moſt ſcandalous piece of injuſtice, for men that durſt not look the common enemy in the face, now when the work was done without them, to fall ſo inſolently foul upon their friends; concluding with a menace, that if they went on in that way of clamour and outrage, he would make them ſmart for it. But there was no good to be done, he ſaw, with arguing and reaſoning the matter; ſo that he preſently betook himſelf to the more convincing argument of a powerful army, with which he advanced towards the enemy's main body, which they had brought from Gilead; charg'd, and utterly defeated them; prepoſſeſſed himſelf of all the fords and paſſes upon the river Jordan; and, in ſhort, follow'd the purſuit ſo hard, that betwixt the battle and the chace, he cut them off near two and forty thouſand men.

JEPHTHA, after theſe exploits, departed this life, having held the government ſix years, and was buried at Sebeth, the place of his nativity, in the land of Gilead. Apſan *, of the city of Bethlem, in the tribe of Judah, ſucceeded him, and ruled for the ſpace of ſeven years, without doing any thing worth taking notice of. He had ninety children, ſixty males, and the reſt daughters, which he left all living and married. He died ancient, and was buried in his own country. Elon, of the tribe of Zebulon, had the government for ten years after him, and there paſs'd nothing memorable in his reign neither. Abdon, the ſon of Heliel, ſucceeded Elon, of the tribe of Ephraim, and a native of the city of Pharathon; a man of a numerous iſſue, and remarkable for little elſe. But the times being eaſy and peaceable, gave him little or no occaſion for the exerciſe of his bravery and courage. He had forty ſons, and thirty grandchildren, all excellent horſemen; and theſe ſeventy were his conſtant guard. He left them all behind him, died in an advanc'd age, and was buried at Pharathon with great magnificence and ſtate.

AFTER the deceaſe of Abdon, the Philiſtines prevail'd againſt the Iſraelites, and kept them tributaries for about forty years; but in the end, they were ſet at liberty in this manner.

The Iſraelites tributaries to the Philiſtines for forty years, Judg. xiii. 1.

THERE was one Manoah of the tribe of Dan, and the firſt man of quality and diſtinction in his country, beyond all diſpute. This Manoah had for his wife a lovely woman, and one that was look'd upon to be the moſt complete beauty of that age; but to Manoah's unſpeakable affliction he had no children by her. In this uneaſineſs he would frequently be taking his wife to a country houſe he had in a large plain, in which ſolitude he ſpent almoſt his whole time in prayers to Almighty God for the bleſſing of children. He was paſſionate to the higheſt degree, and in proportion jealous of her. As the woman was there alone once, there appear'd an angel to her in the reſemblance of a tall handſome young man, who told her for her comfort, that God in his providence would give her a male child, who ſhould come in time to be a man of a very graceful preſence, and prodigious ſtrength; and one who ſhould humble the pride and arrogance of the Philiſtines; charging her in the name of God to let his hair grow uncut, and to ſee that he drank nothing but water; the viſion vaniſhing ſo ſoon as it had deliver'd this meſſage. Upon her husband's coming in, ſhe told him of this apparition of the angel, wonderfully enlarging upon the comely ſtature and lovelineſs of the ſhape it appear'd in; inſomuch, that the husband grew jealous of ſome unwarrantable love under that pretence †. Secondly, The offering up of his daughter was not only unlawful, and entrenched upon his religion, but had been a courſe that would have much condemn'd his diſcretion; that is, to have puniſh'd himſelf in the ſtricteſt obſervance of his vow, when as the law of God had allow'd an evaſion; that is, by way of commutation or redemption, according as is determin'd Levit. xxvii. 4—7. whereby, if ſhe were between the age of five and twenty, ſhe was to be eſtimated but at ten ſhekels; and if between twenty and ſixty, not above thirty; a ſum that could never diſcourage an indulgent parent, it being but the value of a ſervant ſlain, the inconſiderable ſalary of Judas, and will make no greater noiſe than three pounds ſeventeen ſhillings and ſix pence with us.

Laſtly, although his vow run generally for the words, "Whatſoever ſhall come forth, &c." yet might it be reſtrain'd in the ſenſe, for whatſoever was ſacrifiſable, and juſtly ſubject to lawful immolation; and ſo might have exempted him from ſacrificing either horſe or dog, if they had happen'd to come out upon him firſt. Nor was he obliged by oath unto a ſtrict obſervation of that, which promiſſorily was unlawful; or could he be qualified by vow to commit a fact which naturally was abominable. Now the ground at leaſt which promoted the opinion of Joſephus and others, who have expounded this paſſage in a literal ſenſe, might be the dubious words of the text, which contain the ſenſe of his vow, moſt men adhering unto their common and obvious acceptation. "Whatſoever ſhall come forth of the doors of my houſe ſhall ſurely be the Lord's, and I will offer it up for a burnt-offering." Now whereas it is ſaid, "Erit Jehovæ, & offeram illud holocauſtum." The word ſignifying both Et and Aut, it may be taken disjunctively; aut offeram, that is, it ſhall either be the Lord's by ſeparation, or elſe an holocauſt by common oblation, even as our marginal tranſlation advertiſeth; and as Tremellius rendereth it, "Erit inquam Jehovæ, aut offeram illud holocauſtum;" and for the vulgar Latin, it often uſeth Et where Aut muſt be preſumed, as Exod. xxi. 15. "Si quis percuſſerit patrem & matrem," that is, not both, but either. There being therefore two ways to diſpoſe of her, either to ſeparate her unto the Lord, or offer her as a ſacrifice, it is of no neceſſity the latter ſhould be neceſſary; and ſurely leſs derogatory unto the ſacred text and hiſtory of the people of God, muſt be the former.

poor woman was in great perplexity how to cure him of this anxious and unreaſonable ſuſpicion, and in the anguiſh of her ſoul, made it her ſupplication to Almighty God to ſend his angel yet once again, and in ſuch a manner, that her husband might be convinc'd of the authority of the revelation as well as herſelf. Upon this prayer of her's, the angel, a while after, preſented itſelf a ſecond time to the woman alone, in the ſame place as before; who immediately, upon the appearance, beſought the angel's patience till ſhe might fetch her husband. Her requeſt was granted, and ſo Manoah was fetch'd; but ſuch was the force of his jealouſy, that, though he actually ſaw the angel, he would hardly be brought to believe his own eyes; preſſing to have the ſame thing ſaid to them over again, that had been ſpoken to his wife. "Let it ſuffice, ſays the "angel, that it is known to your wife." Manoah then deſir'd him to declare who he was; to the end, that when God ſhould ſend him a child, he might know who to thank for it, and where to pay his acknowledgments for the bleſſing. The angel told him, "That he had "no need of rewards, neither did he expect "any for his news." "Why then, ſays Ma-"noah, be pleaſed to accept of a hoſpitable "homely treat." The angel declin'd it at firſt; but by prayer and importunity he was over-perſuaded to ſtay till ſomewhat might be provided. Manoah immediately kill'd a kid, and gave it his wife to dreſs; and when every thing was ready, the angel commanded the bread and the fleſh to be laid looſe upon a rock there, without diſhes. This being done, he touch'd the fleſh with a rod he had, and preſently there ſtarted a fire from it that conſumed fleſh, bread and all; and as the ſmoke mounted, the angel was ſeen to aſcend to Heaven in the vehicle of that cloud. Manoah lay under a ſuperſtitious dread of ſome great miſchief that might betide them upon this viſion; but his wife diſpell'd his fears by a confident aſſurance, that it would turn to their comfort, and prove the greateſt bleſſing imaginable to them both in the concluſion. She found herſelf ſoon after to be big, and from that time forward kept punctually in her mind the orders the angel had given her.

Samſon born, Ver. 24.

THE child, when born, prov'd to be a ſon, and they gave him the name of Samſon, that is to ſay, robuſt. He improv'd every day wonderfully as he grew up, in the advantages both of his body and mind; inſomuch, that betwixt the comelineſs of his looſe flowing hair, and the ſobriety of his way of living, in the government of his appetite, he ſeem'd to have ſomewhat in him that was more than human.

Samſon falls in love with a damſel at Thamna, Judg. xiv. 1.

IT was his hap once upon a ſolemn feſtival-day at Thamna*, a city belonging to the Philiſtines, being there with his parents upon that occaſion, to fall in love with a damſel of the country, whom he ſaw at that meeting; and upon the ſight of her, he was very earneſt with his father and mother to procure her for him in marriage. His parents told him, that it was againſt the rules of their religion to marry with ſtrangers, and that there was choice enough of matches among the Hebrew women, who were fitter for him. But the will and humour of the ſon prevailed over the reaſon and authority of the father, and the love proceeded to a contract. It was Samſon's fortune, as he was once upon the way on a viſit to his miſtreſs, to meet a lion directly in his road. He never gave way, or boggled for the matter, but advanced up to the very throat of him; and unarm'd as he was, with his naked hands ſtrangled him, caſting the body into a thicket afterwards, by the way ſide. As he was upon the ſame journey ſome few days after, and on the ſame errand, he ſtept aſide to look at the carcaſs of the lion, and there he found a ſwarm of bees working their wax and honey in the breaſt of him. He took out three honeycombs; and with ſome curioſities that he had gotten together, made a preſent of them to his ſweet-heart. The nuptials being now to be ſolemniz'd, his wife's relations, and the people of the place who were invited, aſſign'd him thirty of their ſtouteſt young fellows to wait upon him, as an inſtance, in pretence, of the great honour and reſpect they had for him; but in truth, as ſo many ſpies and guards upon him, in caſe he ſhould be troubleſome in his cups, being a man of ſo prodigious and incredible a ſtrength. As the gueſts grew warm and chearful, and paſſing from one merriment to another, Samſon told the company that he had a riddle to propound; and if any of them ſhould reſolve it in ſeven days, he would be bound to give them every man a ſhirt and a coat, as a reſpect and a reward; ſo that they ſhould have both honour and profit. Now betwixt thoſe who had a mind to be thought wiſe, and others who had an eye upon the benefit, they accepted the propoſal by conſent, and bad him put the queſtion. "Why then, "ſays he, the parable is this. [Out of the "eater came forth meat, and out of the ſtrong "came forth ſweetneſs."] In ſhort, the Philiſtines laid their heads together about it, till after three days puzzling, to no purpoſe, they were at laſt obliged to make their application to the new bride, and intreat her to get the ſecret out of her husband; threatening moreover, that unleſs ſhe therein prevailed, and made a full diſcovery of it to them, they would burn her without any more ado. Samſon for a good while refuſed to gratify her requeſt; but in the end, betwixt tears, importunities, and reproaches, (for ſhe imputed his refuſal to his want of love,) he was prevail'd upon to give her the whole ſtory, of his killing the lion, and of the three honeycombs he brought her; and ſo expounded the riddle from end to end, without ſo much as ſuſpecting any treacherous intrigue betwixt her and the Philiſtines. But ſtill, whatever he told her, ſhe told it again to them. The ſeventh day was now come, which was the preciſe time appointed for the ſolution of this difficulty; ſo that the Philiſtines met before ſun-ſet, and told Samſon, by way of anſwer to his queſtion, "That nothing is ſtronger than a "lion, or ſweeter than honey." "No, ſays "Samſon, nor falſer than the woman that has "put my words in your mouths." This did not hinder Samſon yet from making good what he had promiſed; for happening to meet thirty men of Askalon†, he ſtripp'd them, and made payment of the ſhirts and coats he had undertaken for. He caſt off his wife upon it however, and ſhe in ſpite married his friend who ſolicited the match, which Samſon took for ſo unpardonable an affront, that he determin'd a revenge, not only upon the woman, but upon the whole nation for it, having at that time alſo a fair opportunity before him of putting it in ſome meaſure in execution. It was then towards harveſt-time, and the corn being ripe upon the ground, Samſon got three hundred foxes, and tying them tail to tail, with firebrands between them, turn'd them looſe into the corn-fields of the Philiſtines. In the hurry of this fright they carried the fire from place to place, all over the grounds; and wherever they came, they ſpoiled all the fruits of the earth in an inſtant. So ſoon as the Philiſtines came to underſtand that it was Samſon's doing, and what it was provoked him to it, they ſent the princes of the country to Thamna, who took up the wife of Samſon, and all her relations, and burnt them alive, as the authors of this calamity.

SAMSON made ſeveral bloody inroads into the land of the Philiſtines, and took up his habitation at Etam, a rock of great ſtrength, and in the tribe of Judah; againſt which tribe the Philiſtines were now upon the point of declaring war. The people pleaded for themſelves, that they liv'd quietly, and paid their taxes, and they hoped they ſhould not be puniſhed for Samſon's fault; but they were anſwered, that nothing could diſcharge them of Samſon's guilt, but the delivering up of Samſon's perſon. They were ſo much concern'd to clear themſelves of this ſuſpicion, that they drew together three thouſand arm'd men, and marched to the place of his retreat, where they enter'd into expoſtulations with him, what a miſchief his violence had drawn upon the Hebrews, in ſtirring up an enemy againſt them, who might bring a ruin perhaps upon the whole race. Their coming, they ſaid, was only to take poſſeſſion of his perſon, and give him up to the Philiſtines, which they deſired him to ſubmit to, both for their ſakes and his, as his own voluntary act. Upon this overture Samſon came down from the rock, and upon their ſolemn oath that they would do him no farther hurt, than barely to deliver him up into the hands of the enemy, he rendered up his perſon to his countrymen, who led him away, bound with two ropes, in order to deliver him to the Philiſtines, according to agreement, when they came to a place that was formerly obſcure, but ſince made famous by a memorable exploit of Samſon's there, and was not far from the enemy's camp; the people came out in troops to meet them, with ſhouts of joy and exultation, for the good fortune that had befallen them. Samſon in the mean while broke his cords to pieces, and with the jaw-bone of an aſs that lay there upon the ground, fell upon the Philiſtines, and defeated them; killed a matter of a thouſand upon the place, and routed all the reſt. Samſon was ſo tranſported upon the thought of this victory, that he had the vanity to aſſume the honour of the action to himſelf, without aſcribing the glory of it to God's power and providence, as he ought to have done. But while this arrogant and overweening humour was yet upon him, he found himſelf ſeized with a violent parching * thirſt, which gave him to underſtand, that after all his ſucceſſes, he was but fleſh and blood ſtill, and liable to human infirmities. The ſenſe of this diſorder brought him to the knowledge of himſelf, and to a penitent confeſſion that the victory was God's, and that he was able to do nothing of himſelf, without the divine aſſiſtance. He begged pardon for his paſt vanity and preſumption, and ſo caſt himſelf wholly upon God's infinite power and goodneſs, as his only dependance for deliverance out of all his diſtreſſes. His prayers were not in vain, for there guſhed immediately out of a rock near at hand there, a ſtream of delicious water to relieve him in his raging drought; which rock, from the exploit of Samſon, bears the name of the Jaw unto this very day. After this combat, Samſon made nothing of the Philiſtines, but went publickly to Gaza, and took up his lodging there in a common inn. The governor of the town having intelligence of it, had guards and ſpies ſet at the gates to watch him, that he ſhould not give them the ſlip; but Samſon having ſome hint of the deſign, got up at midnight, and taking the gates off the hinges, carried them away upon his ſhoulders, frames, bolts, locks, and every thing that belonged to them, to Mount Hebron, and there he left them.

SAMSON ſoon after this begun by degrees to forſake the laws of his country, and conſequently to a hankering after the laws and cuſtoms of other nations, which proved in time the foundation of his ruin. It was his hap to fall paſſionately in love with a common proſtitute of the Philiſtines, whoſe name was Dalilah †; and the amour was gone ſo far, that they lived and accompanied together. The Lords of the Philiſtines finding how great a power this mercenary woman had over him, made uſe of her intereſt, by flattery and corruption, toward the betraying of him. It was their buſineſs upon the main, ſome way or other to deſtroy Samſon; and the part ſhe had to play, was to find out his weak ſide, and to diſcover where that invincible ſtrength of his lay. This was the ſtate and condition of affairs betwixt the Philiſtines and the harlot; and as there wanted not either art or bribery on the one ſide, ſo neither was there any failing in the matter of treachery and deceit on the other. For the bringing of it about, ſhe took all occaſions in his cups and dalliances, to extol his exploits, admiring his prodigious ſtrength and vigour; uſing all her artifice to get out of him wherein that excellency lay, that put ſuch an unaccountable difference betwixt him and all other men. Now Samſon, as yet maſter of his reaſon, had prudence enough to defeat the artifice of his miſtreſs by counter-cunning; and ſo he told her, that if his hands were but bound with ſeven green withs, or creepers of a vine, it would be with him as it is with other men. Dalilah ſaid no more, but went away preſently to the magiſtrates with the ſtory. Upon this report there were ſoldiers ordered privately into the houſe, who upon the firſt opportunity of finding Samſon drunk and drowſy, laid hold of him, and bound him according to their inſtructions: but Dalilah awaked him immediately with an outcry, that the Philiſtines were upon him. Samſon upon the very inſtant took the alarm, and ſnapping the withs in pieces, put himſelf in poſture, as for an encounter of an enemy. There followed a heavy quarrel a little while after, betwixt Dalilah and and Samſon. "If "he had loved her, ſhe ſaid, he could never "have denied her a thing her heart was ſet "upon; but ſhe found he durſt not truſt her, "and ſo deluded her with a lye; as if ſhe "could not keep a ſecret as well as another "woman." At this rate ſhe went on, importuning him with the ſame queſtion over again; and over again he fooled her too, with a mock-ſtory, that if he were tied up with a band of ſeven cords it would do the work; but upon trial, that experiment failed them likewiſe; and ſo did a third alſo, of filleting and twiſting up his locks. Dalilah having been now thrice impoſed upon, was not at all diſcouraged yet, but betwixt ſpite and wilfulneſs, preſſed him ſo hard with freſh charms and importunities, that he was now brought to the laſt fatal neceſſity of yielding up what he could hold no longer; and ſo he diſcover'd to her the deſired ſecret, in this manner: "That God, ſays he, who gave me my be- "ing, hath been pleaſed in his goodneſs, to "take me into his particular care, and to give "me in ſpecial charge not to ſuffer my hair to "be cut, for that in the preſervation of that "hair conſiſted my ſecurity and ſtrength." Upon this diſcovery, ſhe cut off his locks in his ſleep, and when he was no longer able to defend himſelf, delivered him up to his enemies, who put out his eyes, and carried him up and down in bonds, for a ſpectacle. Some conſiderable time after this, when Samſon's hair was pretty much grown again, there was a great meeting of the princes and nobility of the Philiſtines: the feaſt was held in a building which had only two large pillars to ſupport its roof. While they were together at this feſtival, in their jollity blind Samſon was ſent for to make ſport for the company in their cups. It was the moſt ſenſible part of his afflictions to find himſelf not in a condition to revenge the inſolence of his enemies; but he ſpoke to the boy, however, who led him, to let him lean againſt one of the pillars, for he was weary he ſaid of ſtanding. The boy did ſo; and Samſon, with all his might gave the pillar ſuch a ſhake, that he brought down the houſe upon the heads of three thouſand men, beſides himſelf, and they were all cruſh'd to death under the ruins.

CHAP. XI.

Of Naamis, Ruth, and Booz. The birth of Samuel. The Hebrews defeated by the Philiſtines.

ELI the high-prieſt ſucceeded Samſon in the government of the Iſraelites; and in his time there happened a miſerable famine. Abimelech *, a citizen of Bethlehem, in the tribe of Judah, unwilling to bear the miſeries of it, took Naamis † his wife, and two ſons that he had by her, Mallon and Chellion ‖, and ſo withdrew into the land of Moab, where every thing went proſperouſly with him, and there he married his ſons to two Moabitiſh women, Chellion to Orpha, and Mallon to Ruth. Within the compaſs of ten years Abimelech and his two ſons died, in a ſhort time one after another. Upon their deceaſe, Naamis who had now to her inconſolable affliction, loſt thoſe dear friends and relations, for whoſe only ſake ſhe was prevailed upon to quit her country, with this change of affairs changed counſels too, and reſolved to go back again; eſpecially being informed that affairs at home were now in a better ſtate than ſhe left them. Her ſons widows could not endure to think of parting with her, but preſſed her with importunities, even whether ſhe would or no, to bear her company. She wiſhed them all manner of good fortune, and that they might be happier in their next husbands than they had been with her ſons; but alas! ſhe was not in condition, ſhe ſaid, to be any way helpful to them; and for them to venture a certainty for an uncertainty, in the riſque of ſuch a journey, only to condole with a miſerable mother-in-law, to no ſort of purpoſe, was, ſhe ſaid, utterly againſt her mind. Upon this reaſoning of the matter, Orpha was over-ruled; but for Ruth's part, "Come life, come death, nothing ſhould "ever make her forſake her mother," ſhe ſaid: ſo that Naamis, without any more ceremony, went her way, and took Ruth along with her.

WHEN they came to Bethlehem, they were received by Booz ††, a kinſman of Abimelech's, and the people calling Naamis by her name, nay, ſays Naamis, let it be rather Mara; the former in Hebrew ſignifying felicity, the other ſorrow. It was now harveſt-time, and Ruth, with her mother's leave, being gone out a gleaning for ſomewhat to eat, ſhe happened into a field of Booz, who, a while after, came himſelf, and upon the ſight of this young woman, enquired more particularly of his head-ſervant what he knew concerning her. So he told his maſter what he had heard from her but a little before. Booz was wonderfully pleaſed with the tenderneſs of her affection for her mother-in-law, and for the memory of her dead husband; and therefore ordered his ſervant, not only to ſuffer her to glean what ſhe could, but to let her reap, and carry away whatever ſhe had a mind to, and to ſupply her with meat and drink ſufficient, in common with his own people. Ruth ſaved part of the bread and proviſions they gave her for her mother-in-law, and at night carried it to her, with her gleanings, all together; Naamis doing the like for Ruth, in what ſhe had received that day from her charitable neighbours. As they were together in the evening, Ruth gave her mother the whole history of what passed betwixt her and Booz, the mother giving her to understand that Booz was her near relation, and that being a considerable person, and a man of great piety, she did not know but he might take his poor kindred into his care. So that Ruth went on still, day after day, into fields a gleaning, with the maid-servants of Booz, till barley-harvest was over; and then after some few days, when the corn was threshed out, Booz took up his lodging in his own barn, which coming to the knowledge of Naamis, put her upon a contrivance how she might bring him and Ruth to lie together, to the advantage of them both: which was, that Ruth should convey herself into the barn to the feet of Booz, and there lie down to take her rest. Ruth, by the advice of Naamis, lay herself in the night at the feet of Booz, Ruth iii. 7. Ruth making a conscience of obeying her mother, did as she was commanded. But Booz, being fast asleep, knew nothing at all of the matter, till waking about midnight, he found that he had gotten a companion; and calling out to know who it was, Ruth told him her name, and begged his permission, in the quality of his servant, that she might still lie at his feet. There passed no more words at present, but early in the morning before any of the servants were gotten up to their work, he called to Ruth, and bad her take as much corn as she could carry, and be gone immediately to her mother with it, before any notice could be taken where she had been that night; for, says he, in cases of this nature people cannot be too cautious, let them be never so innocent. "But "in one word, says he, before you go; there "is a person nearer to you in blood than my-"self. My advice is, that you demand him "for your husband. If he agrees to it, you "are bound to follow him: if he refuses, I "can lawfully take you to wife myself." Ruth at her return, gave her mother-in-law a relation of all that had passed, who was mightily overjoy'd to find that their affairs were in so promising a situation, as to become the care of Booz.

ABOUT the noon-time of the day, Booz was back again at the city, where he called a court, and summoned Ruth and her kinsman to make their appearance. Well, says Booz to the kinsman, "If I am not mistaken, you are at "present possessed of the estate of Abimelech, "and his sons." I am so, says t'other, and the law has put me in possession of it by virtue of a right I have to it by nearness of blood. pray, says Booz, do not talk of the law by halves; but whether it be for you, or against you, take your lot in the one part as well as in the other. Here stands before you the widow of Mallon, and you are bound by the law to marry the woman, or to quit the inheritance. The kinsman excused himself from marrying her, by saying that he had a wife and children of his own already; and so by a publick declaration in court, rendered both the one and the other to Booz, he being then the next a-kin to the deceased. Booz had this declaration recorded, and then commanded the woman to loosen her kinsman's shoe, and spit in his face, according to a formality of law. This being done he took Ruth for his wife, and within the compass of a year, she brought him a son, which he committed to the care of Booz takes Ruth to wife, Ruth iv. 13. Naamis, and by the advice of the women called him Obed, which in Hebrew is as much as service, or assistance; applying the name to the assistance they expected from him to Naamis in her old age. From Obed came Jesse, and Jesse was the father of king David; in whose family the government continued for one and twenty generations. I have been the more particular in this history of Ruth, to set forth the power and dispensations of God in his providence, who brings the greatest things to pass, even by the meanest of instruments, advancing to the throne, many times, men of the lowest condition, according to his good pleasure. This we find verified abundantly in the genealogy of David. The birth of Obed, from whom came Jesse, and from Jesse David, Ver. 17, 22.

MATTERS at this time went very ill with the Hebrews, having engaged themselves afresh in a war with the Philistines. Eli the high-priest had two sons, Ophnes and Phinees ‡; who were libertines to the highest degree, in contempt of religion and common justice. They were men who stuck at nothing that was ill. The ordinary way of gratuities and honorary presents made them by the elders would not serve their turn, unless every thing were extorted from them by violence and rapine. They made it their business to debauch women, even at their devotions, and to corrupt them by force or bribes, at the very altar: and all this with an insolence equal to any tyranny that ever was heard of. The profligate wickedness of these licentious men was no small affliction to their father, by reason of the daily dread and apprehension he lived in of some terrible judgment that would befal them. To say nothing of the groans of the people under a most intolerable oppression; but when it came soon after to be revealed by God to the father, and to the prophet Samuel, who was at that time but a child, what would be the wretched fate of these men, Eli gave them quite over, and mourned for them as already lost or dead. But for order sake, I shall first speak a word of the prophet, and pass afterward to the wretched end of these lewd young men, and so to the true cause of the miseries that befel the Hebrews. THERE was one Elkanah, a Levite, and an inhabitant of Ramath, in the lot of Ephraim, who had two wives, Hannah and Phenannah †: by the latter he had children, but by the former, for a good while, none at all: but this disappointment, however, did not one jot lessen his affections to her. Coming one day with his family to Shilo to worship, the holy tabernacle being there, as has been said heretofore, Elkanah made a distribution of part of his own portion and provision, to his wives and children; Phenannah, and her little ones, feeding together. This sight made such an impression upon Hannah, that she look'd upon it as a tacit reproach of her barrenness, and upon that thought, betwixt grief and envy, burst out a weeping. Her husband and friends did what they could to comfort her; but she rejected all, and in that passion went away directly to the tabernacle, where she besought God with earnest supplications to grant her the comfort of a son, vowing, with a most religious solemnity, to dedicate him wholly, and in a most peculiar manner, to his worship and service. The length and earnestness of her prayers gave Eli, who was then sitting before 1 Sam. i. 2. † Scr. Peninnah. Hannah the wife of Elkanah, prays earnestly for a son, and vows him to God, Ver. 11.

She made anſwer, that ſhe drank nothing but water, only her heart was heavy for want of children, and that ſhe was now imploring God in his mercy to make her a mother. Eli bad her ſet her mind at reſt then, for God would ſend her children. Upon this encouragement ſhe went back chearfully to her husband, fell to her meat again, (which before went againſt her ſtomach,) and ſo returned with her husband into the country, where, after a while, ſhe conceived, and in due time brought forth a ſon, whom they called Samuel; that is to ſay, Asked of God. The parents returning to Shilo, to offer up ſacrifice, and pay their tenths, according to cuſtom, and to give God thanks for the bleſſing of a ſon, the woman was not unmindful of her vow, but delivered the child up to Eli, and dedicated him to God. They let his hair grow; his drink was altogether water, and his ſtation about the temple, where he officiated, and was in time to become a prophet. Hannah, after this, brought Elkanah other ſons, and three daughters.

The birth of Samuel, Ver. 20.

WHEN Samuel was juſt entered into the thirteenth year of his age, he began to prophecy; and as he lay aſleep one night, God called him by name. He took it for the high-prieſt's voice, and ſo went to him to know his pleaſure; but the high-prieſt had not called him, he ſaid; and ſo he told him over and over again, upon a ſecond, and a third call, after the ſame manner; but Eli finding at laſt where the miſtake lay, told him that it was God who called him; wherefore my ſon, ſays Eli, whenever thou heareſt the voice again, let this be thy anſwer, "Here I am Lord; "ſpeak, for thy ſervant heareth, and is ready "to obey thee." The words that Eli put into his mouth, Samuel made uſe of at the next call, and the voice then went forward, ſaying, "Since thou art here at hand, I will now give "thee to underſtand, that the Iſraelites are at "this inſtant upon the brink of ſo dreadful a "calamity, that it is not to be expreſſed or "believed, and hardly to be conceived. The "two ſons of Eli ſhall be cut off both in a "day; the high-prieſthood taken away for "ever, from himſelf and his family, and tranſ-"ferred to Eleazar; for Eli, ſays the voice, "hath had more regard to his ſons than to "my worſhip, though to the common deſtruc-"tion of them all." Samuel was not willing to be the reporter of theſe diſmal tidings to Eli and his family; but being adjured by the high-prieſt to give him a faithful account of the whole revelation, he delivered it in order from point to point, and left the old man no place to doubt of the inevitable deſtruction of his ſons. Samuel's reputation for a prophet increaſed daily, the event making good his predictions.

AT the ſame time the Philiſtines marched with an army againſt the Iſraelites, and encamped in Ampheck *; but meeting there with no oppoſition, they advanced farther, and came ſoon after to a battle, wherein the Hebrews were routed; and having loſt four thouſand upon the place, the remainder fled, and were purſued to their very tents. This blow ſtruck the Hebrews with ſo mortal a dread, that they gave all in a manner for as good as loſt, and ſent immediately to the high-prieſt and the elders, to cauſe the ark of God to be brought into the army; that by its preſence they might obtain a victory, little dreaming that they were doomed to deſtruction by a higher power than that of the ark; nay, by that divine original, for whoſe ſake alone the ark itſelf was had in veneration. The ark, however, was brought into the field, the ſons of the high-prieſt attending it with a charge, that if it ſhould happen to be loſt, they ſhould never look their father in the face again. Phinees aſſiſted only as the old man's deputy, who was far gone in years, and out of condition for that ſervice. The preſence of the ark inſpired the Hebrews with new courage, as if the very appearance of it brought victory along with it, while the other ſide looked upon it as a foreboding of their ruin; but upon the event, they both found themſelves miſtaken; for the hopes of the one were diſappointed, and ſo were the fears of the other alſo; if an error to their advantage may be called a diſappointment. But in ſhort, the Hebrews turned their backs upon the firſt encounter, loſt thirty thouſand men upon the ſpot; the two ſons of Eli fell in the number, and the ark itſelf into the enemy's hands.

THE ſad news of this overthrow, and the taking of the ark, being brought to Shilo by a young Benjamite who made his eſcape out of the battle, filled the city with mournful cries and lamentations, which coming to the ear of the high-prieſt, as he ſat mounted upon a high chair at one of the gates, gave him reaſonably to preſume the truth of the matter, and that ſome miſerable diſaſter had befallen the army; ſo he called for the young man to ſpeak with him; from whom he underſtood the particulars, and the event of the battle. As for the loſs of men, and for the death of his ſons, he ſupported that part of the ſtory with conſtancy enough, being, in truth, prepared for it by a revelation, which gave him fore-knowledge of ſo much of the calamity, and he bare it the better, in regard that it was no ſurprize to him. But when he came to the circumſtance of the ark being taken, the ſtroke was ſo unexpected, that he ſunk under the weight of it; dropp'd down out of his chair of ſtate, and gave up the ghoſt, in the ninety eighth year of his age, and the fortieth of his government. The wife of Phinees was ſeven months gone with child, fell in labour upon the news of her husband's death, and died the ſame day; but the child lived, and was called Joachab †, that is to ſay, ſhame and ignominy, pointing at the diſgrace of that defeat.

CHAP. I.

The taking of the ark. Dagon falls down before it. The plagues that attended it till it was brought back again.

The ark carried in triumph to the temple of Dagon, 1 Sam. v. 1, 2.

AFTER this rout of the Hebrews, and the taking of the ark priſoner, as is ſaid already, the Philiſtines carried it to * Azotus, in triumph, and there lodged it among other donatives and trophies, in the temple of their god Dagon. Upon coming thither next day to their morning devotions, they found Dagon tumbled down from his pedeſtal, and lying flat upon the ground before the ark. This accident put them into a ſuperſtitious confuſion what to think of it; but they preſently helped him up again, and put him in his former place. They continued going and coming as they had occaſion, and ſtill as they ſet him right one day, they were ſure to find him proſtrate upon the floor, and in a poſture of adoring the ark next time they came, which was look'd upon by the people as the worſt of omens. In concluſion, the city and province of Azotus was viſited with a moſt judicial plague of the guts, which rotted them alive, and carried them off by a violent dyſentery, with vomitings and torments not to be expreſs'd. They had another plague in the fields too; that is to ſay, ſuch ſwarms of mice, that they laid all waſte wherever they came; plants, fruit, corn, and in ſhort nothing eſcaped them. While the people of Azotus lay groaning under theſe afflictions, without any hope or proſpect of eaſe or remedy, they came to underſtand that all this had befallen them for their ſacrilegious violence upon the ark; and that at this rate, all things conſider'd, they had paid dear for the victory; ſo that they ſent a meſſenger with a requeſt to the people of Aſcalon, that they would be pleaſed to take the ark into their city; who were ſo far from any difficulty of complying with them, that they moſt thankfully admitted it. After a ſhort time they found that the judgments went along with the ark; for the very plagues of Azotus were now transferr'd to Aſcalon; and it ſtaid not long there neither, but was ſtill ſent away from one place to another, till it had travelled through five of the Philiſtines cities; and wherever it went, the ſame calamities attended it, with ſuch a mortality, as if divine juſtice had impoſed a tribute upon the violators of God's holy worſhip. The ark wander'd, in fine, ſo long, and ſo far, that people were grown ſhy of it, and would have nothing further to do with it; ſo that it was now the queſtion, how to get quit of it for good and all.

A council about the ark, what to do with it, 1 Sam. vi. 1--9.

To this end, there was a council call'd of the principal men of the five cities before ſpoken of; that is to ſay, of * Gitta, Accaron, Aſcalon, Gaza, and Azotus; to adviſe what meaſures to take upon this occaſion. Some were of opinion at firſt, for ſending the ark back to the owners of it; for the God, they ſaw, who had it under his care, would vindicate it, having already upon that account deſtroy'd their people with peſtilential diſeaſes, and laid ſeveral of their cities deſolate. There were ſome again that would not allow their opinion to be well grounded, who would have the ark to be the occaſion of the calamities wherewith they were afflicted. "If God, they cried, "had ſuch a kindneſs for it, he would never "have ſuffered an enemy to have taken it, and "an enemy of another religion too." So that this party was abſolutely againſt the ſending of it home again; adviſing them rather to bear the common chances of human life with courage and patience; and to conſider, like wiſe men, that there was nothing in all this, but according to the courſe of nature, that has a power over men's bodies, plants, ſeaſons, and the like, to do greater wonders than any thing here amounted to. There remained yet another ſort, and men of gravity and experience too, who adviſed a middle courſe betwixt either ſending it home, or detaining it; and this expedient carried it from the former, as being more congruous to the preſent humour and affair. The propoſal was this, that there ſhould be made five golden images, one for each of the five cities, and dedicated to God, in acknowledgment of his goodneſs in delivering them from a plague by his Almighty power, which was out of the reach of any natural remedy to relieve. They propounded alſo five golden mice, alluding to the vermin that devour'd their plants; all to be put in a box, and laid upon the ark, the ark itſelf to be put into a new waggon, made expreſly for that ſervice, and ſo to be drawn by two milch kine, their calves ſhut up, and left behind to keep them from lingring upon the way: this waggon, with the ark, to be conducted to the parting of three ways, and the cattle there left at liberty to go whither they pleaſed. If they took the Hebrew road, and went forward in it, the calamities they ſuffered might be imputed to the ark; but if they bent their courſe any other way, they might conclude there was nothing of the ark in the caſe. This advice was the ſenſe of every man that was there preſent; and it was ſoon after put in execution; every thing being provided according to the order, the waggon drawn out to the croſs-way, and the company leaving it.

CHAP. II.

The joy of the Iſraelites at the return of the ark. A miraculous victory obtain'd over the Philiſtines.

The beaſts carry the ark into the Hebrew way, and ſo ſtop at Bet-ſama, Ver. 14.

THE beaſts being left to themſelves, ſtruck directly into the Hebrew way, and went forward in it as directly as if they had been led or driven; divers Philiſtines following at a diſtance, out of a curioſity to ſee whither they would go, and where they would take up. They went travelling on till they came to Bethſama †, a village in the tribe of Judah; and there they ſtopp'd, notwithſtanding the temptation of a large plain in ſight to invite them further. It was now ſummer-harveſt, and the people all buſy about their corn; but upon this occaſion there came great multitudes thronging in; ſome from their work, others from their houſes in the village, to ſee the ark; and overjoy'd they were at the occaſion. Upon coming to the waggon, they took down the ark and the box, with the images and mice in it, and ſet them down upon a great ſtone that was there in the field. After this they ſacrificed and feaſted, preſenting both the waggon itſelf, and the beaſts that drew it, to God, for a burnt-offering. So ſoon as this ceremony was over, the Philiſtines, who had follow'd them thus far, returned into their own country. Upon this occaſion ſeveral of the Bethſamites, to the number of ſeventy, fell under God's diſpleaſure for the temerity of laying profane hands upon the ark, without the due authority and qualification of the prieſthood. This judgment caſt a terrible damp upon the ſpirits of the multitude in the middle of their rejoicings, to ſee ſo many of their friends and companions taken away from them by ſo judicial a ſtroke. By this calamity they became conſcious to themſelves of their own unworthineſs, to have the ark of God lodged under their care; ſo that they ſent meſſengers up and down to all the Hebrews, with advice, that the Philiſtines had brought it back again.

The people ſacrifice, and feaſt for joy at the ark's coming back, Ver. 15.

Upon this notice, it was forthwith tranſported to Cariathirim ‡, not far from Bethſama, in the houſe of Aminadab, a Levite; a man of great repute for religion and integrity, and therefore the fitter for the entertainment of ſo ſacred a truſt. It was committed to the charge of himſelf and his ſons, and with them it reſted twenty years, (ſaving only the four months that it was detained by the Philiſtines,) to the great honour of themſelves, and the ſatisfaction of the people. For the twenty years that the ark continued at Chiriathirim, the people ſpent their whole time almoſt in prayers and ſacrifices, attendances upon God's worſhip, and the exerciſe of holy duties. Samuel took an occaſion from this good diſpoſition of the multitude, to harangue them upon the ſubject of liberty, and the bleſſings which attend it; accommodating his diſcourſe very pertinently, both to the ſeaſon and to his buſineſs.

Samuel calls an aſſembly to Mizpeh, 1 Sam. vii. 5.

SAMUEL, after this, ſummoned the people to a congregation in a city call'd Mizpeh, (that is to ſay, conſpicuous,) where they drew water, and ſacrificed; ſpending the whole day in faſting and prayer. The Philiſtines, in the mean time, were not without intelligence of this meeting of the Hebrews; and ſo they advanced toward them with a very great army, deſigning to fall upon them, while they were utterly unprepared for action, and not ſo much as in the leaſt apprehenſive of any occaſion for it. This ſurprize put them in the greateſt terror imaginable; inſomuch, that they went trembling and half dead to Samuel for advice what to do, telling him in plain terms, " That they had neither hearts nor ſtrength " to encounter an enemy, by whom they had " been ſo often worſted. They ſhould be glad " to be quiet, they ſaid, without giving any " farther provocation to ſo powerful an adver- " ſary." They told him that they came thither in obedience only to his order, to offer up prayers and ſacrifices, and to enter into a military oath of fidelity; and " here are we, " they ſaid, naked and unarmed, at mercy, " without any hope or poſſibility of eſcaping, " unleſs you can prevail with God to reſcue " us miraculouſly out of the hands of the Phi- " liſtines." Samuel bad them fear nothing; for God had promiſed them his protection and aſſiſtance, and he would moſt certainly make good his word; ſo Samuel ſacrificed a ſucking lamb to God, in the name of the people, imploring his aid againſt the power of the Philiſtines, in favour of the Hebrews, who put their whole truſt in him, and not to forſake them at preſent, nor ſuffer them to be afflicted with a ſecond and final ruin. God accepted of the ſacrifice, and anſwer'd Samuel's requeſt with the comfortable aſſurance of giving the Hebrews an entire victory. But while the ſacrifice was yet upon the altar, and not wholly conſumed, the Philiſtines drew up in a body, and preſented themſelves in order of battle, in ſuch hopes and aſſurances of a victory, as if the Jews were already taken and ſurpriz'd, without either arms or order, or the leaſt thought or deſign of fighting. The event, however, prov'd ſo contrary to what they expected, that if they had been foretold by an oracle of the iſſue, they would not have believ'd it.

IN the firſt place, God ſhook the foundations of the earth under the feet of the Philiſtines, ſo that they could not ſtand without ſtaggering. In ſome places it open'd, and ſwallow'd them up alive, before they knew where they were; and all this, accompanied with ſuch dreadful claps of thunder, and flaſhes of lightening, that their very eyes and limbs were ſcorched to ſuch a degree, that they could neither ſee their way before them, nor ſtand to their arms. In this conſternation they fled in as defenceleſs a condition as if they had been ſo many naked men without their arms; Samuel and his people cloſely purſuing them with a terrible ſlaughter, till they came to a place call'd Chore, and there he fixed a kind of monumental ſtone, in the nature of a trophy, for a mark of the bounds, both of the victory and of the chace, calling the place the Strong, in remembrance of God's powerful aſſiſtance to his people in the action. The Philiſtines were ſo cow'd, and caſt down with this diſaſter, that betwixt the dread they had of the Hebrews, and the memory of what they ſuffered, they never had the hearts afterward to lift up their hands againſt them, but contented themſelves to ſit down loſers, and to keep within their bounds. The ancient courage of the Philiſtines was now gone over to the other ſide; and Samuel would not give them over, till by repeated inroads, and frequent executions upon them, he had brought down the ſtomachs of the whole nation to the loweſt degree of deſpondency and abjection. In this courſe of ſucceſſes, he retook the country that lies betwixt Gath and Accaron *, which the Philiſtines had formerly taken from the Jews. But there was peace at this time betwixt the Hebrews and the reſt of the Chanaanites.

CHAP. III.

Samuel being now in years, transfers the government to his two ſons.

The excellent polity and method of Samuel's government.

SO ſoon as Samuel had put the people in ſome ſort of order, and re-inſtated them in the poſſeſſion of their lands and cities, he appointed publick meetings at certain times and places, for the hearing of cauſes, and adminiſtration of common juſtice; taking a progreſs twice a year into all thoſe towns of appeal, and law-buſineſs, to ſee right done himſelf; making it his principal care ſtill, not to depart from the laws of his country. This was the polity and method of his management for a long time; but in the end, when old age, and the weakneſſes that attend it, had rendered him unfit for the perſonal performance of theſe publick offices, he devolved the authority and care of the whole upon his two ſons, Joel and Abiah; the former being the elder, and the other the younger; directing them to make a diſtribution of the people into two diviſions, and the two brothers to go ſeveral circuits; the one to have his court of judicature at Bethel, the other at Beerſheba.

Samuel, now in years, devolves the care of the government upon his two ſons, Joel and Abiah, appointing them their walks and circuits, 1 Sam. viii. 1.

WE may learn from hence, that ſons do not always tread in their fathers footſteps, either in the ways of good or evil; but many an excellent father has a wicked wretch to his ſon; and ſo on the contrary, a ſober virtuous child may be the ſon of a graceleſs father; as theſe young men for example, without any regard to the doctrine and practice of Samuel, ſteered a courſe directly contrary to the prudence and equity of his inſtitutions and meaſures. They proſtituted the ſacred name of juſtice for money, making judgment to be mercenary; and in this ſtate of corruption, controverſies were decided by the value of the bribe, not the righteouſneſs of the cauſe. They were ſtill indulging themſelves in riot and exceſs, when they ſhould have been upon the bench, and ſo abandon'd to their avarice and pleaſure, as if they had deliberately entered into an equal defiance of the will and commands of their God, and of their father; for Samuel laid nothing more to heart, than the care of keeping the people in the train of a dutiful obedience to their ſuperiors, and in the knowledge and obſervance of common juſtice one with another.

The ſons of Samuel degenerate, 1 Sam. viii. 3.

CHAP. IV.

The Iſraelites preſs earneſtly for a king, and God in his wrath gives them one.

The people are weary of Samuel's ſons, Ver. 4.

THE people were ſo outrageouſly tranſported againſt the ſons of Samuel, to ſee ſuch abuſes in a frame of government ſo excellent, both in reſpect of policy and of manners, that they gathered themſelves together, and went unanimouſly to the father, who was then at Ramah, with a grievous remonſtrance againſt his ſons for their miſgovernment in general, and the particulars at length of their male adminiſtration; making it their earneſt requeſt to him, in regard of his own infirmity of body, and the intolerable extravagancy of his ſons, that he would ſet ſome king over them, under whoſe conduct they might revenge themſelves upon the Philiſtines, for the injuries they had done them.

And preſs to have a king over them, Ver. 5.

Now theſe words to Samuel, who was naturally a lover of juſtice, and a profeſs'd enemy to tyranny, ſo diſturbed him (being in his judgment alſo for an Ariſtocracy, as a form moſt accommodate to the well-being of the people,) that he could neither eat nor ſleep for the thoughts of it, but lay toſſing and turning himſelf all night, reſtleſs and unquiet. While he was thus labouring under an anxiety of mind, God appeared to him in a viſion; and for his comfort, bad him trouble himſelf no further with this remonſtrance of the people;

Samuel could not ſleep all night for the thoughts of this, Ver. 6.

God tells Samuel they have not caſt off thee, but me, Ver. 7.

"For, ſays the voice, they have not put an "affront upon thee, but me, in rejecting me "for their king; and this is no more than "what they have been continually attempting, "ſince I firſt brought them out of Egypt; "wherefore let them have their own way; but "they ſhall dearly rue it e're it be long, and "abhor themſelves for their ingratitude, both "to me and to my prophet, but it will be "then too late, and to no purpoſe; for when "the thing is once done, 'tis never to be un-"done; wherefore I will have thee give them "a king, and he ſhall be a king of my deſign-"ing too; but before they go any further, "forewarn them of the miſeries they are now "drawing upon their own heads. Do as I bid "you; but proteſt to them at the ſame time, "how much it goes againſt your heart to com-"ply with them, in changing the form of go-"vernment, which will certainly be for the "worſe."

God orders Samuel to give them a king, Ver. 9.

SAMUEL, according to his commiſſion and inſtructions, ſummoned an aſſembly to meet the next day, engaging that he would aſſign them a king, but not without letting them know beforehand what they were to endure under a monarchy. "Your kings, ſays he, ſhall take "your ſons to drive their chariots, and to be "their horſemen and body-guard, and ſome "ſhall be their lacqueys; others they will "make tribunes and centurions; ſome again "they will ſet to till their ground, reap their "harveſt, dig in their vineyards, and make "them inſtruments both for war, and for other "purpoſes. There is nothing ſo mean or ex-"travagant, but you ſhall be forc'd to do it, "like ſlaves bought with their money: they "will make your daughters perfumers, cooks, "and paſtry-ſervants; compelling them to do "all that upon neceſſity, which the meaneſt of "your ſlaves are frighted into for fear of cor-"rection and blows. They ſhall give away "your poſſeſſions to their eunuchs and guards; "divide your flocks and herds among their fa-"vourites; but to ſay all in a word, you and "yours ſhall be as much vaſſals to your king, "as his own domeſticks. When you come to "find all this to be true, remember what I "foretold you. When that day comes, you "ſhall beg to be quit of your king, with as "much importunity as ever you did to have "one: you ſhall then curſe your obſtinacy, "and reflecting upon your ſins, cry to God for "mercy, in the anguiſh of your ſouls, and "not obtain it: you ſhall deſpair under the "repulſe, and ſuffer the puniſhments of your "wickedneſs in the torment of a guilty con-"ſcience."

Samel calls an aſſembly, and promiſes them a king; telling them firſt what kind of king it will be, Ver. 10--18.

The people are foretold they ſhall repent when it is too late, ibid.

THESE counſels and premonitions wrought no more upon the multitude than if they had been all deaf; for they ſhut their ears againſt all that could be offer'd them, either of ſobriety, or ſound reaſon; and inſtead of deſiſting, nothing would ſerve them but a king immediately, at all hazards. "They could not "defend themſelves, they ſaid, againſt their "enemies under any other form of govern-"ment; and why ſhould not they have a king "as well as their neighbours?" When Samuel found them ſo untractably wilful, in deſpite of all counſels and forebodings, he diſmiſs'd them all to their own homes, with this aſſurance, that he would call them together again ſo ſoon as ever he ſhould receive direction from God what king to give them.

CHAP. V.

Saul declared king. Nahaſh beſieges Jabeſh. Saul relieves it, and gives the enemy a total defeat.

Saul, the ſon of Kis, of the tribe of Benjamin, is ſent abroad to look after his father's aſſes, 1 Sam. xix. 2, 3.

THERE was one Kis, of the tribe of Benjamin, a man well born and bred, who had a ſon named Saul; a man of a proper goodly ſtature, and a mind anſwerable to the graces of his body. The father took much pleaſure in a breed of aſſes he had, above all his other beaſts; and ſome of them being miſſing, he ſent his ſon abroad, and one ſervant with him, to look after them. When he had ſought and enquired from one tribe to another, without any tidings of them, he ſteered his courſe homewards, for fear his father ſhould be be troubled to think what was become of him. As they were upon the way near Ramah, the ſervant told Saul, that there was a famous prophet liv'd there, and adviſed him to go and enquire of him after the aſſes. Ay, but ſays Saul, I have not wherewithal about me to gratify him for his pains, for the ſtock is all ſpent that I brought out with me. The ſervant told him, that he himſelf had a quarter-ſicle * left yet, and he thought that might be ſufficient; not underſtanding that this was none of the prophets who made a trade of diſcovering things loſt for money. So they went forward, and meeting ſeveral damſels at the gates of the town, going out to fetch water, asked them whereabouts the prophet lived. They ſhew'd them the houſe, and told them, that if they had any buſineſs with him, they would do well to make haſte, and get to him before he went to ſupper; for he had invited a great deal of company that night, and they ſtaid only for his coming, to take his place with the reſt of his gueſts.

He goes to the prophet Samuel, to enquire after them, 1 Sam. ix. 12.

SAMUEL had been cloſe at his prayers the whole day before, for directions from God who ſhould be king; and he was anſwered, that the next day he ſhould receive his order; for there ſhould come a young man to him of the tribe of Benjamin, at the ſame hour. Samuel ſat waiting in the houſe all this while, in expectation of this Benjamite, 'till the preciſe hour was come, and then going to ſupper, found Saul, whom he knew by an immediate inſpiration to be the perſon deſign'd for the government. Saul advanced toward Samuel, and ſaluting him, told him he was a ſtranger, and ſo deſir'd the favour of him to know where he might find the prophet. Samuel's anſwer was, that he was the man; and ſo taking him to ſupper, he diſcover'd unto him, not only that the aſſes he ſought for were all ſafe, but that he himſelf was upon the point of being exalted from that employment, to the higheſt pitch of ſovereign power. "Alas! my lord, "ſays Saul, I have no ſuch hopes in my "thoughts, as you do me the honour to ima-"gine; neither am I of a tribe or family "that ſets up for kings; it looks as if you "were not in earneſt, to put a fancy in my "head of a dignity ſo much above my con-"dition." The ſupper waited, and the prophet took Saul, and placed him above the reſt of his gueſts, (who were ſeventy in number,) and his ſervant next him, giving orders to the waiters to bring Saul a royal meſs; there ſat in converſe together till towards bed-time, when the company broke up, and every man went to his own home, ſaving only Saul and his ſervant, who ſtaid with the prophet that night.

Saul's coming to Samuel was foretold him, Ver. 15, 16.

Samuel takes Saul to ſupper with him, Ver. 24.

By break of day next morning, Samuel call'd up his gueſt, and directed him in his way. When they were gotten out of the city, he deſir'd Saul to bid his ſervant go a little before; for he had ſomewhat to ſay to him in private. He did ſo; and when the prophet had him alone, he took out a glaſs of oil, and pouring it on his head, he pronounced and ſaluted him king, upon that anointing; telling him, that this honour was done him in expectation that he would protect the Hebrews, and do them right upon the Philiſtines, for the injuries they had done them. "Now, ſays Samuel, to con-"firm what I tell you is truth, ſatisfy your-"ſelf with this token, you ſhall fall into com-"pany upon your journey, with three men go-"ing to Bethel to worſhip; one of them car-"rying three loaves, the ſecond a kid, and the "third a bottle of wine. They ſhall treat "you with reſpect, and give you two of their "loaves, which you are to receive. You will "then advance to the ſepulchre of Rachel, "where you ſhall meet the news of your aſſes "being found. After that you will go to "Gabatha, and join yourſelf to a congrega-"tion of prophets that you ſhall find there, "and by the aſſiſtance of the ſpirit of God, "you yourſelf ſhall prophecy in company with "them, to the aſtoniſhment of all that ſhall "ſee and hear you; inſomuch, that the people "ſhall ſay among themſelves in admiration, "how comes the ſon of Kis to be found among "the prophets? When this comes to paſs, you "may conclude for a certainty, that the hand "of God is in it. You may go then to ſalute "your father and kindred; and when I ſend "to you, come to me to Gilgal, where we "may offer up our prayers to God, with ſa-"crifices and thankſgivings." Upon theſe words they parted, and Saul found every circumſtance in his journey to fall out as Samuel had foretold him.

Samuel foretels Saul what would befal him in his journey, Ver. 2--8.

Samuel anoints Saul, and pronounces him king, 1 Sam. x. 1.

UPON coming back to his father's houſe, his kinſman Abner (for whom he had a very great kindneſs and eſteem) was mightily inquiſitive into the ſtory of his late adventure, and Saul very frankly told him the whole buſineſs of his going to the prophet, and how he came to hear of his aſſes again, but not one word of his elevation to the throne, for fear either of drawing an envy upon him, if it ſhould be believ'd, or of incurring the cenſure of a vain whimſical man, if it ſhould be miſtruſted; ſo that though Abner was his ſingular friend, and near relation, yet conſidering that men's affections are changeable, and fleſh and blood frail, he thought it ſafer, and more diſcreet, to reſerve himſelf upon that point; for men do naturally caſt an evil eye upon other people's proſperity, in preference to themſelves, even where the diſtinguiſhing favour of God ſhews itſelf moſt remarkably in the bleſſing. The next thing Samuel had to do, was to call the people together; which he did, and they met at † Mizpeh; where, in a full congregation, he deliver'd himſelf to this effect:

Samuel calls the people together, Ver. 17.

"I AM now, by the command, and in the "name of God, to tell you, that it was he "who deliver'd you out of your Egyptian "bondage, and over and over reſcued you out "of the hands of your enemies, when they "had you under their feet at mercy: I am "likewiſe to mind you of your contumacy "and ingratitude toward that God, in return "for all thoſe mercies and benefits; how you "have, as much as in you lay, depoſed him "from his authority over you, and rather "choſen a man of your own make and frailty, "than the Almighty King of Kings for your "governor; as if any ruler would do better "for you than he that made you; a king that "will treat his ſubjects like beaſts, at will and "pleaſure, and uſe them only as inſtruments "and miniſters of his paſſions and luſts. "well,

" well, my brethren, ſince you are unalterably " determin'd to have it ſo, and for the ſake of " an inconſiderate tranſport of levity, to caſt " off all manner of reverence for the duties of " honour, honeſty, and conſcience: Since this, " I ſay, is your final reſolution, a king you ſhall " have, and therefore divide yourſelves into " tribes and families, and put it then to the " lot who ſhall be the man." They did ſo, and the lot of the tribe fell upon Benjamin; that of the families upon Matri; and in concluſion, when they came to try it man by man, the perſonal lot fell upon Saul, the ſon of Kis; who being made privy to all this beforehand, ſlipp'd out of the way ſo ſoon as the choice was over, that he might not be thought ambitious of the honour. It was an inſtance of great modeſty and good government in him, that being advanced from a private ſtate to a ſovereign authority over a mighty nation, he was not only, not vain, proud, and forward to ſhew himſelf upon the promotion, but to avoid the pomp and oſtentation of his new dignity, he ſo induſtriouſly withdrew himſelf from the eyes and acclamations of his own ſubjects, that no body knew where to find him; whereas the hundredth part of this ſurprize would have turn'd the brain of a man leſs temperate, with joy and oſtentation.

Samuel puts the choice to the lot, and the lot falls upon Saul, 1 Sam. x. 20, 21.

UPON Saul's not appearing, or rather upon his not being to be found, they were all at a nonplus what to do without him, and how to come at him; till upon the application of the prophet for further light and direction, God was pleaſed to make known to him the place where Saul lay conceal'd; whereupon Samuel caus'd him immediately to be ſent for, and brought into the field, where he was obſerved to be taller by the head and ſhoulders than the reſt of the people, and to have ſomewhat of a natural majeſty in his very perſon.

Samuel preſents Saul to the people as the king that God had deſign'd them; and they all ſhout, V. 24. Samuel's preſages concerning Saul are read to the people, and recorded in the ſanctuary, Ver. 25.

SAUL being thus produced, the prophet preſented him in manner as follows: " Behold, " ſays he, the king that God hath given you, " and you may read in the excellency of his " perſon how well he is qualified for this ho- " nour; the people ſeconding this recommen- " dation with ſhouts and acclamations of, God " ſave the king." Samuel had committed to writing the prediction of what would befal this people under a kingly government, and read it over to them in the hearing of Saul himſelf; depoſiting the book at laſt in the tabernacle of God, to remain as a memorial to poſterity of the truth of all he foretold.

THIS ſolemnity being now over, Samuel diſcharged the congregation, and went home himſelf to Ramah *, and Saul to Gibeah †, the place where he was born. He was attended with a great train of very good men, who made their court out of pure loyalty and reſpect, to congratulate his acceſſion to the throne, but not without mutineers and malecontents in abundance, who out of ſpite and envy, made ſport of the whole matter, behaving themſelves contemptuouſly even toward the king himſelf, as well as his dutiful followers, neither offering preſents or congratulations to bid him welcome to his dignity.

SAUL had not been inveſted king above a month, but there broke out a war with Nahaſh, the king of the Ammonites, which redounded very much to his honour. This Nahaſh had committed ſeveral outrages upon the Jews beyond Jordan, making inroads into their country, and conquering their cities with a numerous and powerful army; nor was he content to make ſlaves of them at preſent by force, unleſs he alſo put them out of all poſſibility, by ſtratagem and cunning, of ever recovering their freedom. Now the invention was this; they pluck'd out the right eyes of all they got into their power, whether by force, or by treaty; ſo that they muſt either loſe the uſe of the buckler which cover'd the left eye, or the benefit of having any eyes at all.

The Ammonites pluck out the right eyes of all the priſoners they take, Ver. 2.

NAHASH having treated the people beyond Jordan after this cruel manner, marched with his army on the ſame deſign to the country of the Gileadites, and ſo to Jabeſh, the capital city of the province, and there encamp'd. From hence he ſent a ſummons to the inhabitants, either to deliver up the town, and ſubmit to the loſs of their right eyes, or otherwiſe to ſtand the uttermoſt peril of fire and ſword; leaving it at their choice, either to compound for a part, or to run the hazard of the whole, life and all. The men of Jabeſh were now at a ſtand, neither daring to give a tame nor a reſolute anſwer; but upon conſideration, they divided the buſineſs, and the return was this: they deſired only ſeven days liberty to ſend to their friends and allies for relief; which if obtain'd, they ſaid they would wage war; but if none came in that compaſs of time, they promiſed to render themſelves up to the enemy upon their own terms. Nahaſh had ſo contemptible an opinion of theſe people, that he made no difficulty at all of complying with their conditions.

A terrible ſummons to Jabeſh, ibid.

And ſeven days allow'd them to conſider of it, Ver. 3.

UPON this criſis they poſted away expreſſes to their friends throughout all the cities of Iſrael, for immediate ſuccour, with an account of the deſperate ſtreights they were in, under the menaces of a powerful enemy. The miſerable diſtreſs of their condition drew tears and pity wherever they came, but not a creature durſt ſo much as attempt to help them; and it was the ſame thing with the inhabitants of the metropolis alſo, where Saul kept his reſidence, as it was in other places; but he having been abroad, and upon coming to town again, finding the people under ſo diſmal a conſternation, he inſtantly enquir'd if all was ſafe, and the reaſon of their ſudden ſadneſs; and from the couriers who brought the news, he got the whole ſtory.

They ſend meſſengers to Saul, and elſewhere, for relief.

WHILE things were in this deſperate extremity, the ſpirit of God came upon Saul; who in the heat of this impulſe, ſent ſome of the meſſengers back again to the men of Jabeſh, with an aſſurance, that on the third day || he himſelf would come to their aſſiſtance, beat the enemy by break of day, and that the riſing ſun ſhould ſee them totally routed and deſtroy'd, and the wretched citizens freed from their fears, and ſecured againſt any farther danger. Some he diſpatch'd away with this meſſage, others he kept for guides, to conduct him the right way upon his march.

Saul anſwers them prophetically, that on the third day they ſhould be reliev'd, and the enemy routed and deſtroy'd.

|| There is a ſmall variation here from the ſcripture, with reſpect to time; for in 1 Sam. xi. 9. 'tis ſaid, " And " they ſaid unto the meſſengers that came, thus ſhall ye ſay unto the men of Jabeſh-Gilead, TO MORROW, by that " time the ſun be hot, ye ſhall have help."

CHAP. VI.

Saul raiſes an army, routs Nahaſh, and is a ſecond time anointed and declar'd king.

SAUL being now ſtreighten'd in time, and the people backward enough to the war, bethought himſelf of an invention how he might both quicken and encourage them; making account, that in ſome caſes men will do more for fear of loſs, than for the love of virtue; ſo that he firſt hough'd the * legs of his own oxen, and then publiſh'd a declaration, that whoever ſhould fail of appearing the next day in arms at the river Jordan, and thence to follow him and Samuel, whereſoever they ſhould lead them, he ſhould have his oxen ſerved after the ſame manner. This ſucceeded ſo well, that for fear of incurring the penalty, there came together at the preciſe time, a body of ſeven hundred thouſand fighting men, as appear'd upon a review near the city of Balam, where they had their rendezvous; not reckoning ſeventy thouſand men more of the tribe of Judah. With this army they paſs'd the Jordan, and after a march of about ten ſchœni † that night, they poſſeſs'd themſelves of the ground which Saul had pitch'd upon, before ſun-riſe next morning. From this place they broke in upon the enemy, front, flank, and rear, in three diviſions, by a moſt unexpected ſurprize, cutting them down on all hands with a dreadful ſlaughter. The Ammonites, in fine, were totally routed; and among others Nahaſh their king was ſlain in the battle, the Hebrews remaining maſters of the field, having obtain'd a complete victory. This glorious action gave Saul a mighty reputation, both for his valour and conduct; inſomuch, that it brought his very enemies over to him; and thoſe who betwixt envy, hatred, and contempt, could not before afford him a good word, were now the men that paid him the greateſt honour, and extoll'd him to the skies for the braveſt and the beſt of governors. Nor did Saul content himſelf with having deliver'd the inhabitants of Jabeſh, but he carried the war into the land of the Ammonites; laid waſte their country, enrich'd his army with the ſpoil, and brought off the people ſafe and victorious to their own homes again.

A complete victory, and Nahaſh ſlain in the battle.

Saul gets a mighty reputation by this action, V. 12.

NEITHER did the multitude forget to applaud themſelves all this while, for the notable expedient of chuſing a king; for they look'd upon Saul to be the people's king, and conſequently their inſtrument; ſo that whatever he did, they took it virtually to be their own act. "Where are thoſe buſy fellows, "they cry'd, that were ſo fierce againſt our "having a king? why are not thoſe traitors to "their country brought to condign puniſhment, "and made examples of?" After this outrageous and extravagant rate they went rambling up and down, (as the humour of the rabble is to judge of every thing by the event,) till Saul interpoſed with an oath, that he would not ſuffer any thing ſo derogatory to the occaſion, as the confounding of God's mercies with human paſſions, by polluting a day of victory over their enemies with the blood of their friends. He put a compliment, however, upon the good intention of their laudable zeal, but ſtill adjur'd them to lay aſide all animoſities and hatred, and to join all as one man in the dedication of that bleſſed day wholly to joy and thankſgiving.

The people make their boaſts that it was done by their king, ibid.

WHEN matters had proceeded thus far, Samuel adviſed the calling of another aſſembly, to ratify and eſtabliſh Saul in the right and poſſeſſion of the throne. So the convention was appointed, and met at Gilgal, where Saul was again anointed by Samuel, and proclaimed king a ſecond time, in the ſight and hearing of all the people. Thus was the republican ſtate of the Hebrews tranſlated to a monarchy: the form of the government, military and civil, under Moſes and his ſucceſſor Joſhua, was an Optimacy or Ariſtocracy; and for a matter of eighteen years after that, it was no better than a direct anarchy, without any order at all; but re-aſſuming their old form of government, which was to chuſe ſome eminent perſon whom they found moſt competent for the function, the ſovereignty was lodged in magiſtrates, under the name of judges, and there it continued ſo long as the adminiſtration laſted.

Samuel calls another aſſembly at Gilgal, V. 14.

Saul a ſecond time anointed, and proclaimed, Ver. 15.

The Hebrews Ariſtocracy turn'd into a monarchy.

THE aſſembly being by this time ready to break up, Samuel applied himſelf in a diſcourſe to them, by way of appeal, to this effect: "I "do adjure you, ſays Samuel, in the name of "the great God of your forefathers, who gave "them thoſe incomparable brothers, Moſes "and Aaron, for their rulers and guides, and "delivered them out of the bondage of Egypt, "to give me a true anſwer now, in the preſence of the king, without any reſtraint or "fear, tenderneſs or reſpect, to ſome few "queſtions that I ſhall ask you. Can you, or "any of you, charge me with ſo much as one "ſingle act of corruption, partiality, or in"juſtice, in my whole adminiſtration? Whoſe "ox, whoſe ſheep, or whoſe aſs have I taken? "not but that preſents of good-will in the "matter of neceſſaries for life, may be re"ceived, without either crime or ſcandal. "Yet give me leave to ſay again, if you can "lay any thing of this kind to my charge, "ſpeak it before the king's face, and do not "ſpare me." Upon this, the whole multitude acquitted him with one voice, declaring unanimouſly, that his government had been faultleſs, and according to the ſtricteſt rules of piety and juſtice.

Samuel juſtifies his adminiſtration, in an appeal to the people, 1 Sam. xii. 2--5.

"WELL, ſays Samuel, I am glad of your "acknowledgment here before the king, that "you have no cauſe of complaint againſt me. "I wiſh I could ſay as much for you too; "for to deal freely, you have been mightily "to blame. What ſhould you chuſe another "king for, after the experience of ſo many "ſignal mercies, and miraculous deliverances, Samuel taxes the people for their ingratitude, in caſting off God to chuſe a king, Ver. 6--15.

* This fact is alſo ſomewhat differently circumſtanced in Scripture; for ver. 7. of the ſame chapter 'tis ſaid, "And he, Saul, took a yoke of oxen, and hewed them to pieces, and ſent them throughout all the coaſts of Iſrael, "ſaying, whoſoever cometh not forth after Saul, and after Samuel, ſo ſhall it be done unto his oxen."

" of their king, or of themſelves; upon the pe" nalty, as he foretold them, of a certain ruin
" both to the one and to the other, if they " acted contrary to what he had preſcri-
" bed." And ſo with this ſecond confirmation of Saul in his government, the aſſembly was diſmiſs'd.

CHAP. VII.

Saul incurs God's diſpleaſure. Jonathan obtains a glorious victory over the Philiſtines. Saul makes a raſh vow. His children, and his mighty power.

SAUL being now ſettled, and confirm'd in the poſſeſſion of his royal dignity, made a choice of three thouſand men out of the whole body of his people. Two thirds of them he took with him to Bethel, where he kept his reſidence, for the guard of his perſon; and the other thouſand, he order'd to attend his ſon Jonathan, whom he ſent to Gibeah: with which party, Jonathan reduced a caſtle, not far from thence, belonging to the Philiſtines. Now the Philiſtines thereabouts whenever they got the better of Jews, did not only diſarm them, but forbad them the exerciſe of any trade that wrought in iron: ſo that for the very iron-work of their ploughs, ſpades, mattocks, and other domeſtick neceſſaries, they were fain to have recourſe ſtill to Philiſtine workmen to ſupply them. They took care alſo to ſecure all paſſes; fortify all tenable towns, and to furniſh them with men and munition. The news of this baffle was receiv'd by the Philiſtines with all the indignation and contempt imaginable; and preſently they drew an army into the field of three hundred thouſand foot, thirty thouſand chariots, and ſix thouſand horſe, and pitched their tents at Michmaſh. So ſoon as the tidings of this preparation came to Saul's ear, he went to Gilgal, and ſent his meſſengers and proclamations, every where up and down to ſummon all his people, that had any regard for the liberties of their country, to take up arms againſt the Philiſtines; making them much leſs conſiderable than in truth they were, both for numbers, and military proweſs. But when Saul's people came to underſtand, upon the certainty of better intelligence, the full ſtate and ſtrength of the enemy, a panick terror ſeized the whole body of them, to ſuch a degree, that they fled diverſe ways as in a rout; ſome concealing themſelves in vaults and caves, and other hiding-places; but the greater part of them made over the Jordan for ſhelter and concealment, among the tribes of Gad and Reuben.

WHILE things were in this hurry and confuſion, Saul ſent for the prophet to adviſe with upon the preſent juncture: who made him this return, that he ſhould continue where he was; get ſacrifices in readineſs; and that at the end of ſeven days, he himſelf would be with him, when they would offer them up, and ſo advance to give the enemy battle. Saul waited out his time, but moſt unhappily failed in another article of his commiſſion; for the prophet delaying his coming, and his men perpetually deſerting him, he offer'd up the ſacrifice without attending any farther for Samuel. The ceremony was no ſooner over, but word was brought that the prophet was come; and Saul immediately, as upon a point of honour and reſpect, went out to meet him. When Samuel came to underſtand what had paſs'd, he told Saul that he had done very unadviſedly in not keeping to his inſtructions, and in taking ſo raſhly upon himſelf the office of delivering up up the prayers and ſacrifices which God had appointed on the behalf of the people in his abſence. Saul excuſed it, that he had attended ſo many days according to his order; but that the enemy's leaving Michmath, and marching directly toward Gilgal, had ſo frighted his men, that he was under an abſolute neceſſity in all haſte to offer up the ſacrifice before his people had quite forſaken him. "Well, "ſays the prophet, it would have been better "for you to have follow'd my direction, "which was effectually a meſſage to you from "God himſelf, than ſo heedleſly to incur the "cenſure of ſo dangerous a contempt: For in "ſhort, your obedience would have ſecured "the government to yourſelf, and your poſ-"terity." Upon this reproof, the prophet left him, and went his way home again, highly unſatisfy'd with what had been done. Saul, after this, with ſix hundred men only, and his ſon Jonathan, marched to Gibeah, the greater part of his people unarmed too; for there was little iron in that country; and none of the Hebrews permitted to exerciſe the trade of armourers, as we have ſaid already.

Samuel goes back again much unſatisfy'd, 1 Sam. xiii. 15.

Saul marches with 600 men, and his ſon Jonathan to Gibeah, Ver. 16.

The Philiſtines in three bodies break into the country of the Hebrews V. 17,

THE Philiſtines divided their army into three bodies, and ſo marched three ſeveral ways into the country of the Hebrews, where they ravag'd and deſtroyed all the way they went. Saul and his ſon, with Ahiah the high-prieſt (of the houſe of Eli) helpleſly looking on from an eminence near hand, but in no condition (to their infinite affliction) of contributing to their relief.

JONATHAN was ſo tranſported with the ſpectacle of this outrage, that he took his armour-bearer aſide upon it, and put a ſhort queſtion to him how far he would ſtand by him in a bold and generous enterprize, for the ſaving of his country? His anſwer was (and he bound it with an oath too) that let the hazard be what it would, he would die at his feet. Now the plot was this, that Jonathan and his armour-bearer ſhould convey themſelves ſecretly into the enemy's camp, and try what they could do to put them into a tumult and confuſion. So they went away down the hill toward the enemy's quarter, who were poſted in a craggy place that ran out at length into three angles, encompaſſed every where with rocks, that were as good as ramparts, to keep off an enemy. The place was ſo ſtrong of itſelf, that there hardly needed any guard to defend it, the paſſage to it being not only difficult, but dangerous, and almoſt inacceſſible. As they two were upon the way, Jonathan told his armour-bearer, for his comfort and encouragement, "If, (ſays he) they diſcover us, and "call out to us to come up, you may depend "upon it that we ſhall ſucceed; but if they ſay "nothing at all, we muſt content ourſelves "to go back again as we came."

A generous reſolution of Jonathan and his armour-bearer to ſteal privately into the enemy's camp, 1 Sam. xiv. 1.

Jonathan's diſcourſe to his armour-bearer, V. 6.

WHEN they were come within a very little of the enemy's camp, the Philiſtines got ſight of them, and made ſport of it from one to another, how the Hebrews were come creeping out of their holes and burrows; calling out to Jonathan and his companion, to come up to them, and take the reward of their impudence: Theſe words were looked upon by Jonathan as a moſt auſpicious preſage of victory; and ſo they went on from one ſide of the rock to the other, where the very ſituation was look'd upon to be defence ſufficient without a guard. They at laſt however, gain'd the ſummit of the rock, though not without infinite toil and difficulty; and from thence, fell upon the enemy at unawares, cutting off a matter of twenty of them in their ſleep. The alarum the enemy took upon this aſtoniſhing ſurprize, put the whole army into ſuch a terror and conſternation, that ſome threw down their arms, and made the beſt ſhift they could to ſave themſelves by flight; others (being of ſeveral nations) fell foul upon one another, not knowing friends and foes aſunder. Some were forced into Rivers, and down precipices, and into the certainty of death, to avoid the very fear of it: Others, as it happens commonly in tumults, were trod to death in the crowd, tumbling one over another.

The Philiſtines ſurprized in their ſleep: And in that fright and confuſion, they run ſeveral ways, and deſtroy one another, V. 16.

BY this time the king had intelligence brought him by his ſcouts, that the army of the Philiſtines was all in confuſion and diſorder. And the firſt thing he did was to enquire if any of his own people were miſſing, and word was ſoon after brought him, that Jonathan and his armour-bearer were not to be found. Upon this information, he appointed the high-prieſt to put on his ſacerdotal veſtments with his ephod, and to conſult God about the event of this action. He did ſo, and brought him for anſwer, that God would make him victorious, to the utter confuſion of his enemies: Whereupon Saul drew out immediately, and preſs'd in upon the Philiſtines, while they were in diſorder, and deſtroying one another. The rumour of this fatal diſtraction was made publick every where, and came at laſt to the ears of the fugitive Hebrews in their very dens and caverns. Upon this intelligence they ſally'd out from their ſeveral retreats, to the number of about ten thouſand men in the whole, and preſs'd ſo hard upon the Philiſtines, that they had the chace, and the execution of them at pleaſure. But the king, after all this, was ſo unhappy yet as to commit a great overſight in the very courſe of his ſucceſſes, whether out of an impotency of mind under ſo ſurprizing a joy, (as that's a common caſe) or out of inadvertency, is not the queſtion. But ſo it was, that Saul, in the vindictive reſolution of making but one work of a total extirpation of the Philiſtines, pronounc'd a heavy curſe upon that Hebrew, whoever he were, that ſhould preſume, barely to intermit the ſlaughter and purſuit of the enemy, though but by eating or drinking any thing, before the night parted them. Soon after the denouncing of this malediction, Jonathan had the hap, paſſing through a wood of the Ephramites where there were Bees, to find the droppings of ſome honey. He took a comb, and ſuck'd it, knowing nothing as yet of his father's vow, and the ſolemnity of the people's conſent to it; but when they came afterward to admoniſh, and inform him of the malediction, with all the circumſtances, Jonathan gave over eating, and not without ſome reflection upon the temerity of the vow: "For, ſays "he, when men are ſpent and weary, a little "refreſhment would have enabled them to "go through with their work, with more "alacrity and vigour."

AFTER the ſlaughter of a great many thouſands of the Philiſtines, upon the place, the Hebrews returned at night to the rifling of the camp; camp; where, beſide other booty, they took a prodigious quantity of cattle, which they kill'd as they had occaſion; dreſſing and eating them with the blood in them. This being an offence againſt their law, the ſcribes immediately complained of it to the king, who preſently commanded a huge ſtone to be ſet up in the middle of the field; ordering the beaſts to be killed upon that ſtone, and the fleſh not to be eaten till it ſhould be firſt drained and purged of the blood; for that it was an abomination in the ſight of God. This decree was readily obey'd, and ſo Saul erected an altar (the firſt of his ſetting up) and offer'd burnt ſacrifices upon it.

Saul erects an altar, and ſacrifices, Ver. 35.

Now Saul's heart being mightily ſet upon a full and final deſtruction of the Philiſtines, he thought it highly adviſable, without giving the enemy any time for the recovery of their broken ſtrength and courage, to follow his blow againſt the miſerable remainder of thoſe that eſcap'd, that very night; to the executing of which deſign the ſoldiers ſhew'd all the forwardneſs imaginable. But however, before he would attempt any thing farther upon the ruins of the ſcatter'd troops, he appointed the high-prieſt to conſult the will of God upon the iſſue of this enterprize; who returned anſwer to the king upon this application, that the oracle was ſilent. "Well! (ſays Saul) it "is not for nothing that God keeps himſelf "thus upon the reſerve on this occaſion, who "has been formerly ſo gracious as to prevent "our very requeſts by granting them before-"hand, and therefore there muſt be ſome ſe-"cret myſtery of iniquity in this matter, to "draw his diſpleaſure upon us: So that I am "reſolved to ſift it out; and by that holy "God, I ſwear, if I ſhould find even my ſon "Jonathan himſelf to be the guilty perſon, "his life ſhould anſwer for't, with no more "concern to me than if he were a ſtranger." The multitude unanimouſly agreed to put it to the teſt, and immediately thereupon, Saul order'd the people to keep together as they were, himſelf and his ſon ſtanding apart, and ſo to try the iſſue by lots. The lot falling upon Jonathan, his father bad him bethink himſelf, what ill thing he had done that he could charge upon his conſcience. Truly, ſays he, I know nothing more than this: That yeſterday, upon the purſuit of the enemy, I taſted a little honey, knowing nothing at all of any decree of yours to the contrary. Why then, ſays Saul, with another oath, "you ſhall die for't; "for the reverence I have for my vow, is more "to me than all the kindred and tenderneſs "in nature." The young man was not at all daunted with the apprehenſion of death; but with a brave and generous reſolution, he told his father, that he did not deſire to be forgiven; for "that death, ſays he, ſhall be wel-"come to me, that acquits my father of the "obligation of a religious vow, and only be-"fals me in conſequence of ſo glorious a vic-"tory. I have liv'd long enough, ſince I "have liv'd to ſee the pride and inſolence of "the Philiſtines brought down by the He-"brews, which will ſerve me for a conſola-"tion in all my other ſufferings." The whole multitude was ſo charm'd with the piety and bravery of the young man, that in a tranſport of tenderneſs and compaſſion, they reſcued him out of the hands of his incenſed father, with an oath, that "they would not ſuffer a hair "of that perſon's head to be touch'd, who "had been ſo inſtrumental in that victory, to "the preſervation of them all; only they be-"ſought God to forgive him for what he had "done amiſs."

The high-prieſt conſults God upon the proſecuting of the war, and the oracle is ſilent, Ver. 37. Saul ſuſpects ſome ſecret iniquity, and puts it to the lot to diſcover where it lies, with an oath, that the guilty perſon ſhall die, Ver. 38.

After the ſlaughter of ſixty thouſand Philiſtines, Saul returns to his own home. Saul's exploits, children, and conduct, Ver. 49, &c.

AFTER the ſlaughter of a matter of ſixty thouſand of the enemy *, Saul returned to his own home, and reigned very happily, acquitting himſelf with great reputation in all his military adventures, againſt the Ammonites, the Moabites, the Philiſtines, the Edomites, and the king of Obat†. He had three ſons, Jonathan, Joſhua, and Melchi-ſhui, and two daughters, Merab the elder, and the name of the other was Michaal. Abner, the ſon of Saul's uncle Ner, was the general of his army. Ner and Kis, the father of Saul, were brethren, and the ſons of Abiel. He had a mighty ſtrength in chariots and horſemen, and ſtill came off victorious, what enemy ſoever he had to do withal. He advanced the Hebrews, in fine, to the higheſt degree of glory, for their martial exploits, and made them formidable to all their neighbours, taking particular care in the choice of his guards, not to have any about him, but the goodlieſt perſons for make, ſtature, and vigour of body, that he could pick up out of his dominions.

CHAP. VIII.

God commands Saul to extirpate the Amalekites; but taking king Agag priſoner, and keeping him alive, he is caſt off for his diſobedience.

Samuel brings Saul a meſſage from God, minding him of his duty to his maker, 1 Sam. xv. 1--3.

ABOUT this time Samuel came to Saul, by the ſpecial direction and appointment of God, with a certain meſſage to him, which was, "to put him in mind, who it was that "advanced him above his fellows to be a king, "and of his duty to the king of kings who "made him ſo; for though he was a ruler "over the people, it was yet but in ſubordi-"nation to the ſovereign ruler of the univerſe." And he had in charge, he ſaid, to tell him farther, that "whereas the Amalekites had been "great perſecutors of the Hebrews in the "wilderneſs, upon their coming out of Egypt "into the land which they then poſſeſs'd, it "was therefore the will of God that he ſhould "declare a war againſt them; and that upon "ſubduing them by arms, he ſhould not ſpare "ſo much as one living ſoul, man, woman, or "child; nay, that he ſhould deſtroy the very "ſheep and oxen, and every thing elſe that "belonged to them, as well as the people, "without making profit of the ſpoil, or ſeiz-"ing any part of the booty to himſelf; for "all their goods and poſſeſſions were to be "dedicated to God in one common ſacrifice.

* The Scripture does not here expreſs any determinate number of enemies ſlain by Saul; only 1 Sam. xiv. 47. 'tis ſaid, "Saul fought againſt all his enemies on every ſide, againſt Moab, and againſt the children of Ammon, "and againſt Edom, and againſt the kings of Zobah, and againſt the Philiſtines; and whitherſoever he turned him-"ſelf, he vexed them."

† Scrip. Zobah.

" The very name of Amalek, according to " what Moſes had order'd, to be expunged " from among mankind; and all this as a juſt " vengeance for former injuries and oppreſ- " ſions, as above."

SAMUEL's inſtructions were peremptory and ſtrict; and Saul, on the other hand, was as forward of his promiſes to obſerve them all to a tittle, and to ſhew his readineſs, not only to do as he was bid, but to put his orders alſo in execution without delay. The next thing Saul had to do, after this, was the drawing of his men together, which upon a review at Gilgal, he found amounted to about four hundred thouſand *, beſide the tribe of Judah, which muſter'd thirty thouſand men of war itſelf. With this army Saul broke in upon the Amalekites, diſpoſing of his ambuſhes upon the paſſes of the woods and rivers, in ſuch manner, that the enemy could make no motion, without the danger of a ſurprize. But from the inſidiary way of skirmiſhing, it came, in a ſhort time, to a capital battle; wherein the Amalekites were routed, and betwixt thoſe that fell in the combat, and thoſe who were cut off upon the purſuit, the whole body was ſo totally deſtroy'd, that there were ſcarce any left to carry the news of the defeat.

Saul muſters four hundred thouſand men, beſide thirty thouſand of the tribe of Judah.

Saul gives the Amalekites a total overthrow, 1 Sam. xv. 7.

AFTER this overthrow of their army, according to what God had foretold, Saul's next work was to attack them in their walled towns and ſtrong holds; ſome they took by ſiege and approach, others by engines, ſtratagem, mines, ſtarving, &c. till in the end, carrying all before them, their rage terminated in an univerſal ſlaughter of men, women, and children; for they look'd upon nothing to be cruel or inhuman that was done either in a juſt war, or in obedience to a divine command, which would have been dangerous to diſpute.

Saul beats them after this out of their walled towns and ſtrong holds.

IN this diſmal calamity, Agag, the king himſelf, was taken priſoner, who was a man of ſo goodly a mien and aſpect, that Saul, even for the ſake of his perſon, reſolved to ſave him; in which unwarrantable diſpenſation, he did but indulge a natural infirmity at his own peril, and in oppoſition to the expreſs command of God; for the Amalekites had made themſelves ſo abominable in the ſight of Heaven, that God's wrath deſcended to their very children, in which caſe nature itſelf would have excus'd a tenderneſs, if there had been any room left for mercy. But ſo it was, that Saul kept Agag alive to gratify his fancy, in contradiction to his duty; and in ſo doing, he laid the foundation of all the miſeries that afterwards enſued to the Hebrews. The people fell into the ſame iniquity alſo with their king, in driving away the Amalekites flocks and herds, and converting to their own uſe the pillage of money and goods, and the beſt of every thing; which was all contrary to God's poſitive order; and in fine, only deſtroying what was not worth the ſaving. In this expedition Saul over-run the whole country, from Peluſium, on the borders of Egypt, to the Red Sea, and laid it all waſte; leaving only the Sichemites in the land of Midian untouch'd; Saul having precaution'd them before the war, not to join intereſts with the Amalekites, but rather to get ſomewhere out of the way, without involving themſelves in the fatality of a judicial ruin that attended them. Now the Hebrews had a particular kindneſs for theſe people, upon the account of ancient affinity; for out of them came Raguel, the father-in-law of Moſes.

Agag taken priſoner, and kept alive, Ver. 8.

The ſoldiers make advantage of the ſpoil, contrary to God's order, Ver. 9.

UPON the credit of this glorious exploit, Saul returned to his own home again, mightily ſatisfied, in appearance, to all manner of purpoſes; both in his honour, and in his conſcience, as if he had not only done the great work of ſubduing the enemy, but kept himſelf to his commiſſion too, in a punctual obedience of his inſtructions. But the king's ſparing of Agag, and the people's making profit of the ſpoil, being two articles ſo expreſly forbidden in Saul's commiſſion, gave great offence; and it would have been look'd upon as an unpardonable contempt, even toward a temporal prince, not to allow him who gives the victory, a right and title to order and diſpoſe the iſſue of it as he pleaſes. Upon this way of proceeding in Saul, according to his own humour, without any regard to the tie of a known duty obliging him to the contrary, God was pleaſed to declare himſelf to the prophet, that it now repented him of ſetting up Saul to be king; for his buſineſs was, he ſaw, to do what he had a mind to do, not what he was commanded to do. This revelation put Samuel in the greateſt confuſion and anxiety of thought imaginable; inſomuch, that he ſpent the whole night following in fervent prayers and interceſſions to God for Saul's pardon; to all which importunities he receiv'd this ſhort and final anſwer, " That it was no longer lenity, but " facility, and a miſtaken mercy, upon any " mediation whatſoever, to paſs over faults " of ſuch a quality, as to make the pardoning " of one offence a manifeſt encouragement to " the committing of another."

God repents that he made Saul king, Ver. 11.

WHEN Samuel found that God was not to be prevail'd withal, on Saul's behalf, he took a journey to him next morning to Gilgal: where the king no ſooner ſaw him approach, but he ran preſently to him, with open arms, embracing and ſaluting him, with a gratulatory thankſgiving in his mouth, for the late victory which God had given them, telling him withal, that for the order of the affair, every thing was done according to his direction. " If it be ſo, ſays Samuel, what mean- " eth this bleating of the ſheep in my ears, " and the lowing of the oxen, which I hear " in the camp? the king told him, thoſe were " only ſome beaſts the people had reſerv'd for " ſacrifices: and then for the Amalekites, he " had deſtroy'd them all but one man, whom " he kept a priſoner, till he might have ad- " vice what ſhould be done with him. Sa- " muel's anſwer was, that God took no de- " light in ſacrifices, but in the righteouſneſs " of good and juſt men: that is to ſay, of ſuch " as obſerve his holy will, and keep his com- " mandments; accounting nothing to be well " done, but what is done in conformity to his " ſacred pleaſure. God doth not conſider the " ſacrifice, but the obedience; and without " that true and only ſacrifice, the fat of beaſts, " and the oblations of gold and ſilver, are but " ſuch oſtentations of a falſe piety, as he nei-

Samuel intercedes to God for Saul, but cannot prevail.

Ver. 14--23.

* This tranſcends the account in Scripture, 1 Sam. xv. 4. which ſays, " And Saul gathered the people together, " and number'd them in Telaim; two hundred thouſand footmen, and ten thouſand men of Judah."

" ther

" ther requires, nor will accept of: but as to " them, on the other ſide, who take delight in " his commandments, and keep his precepts in " mind, and will rather die than depart from " them, God exacts no ſacrifices at their " hands: but whatever they offer, let it be " never ſo mean and poor, the integrity of " the heart gives it a recommendation more " acceptable than all the pomp and oſtenta- " tion of the moſt expenſive ſacrifice.

" I am to tell you now, ſays Samuel, that " you are fall'n under God's diſpleaſure for " the neglect and contempt of his command- " ments. What will you be able to ſay for " yourſelf, when he ſhall call you to an ac- " count for reſerving that for a ſacrifice, which " God had expreſly commanded ſhould be " wholly deſtroy'd? unleſs you look upon de- " ſtroying and ſacrificing to be one and the " ſame thing. For this diſobedience you are " now condemn'd to the loſs of your kingdom, " and of that power which you have moſt dan- " gerouſly abuſed, to the diſhonour of the ſo- " vereign author of your promotion." Saul could not in his conſcience but confeſs himſelf guilty, and own that he had done grievouſly amiſs, in tranſgreſſing the prophet's orders, and going beyond his commiſſion. All he had to ſay for himſelf was, that he lay under a ſort of compulſion, and that the common ſoldiers were ſo intent upon the booty, that he durſt not venture either to oppoſe or reſtrain them; but, ſays Saul, " obtain my pardon only this " one time, and it ſhall be a warning to me to " my life's end, never to do the ſame thing o- " ver again." After this profeſſion of his repentance, he would fain have had Samuel ſtay a little longer, and ſacrifice to God on his behalf: but the prophet foreſeeing that it would be to no manner of purpoſe, left him, and departed.

CHAP. IX.

The renting of Samuel's mantle, an alluſion to the transferring of Saul's kingdom, Ver. 27.

AS Samuel was preſſing to get away, Saul caught hold of his garment to ſtop him a while, and upon that accident the mantle was rent, betwixt them; which the prophet apply'd by an alluſion to Saul, telling him that his kingdom would be torn from him, and given to a man of piety and juſtice. " The " ſentence is paſs'd, ſays he, and it is not with " God as it is with men; for his decrees are " unchangeable." Saul confeſs'd his own iniquity, and the juſtice of God's diſpleaſure: but, ſays he, what is done, cannot be undone: Honour me only before the people, and turn again, that I may worſhip the Lord. So Samuel turned back, and they went and worſhipped together. After this, they brought forth Agag, the king of the Amalekites, who being over-heard to ſay ſomething about the bitterneſs of death, had this reflection turn'd upon him by the prophet: " As thy ſword, ſays he, " hath made many an Hebrew mother miſe- " rable and comfortleſs in the deſtruction of " their children, ſo it is but reaſonable, that " thy mother ſhould be left childleſs too." So the prophet order'd him immediately to be put to death in Gilgal, and he went back himſelf to Ramah.

Agag is put to death in Gilgal, V. 33.

SAUL was come now to be ſenſible of the calamities he had brought upon himſelf by his diſobedience, and ſo went away to his palace at Gibeah, (or the little hill;) nor had he ever afterwards any perſonal conference with the prophet. Samuel was extremely afflicted at the diſmal circumſtances of this ſeparation; but God commanded him, without troubling himſelf any farther about that matter, to take a cruce of holy oil, and go to Bethlehem with it to Jeſſe, the ſon of Obed, and there to anoint ſuch a ſon of Jeſſe king, in Saul's ſtead, as he ſhould be directed to, and one that ſhould be found worthy of the royal dignity. The prophet objecting, that if ever it ſhould come to Saul's ear, he would certainly be the death of him, one way or other. God told him he had nothing to fear from that quarter; ſo he ſet forward to Bethlehem, and got ſafe to his journey's end; where there was great numbers of people met to receive him: every body enquiring the reaſon of his coming thither, and one anſwer ſerv'd for all, That he came to ſacrifice.

Samuel ſent to Bethlehem to anoint ſuch a ſon of Jeſſe king, as he ſhall be directed to, 1 Sam. xvi. 1.

So ſoon as the ſacrifice was over, Samuel invited Jeſſe and his ſons to take a dinner with him. The eldeſt ſon was ſo tall, ſo well made, and ſo graceful a perſon, that Samuel ſaid within himſelf, " This is to be our king." But providence, it ſeems, look'd another way; for upon the prophet's breaking out into admiration at the graces of his perſon, and how worthy he was to be plac'd upon the throne, and putting it to the queſtion alſo, whether this was the man or not that was to be anointed, anſwer was made him, that God does not ſee with the eyes of men; as if the excellency of an external frame of body were enough to entitle a man to the prerogatives of government: but the qualifications that he requires are piety, juſtice, fortitude, nay, and obedience too; all which together make up, in harmony, the beauty of the mind. The prophet, upon this anſwer, appointed Jeſſe to ſend for the reſt of his ſons, and there were five more produced, as goodly and as well-favour'd men as their eldeſt brother, ſix in all. † Their names according to their ſeniority were Eliab, Aminadab, Samma, Nathanael, Rael, and Aſa. Samuel conſulted God now upon this appearance, which of theſe brethren was to be choſen, and the anſwer was, [none:] which put Samuel upon a farther enquiry to the father, what other ſons he had? only one more, (he told him,) who look'd to his ſheep, and his name was David: whereupon the prophet order'd Jeſſe to ſend immediately for him; for that it was not meet to ſit down to an holy banquet without him. The father ſent for him the ſame inſtant, and the ſon came upon the firſt call: he was a youth of a freſh ruddy complexion, a lively martial mien, and with all this, a great deal of modeſty and good nature in his countenance. Upon the firſt ſight of him, Samuel whiſper'd the father, that this was the perſon God had deſign'd for their king: ſo the prophet ſeated himſelf, with the young man next him; and after them, the father, with the reſt of his ſons. When they were thus diſpos'd of in their places, Samuel, in the ſight of David, took out the holy oil, and anointed him; telling him in his ear, "That it was God's will, he ſhould "take the kingdom upon him; ſtrictly admo- "niſhing him to do juſtice to his people, and to "keep God's commandments; for in ſo doing, "ſays the prophet, you ſhall ſtand firm in your "government: the name and honour of your "family ſhall be glorious to after-ages: you "ſhall triumph over the Philiſtines, and be "victorious over your enemies in all encoun- "ters: you ſhall live great, and be yet great- "er in the fame of your memory."

And " Samuel ſaid unto Jeſſe, are here all thy children? and he ſaid there remaineth yet the youngeſt, &c." youth

David being come, they all ſit down, and Samuel anoints David king, 1 Sam. xvi. 12, 13.

When Samuel had made an end of his charge, he departed, and the ſpirit of God paſſed from Saul to David; by the power and virtue of which ſpirit, David at that time began to propheſy: when all on a ſudden, Saul was taken with fits and fancies of ſuffocation, and difficulty of breathing, like a Demoniac. The phyſicians could not give any natural or philoſophical account of the diſtemper, but only adviſ'd the having ſome body about him who could ſing, and play upon the harp well, that might be ready at hand to give him the diverſion of an hymn, or ſpiritual ſong, whenever the fit ſeized him. Saul was ſo well ſatisfied with the preſcription, that he preſently order'd ſuch a man, with all care and diligence, to be preſently found out and brought him. One of his domeſticks, upon this hint, told him, that there was one Jeſſe of Bethlehem had a very lovely handſome youth to his ſon, who ſung, and touch'd the harp to admiration. He ſaid he was as brave too as he was beautiful, and every way endowed with ſuitable accompliſhments. Upon this recommendation, Saul ſent a compliment to Jeſſe, giving him to underſtand that he had heard ſo many good things of ſuch a ſon of his, for his courage, loveline ſs, ſkill in muſick, war, and the like, that he had a great mind to ſee him. Jeſſe call'd him out from his flocks, and ſent him to Saul with preſents ſuitable to the occaſion, and the perſon. David, upon his coming to court, was received with great joy; made one of Saul's lifeguard, and treated by him, with remarkable inſtances of eſteem. He was highly acceptable to the king at all times, and upon all accounts; but never more than when he was in his fits; for David was the only phyſician, and his voice and harp the only remedy, that in theſe fits ever had the power to bring him to himſelf again. Saul, in fine, was ſo delighted with him in all reſpects, that with his father's leave and conſent, he took him into his own palace to live with him.

CHAP. X.

The Philiſtines advance with an army againſt the Hebrews. Goliah defies the Iſraelites to a ſingle combat; and David accepts the challenge.

It was not long after this, that the Philiſtines marched againſt the Iſraelites with a prodigious army, and encamped betwixt Shecoth and Azekah; while Saul on the other hand, was at the head of another army, ready to encounter them. He drew out his men upon a mountain, and forced the Philiſtines to quit their camp, and poſt themſelves upon a ſtronger mountain juſt over againſt the Iſraelites, with a valley betwixt the two armies. While they were in this order, there came down from the Philiſtines, one Goliah, a citizen of Gath, a man of a prodigious ſtature, and a ſtrength anſwerable to his height; which was four * cubits and a ſpan; and his armour proportion'd to the ſize and force of his vaſt limbs. His coat of mail weigh'd five thouſand ſhekels; his helmet and greaves of braſs, anſwerable: the head of his ſpear was iron, and weigh'd ſix hundred ſhekels; it was not a ſpear to be carried like a lance, but born upon his ſhoulder. With theſe accoutrements did this mighty man march down the hill, and a troop of armed men at a ſmall diſtance after him, into the middle of the valley, betwixt the two bodies, and there he ſtopp'd, calling out to the Iſraelites with a horrid outcry, after this manner. "I am come hither, ſays he, "you men of Iſrael, to do an office of huma- "nity, and to ſave blood. Why ſhould we "hazard ſo many thouſand lives upon the un- "certain iſſue of a battle, when the cauſe may "be more reaſonably decided by two ſingle "perſons? My buſineſs here is only to do the "part of a champion for the Philiſtines. Do "but you ſend out another man with the ſame "commiſſion from the Hebrews, and leave it "to us two to put an end to the matter in "diſpute, for the prevention of a bloody war. "If he kill me, then will we be your ſer- "vants; but if I kill him, then ſhall you be "our ſervants, and ſubject to us. It is better, "in fine, to expoſe one than all." When he had pronounced theſe words, he went back again to his party. He made the ſame challenge again the very next day, and ſo day after day for forty days together, to the great trouble and amazement both of Saul and of his people, who drew themſelves up every day in order of battle, but were hereby hinder'd from coming to an engagement.

Upon his coming to the camp, Goliah was ſtill bragging, and reproaching the Hebrews, that they had not a man in their army who durſt engage him in ſingle combat. It was David's hap, one time, as he was talking with his brothers about his father's buſineſs, to hear Goliah in the height of his inſolent and extravagant boaſtings againſt the Hebrews. This tranſported David to ſuch a pitch of indignation, that he took up a reſolution himſelf of accepting his challenge, and he told his brothers as much: but Eliab reproved him ſharply for his raſhneſs, telling him he was but a boy, and neither qualified with ſtrength, skill, or experience ſuitable and ſufficient to ingage in ſuch an undertaking. "No, no, ſays he, e'en go to your father, "and to your ſheep again, that is the fitter "employment for you of the two." David had a reverence for his brother, but yet could not forbear ſaying the ſame things over again in the hearing of the ſoldiers, who preſently carried the report of it to the king; upon which David was order'd immediately to be ſent for, where when he came before the king, Saul ask'd him what he had to offer upon that point? "Great prince, ſays he, hope the beſt, "and fear nothing, for I myſelf will take "down the pride of this boaſting man; and "as tall as he is, tread him under my feet. "Your army ſhall appear glorious, and your "terrible enemy become the more ridiculous, "when they ſhall ſee him fall by the hand of "a raw and unexperienced ſtripling." The king ſtood in admiration at the firmneſs and magnanimity of the youth; but he could not yet think it ſafe or prudential, to put the main cauſe to an iſſue upon ſo unequal a match. David perceiving that Saul took his meaſures from the common reaſon of other encounters, gave the king to underſtand, "That this was "not ſo much a challenge to the army, as a "defiance to Heaven itſelf; neither was the "combat to be taken, in truth, for a trial of "skill betwixt Goliah and David, but betwixt "Goliah and the Lord of Hoſts; for it is not "my arm, ſays David, that fights the battle, "but the power of a gracious and an invincible God, that many times brings to paſs, "even by the weakeſt of inſtruments, the nobleſt of his divine purpoſes, for his greater "glory. In that God is my truſt; and I "doubt not but he will ſtill continue to protect, and deliver me in all difficulties, as "he hath done formerly. As I was tending "my father's ſheep once, there came a lion, "and took away a lamb out of the flock; I "purſued him, till turning upon me, I took "him by the tail, and threw him againſt the "ground, and kill'd him. It was my hap to "have another encounter with a bear, upon "the ſame occaſion, and with the like ſucceſs. "Now this blaſpheming foul-mouth'd beaſt, "from their army, is no more to me than a "lion and a bear out of the foreſt. But di"vine juſtice will call this audacious wretch "to an account, and make me the inſtrument "of his vengeance. I do not ſpeak this upon "the impulſe of a raſh and ungrounded confi"dence, but in a full aſſurance of perſuaſion, "that God will avenge himſelf upon this au"dacious wretch; and that even I myſelf ſhall "have the honour of having a hand in the ex"ecution of that juſtice."

He tells of an encounter with a lion and a bear, ibid.

THESE words were deliver'd with another ſort of ſpirit, than the daring heat of youth and hot blood; ſo that Saul looked upon them rather as an inſpiration, than a propoſal of his own proper motion; and being ſo convinc'd, David eaſily obtained his leave, and his benediction both in one; and then accordingly prepared himſelf for the action. To which end Saul accoutered him in his own armour, coat of mail, ſword, and helmet; and ſo bad God ſpeed him. But David not being accuſtom'd to arms, found them rather a burden than a defence; excuſing himſelf to Saul with modeſty and reſpect, that they were much fitter for a prince than for a ſhepherd; wherefore he put them off again, deſiring only that he might be allow'd to fight after his own way. Upon this he took his ſhepherd's ſtaff, a ſling in his right hand, five ſmooth ſtones out of the brook in his ſcrip, and ſo advaneed toward the enemy. When they were come within ſight one of another, and that Goliah ſaw what a diminutive adverſary he had to encounter, with the uncouth appearance of his equipage, he called out to him in deriſion; "Whether he "was come into the field now to beat a dog, "or to fight a ſoldier?" "To beat worſe "than a dog, ſays David." This reproach tranſported the Barbarian into ſo blaſphemous a rage, that he curſed David by his Gods; threatening to give his fleſh for food to the fowls of the air, and to the beaſts of the field. "You come to me, ſays David, with a ſword, "a ſpear, and a coat of mail; but I come to "you with a commiſſion from the living God, "who by my hands will this day deſtroy both "yourſelf and your army; divide your head "from your body, and carry it away with "me, and caſt your carcaſs upon the dung"hill for dog's meat, dog as you are yourſelf. "By this providence it will be made evident "to the whole world, that the God of the "Hebrews takes care of his people, and that "his protection is both their ſtrength and their "armour. As likewiſe on the contrary, that "there can be no ſecurity either in arms or "in numbers, to thoſe that fall under his diſ"pleaſure." The Philiſtine, in the mean time, advanced toward David, as faſt as he was able to march, under the weight of his armour; and with all the contempt imaginable, to think of having to do with ſo raw and undiſciplin'd an adverſary.

David's bravery had more of a divine impulſe in it, than of any thing of hot blood.

CHAP. XI.

DAVID, on the other hand, preſſing forward to the combat, under the conduct and protection of his almighty and inviſible ſecond, took out of his ſcrip one of the ſtones of the brook that he had provided for this occaſion, couch'd it in his ſling, and hurl'd it with ſuch a force at the head of his enemy, that it fractur'd his ſkull, and penetrated his very brain, laying the monſter grovelling, with his face upon the ground, in his laſt ſleep. David immediately runs up to him, and beſtrides him, takes his ſword from his ſide, (having none himſelf,) and cuts off the Philiſtine's head with his own weapon. This exploit had ſuch an effect upon their army, that they fled, and ſcatter'd immediately upon the ſight of it. The loſs of their champion put them into ſuch an aſtoniſhment and deſperation, that all they had to do in the world was by a ſhameful flight, every man of them, to make the beſt ſhift he could for the ſaving of himſelf. Saul and the whole army of the Hebrews, made their advantage of this diſorder, and falling on in the hurry of this terror, with military ſhouts and clamours, had the chace of them to the skirts of Gath, and the very gates of Aſcalon. They reckon'd thirty thouſand kill'd outright upon the purſuit, and twice as many wounded. Saul and his army, at their return, took the pillage of the camp, and ſet fire to it. As for the head of Goliah, David carried that to his own tent, and dedicated the ſword to the Lord.

David carries the giant's head to his own tent, and dedicates the ſword to the Lord, Ver. 54.

THIS brave and generous atchievement of David's raiſed ſoon after a mortal jealouſy and hatred in Saul, which happen'd particularly on this occaſion.

This action drew a dangerous envy upon David, 1 Sam. xviii. 8.

UPON Saul's returning from the victory, the women and virgins went in throngs out of all the cities, ſinging and dancing, with their cymbals and taborets, to meet him upon the way, and wiſh him joy of his ſucceſſes; the women leading the ſong with [Saul hath ſlain his thouſands;] the virgins following it, [and David his ten thouſands.] This preference of David to Saul, in a ten-fold proportion, rais'd ſuch a jealouſy in his head, that he could not think himſelf ſafe after it, ſo long as David had any command near his perſon; wherefore he advanced him to the charge of a colonel; and in truth, his promoting the young man, and putting him upon ſo many hazardous and glorious enterprizes, was not ſo much to do David honour, as to provide for his own ſecurity, in hopes he might fall by the chance of war in a battle; for after ſuch an inſtance of the people's affections to David, as to aſcribe to him the credit of the victory, their next buſineſs would be to transfer the authority of the government, and for him to take it too. But David had the providence of God along with him, wherever he went, and in whatſoever he did; and he had not only won the hearts of the people by the charms of his courage and behaviour, but ſo far gain'd upon the affections of a virgin daughter of Saul's, that her father himſelf took notice of the paſſion ſhe had for him; and in his ordinary diſcourſes upon that ſubject, he ſeemed well enough content that it ſhould be a match; not out of any true tenderneſs and eſteem that he had for David, but as the moſt plauſible cover for a ſnare, that in a ſhort time might probably coſt him his life; which was the very bottom of his deſign.

A virgin daughter of Saul's hath a great eſteem for David, Ver. 20.

Saul offers David his daughter in marriage, for the heads of ſix hundred Philiſtines.

WHILE this treaty was in ſpeculation, Saul caſt out a word by the by. "Let him, ſays "he, bring me the heads of ſix hundred * Phi- "liſtines, as an acknowledgment; and I con- "ſent he marries my daughter." He computed within himſelf, that David was not of a temper to decline any generous enterprize, that carried honour and danger along with it; and that his acceptance of this offer would certainly engage him in ſome deſperate action upon the Philiſtines, that might probably coſt him his life in the attempt. This, ſays Saul to himſelf, will be the more decent way of gratifying my jealouſy and revenge; for it will look better to have him taken off by the hands of the Philiſtines, as my inſtruments, than expreſly by my own order.

SAUL, upon this deliberation, ſet ſome of his domeſticks at work to learn how David ſtood affected to the marriage of his daughter; who gave him to underſtand by inſinuations, that he was in ſo great favour both with king and people, that it was reported Saul intended to make him his ſon-in-law. "You may, per- "haps, reckon it no great matter, ſays David, "to be ſon-in-law to a mighty prince; but "under the circumſtances of my quality and "extraction, I am not vain enough ſo much "as to think on't."

UPON the return of the commiſſioners with an account of their negotiation, Saul ſent them once more back again with further inſtructions. "Tell the young man, ſays he, that "my buſineſs is not either fortune or preſents; "and that whenever I part with my daugh- "ter, ſhe ſhall be beſtow'd, not ſold. The "ſon-in-law that I propoſe to myſelf, muſt be "a man juſt ſo qualified with courage and "other laudable graces, as I find him to be. "Tell him that I expect neither ſilver nor gold "from his father; for I do not want either "money or honour; let him only bring me ſix "hundred Philiſtines heads, which will be far "more welcome to me than any thing, and "the moſt honourable of preſents to my daugh- "ter, in juſtification of her to the whole "world, that ſhe has taken a brave man to "her husband." David apprehended all Saul ſaid, in his propoſal of this affinity, to be ſpoken with ſincerity of heart, without any dilatory conſideration, as to the difficulty of the enterprize he was put upon; and ſo with his companions he immediately ſet about the execution of the conditions, and found God's providence as propitious to him in this, as it had been in former encounters; for his adventure ſucceeded to his wiſh; that is to ſay, he fought the enemy, and, after a great ſlaughter, made a preſent to the king of ſix hundred of their heads, and minded Saul of his promiſe.

David brings the ſix hundred heads, and minds Saul of his promiſe.

CHAP. XII.

Saul gives his daughter Melcha in marriage to David, but deſigns upon his life; and Jonathan from time to time gives him notice of his danger.

SAUL found himſelf ſo engaged that there was no receding from his promiſe without making himſelf a liar, or diſcovering the treachery of his heart, in ſo baſe a deſign upon the life of a generous young man, under the pretext of an honourable affinity: ſo that to avoid incurring publick cenſure and ſcandal, he gave his daughter Melcha † in marriage to David. But this nearneſs of relation wrought no change at all upon the king: for Saul obſerving that David grew every day more and more in favour both with God and man, he fancy'd to himſelf, that ſo long as he liv'd, neither his crown nor his life were in safety: so that he took up a resolution, for the security of both, to have David dispatch'd; designing his son Jonathan, with some of the trustiest of his servants, for his executioners. This strange inconstancy of Saul, not only in withdrawing his affection from so deserving a youth, but entering also into an impious and perfidious design upon his life, struck the son with such an amazement and horror, that what with the natural inclination he had for the person of David, and likewise a profound veneration for his virtue, he went and gave David private notice of Saul's intention; advising him, as he lov'd his life, to keep out of the way: and in the mean time, says he, I will go to my father, and take my time to mention your name to him; for I have a mind to try if I can learn what it is that has given him such an aversion to you, and bring him to better reason; for, says Jonathan, I cannot imagine so much as any colourable pretence for such an indignation and displeasure, against a person who has deserved so eminently well, both from his prince and from his country. Or supposing things at the worst, and that in truth he might have made a false step or two, why are not his services set in balance against it? for the publick owes him a pardon. Jonathan then told David, that he should be sure to have intelligence from time to time how his father stood affected towards him. So David follow'd Jonathan's counsel, and immediately withdrew out of the way.

But at the same time designs upon his life, and tries to bring Jonathan into the plot, 1 Sam. xix. 1.

CHAP. XIII.

Jonathan reconciles Saul to David; and Saul restores him to his former post.

JONATHAN accordingly went the next day to his father, and finding him in a pleasant easy humour, lays hold of the critical minute to say somewhat to him about David. "Father, says he, you have taken up a terrible displeasure against this young man, and given orders for his death; but upon what provocation, or for what fault, great or little, I cannot comprehend. He is a person to whom we stand indebted for our safety, and the destruction of the Philistines, for vindicating the honour of our nation from the scandal of a forty days affront, in the challenge of the giant; and not a creature, but this innocent youth, that had the heart to encounter him: a person that purchas'd my sister for his wife at your own price; to wit, the heads of six hundred philistines, which were punctually counted according to his agreement: A person, in fine, entitled to your esteem and tenderness, both as a brave man, and as a member of your family, which will make up two sensible aggravations of the loss. Be pleas'd to consider too, the injury you do your own daughter in making her feel the mortification of a widow, before she enjoys the blessing of being a mother. Pray be pleas'd to lay these things together, and betake yourself to moderate counsels. Remember who it was that cur'd you of your splenetick fits, and drove the evil spirit from you; and consider the obligation he has laid upon the whole family by that relief; and who it was, next under God, that deliver'd us from our implacable enemies. These are the benefits never to be forgotten, without the infamy of the blackest ingratitude." The strength and equity of this way of reasoning, wrought so effectually upon Saul's rage and jealousy, that he bound himself with an oath, never to do any manner of harm or wrong to David, for the time to come. Jonathan carry'd the news of this reconciliation to David, with an assurance that Saul was pacify'd, and ready to do him all sorts of good offices: in which confidence he carry'd him back again to court, reconciled him to his father, and re-instated him in the same post of service and attendance that he was in before.

Ahimelech relieves him, and Saul puts Ahimelech and the whole sacerdotal race to the sword; only Abiathar escapes. David's miraculous deliverances. The death of Samuel. David marries Abigail. Achish entertains him; gives him Zicklag, and engages him in his war against the Israelites.*

ABOUT this time the Philistines made war afresh upon the Hebrews, and David was sent by Saul at the head of an army to encounter them. They fought a battle, and the Philistines were totally broken and cut to pieces, with a terrible execution. So soon as the action was over, David returned forthwith to the king with an account of the victory. But his reception was not answerable, either to his expectation, or to the merit of his services; for Saul was rather sad, and cast down at the story of the success, than elevated with it, for fear of the consequences of David's growing reputation among the people; for Saul turned every thing that contributed to David's honour and advantage, to his own loss and reproach.

David gives the Philistines a total overthrow, with a terrible execution, Ver. 8. which the ill-natur'd envy of Saul could hardly thank him for.

IT happen'd one day, that Saul, being fallen into one of his fits again, sent for David into his bed-chamber, to sing, and play upon the harp to him, as he lay there upon the couch with a javelin in his hand. David was in the very act of his obedience, singing and playing, as the king had commanded him; when Saul starting up all on a sudden, darted his javelin at him; but David avoided it by a nimble turn of his body, and fled, as fast as he could run, to his own house; where he continued for the remainder of that day. At night there was a guard set upon the house by the king's order, to prevent David's escape, and to bring him in custody next morning as a criminal, to suffer death by a publick sentence; but Melcha, David's wife, and the king's daughter, having very good intelligence of her father's design, ran presently to her husband, and informed him of the danger he was in, charging him, as he lov'd his life, to be gone before the next morning; "For if you should be taken, "says she, my father will certainly put you "to death; wherefore shift for yourself now "in the dark of the night; and may God "lengthen it beyond the ordinary course, "rather than you want time for your escape."

As David was singing and playing to Saul in one of his fits, Saul casts his javelin at him, V. 10. David slips away and gets home. The king orders David to be seiz'd, Ver. 11. Melcha gets an inkling of it and acquaints her husband, and begs him to be gone, ibid.

So

So after a decent interchange of all those tendernesses that naturally occur in such cases, the royal couple were now upon the very point of parting, with mutual protestations, that neither of them either would, or could live without the other. This was the farewel; and so Melcha let her husband down from the window by a rope, committing him to providence.

Melcha lets her husband down at the window, 1 Sam. xix. 12.

By break of day came Saul's messengers to the house, to apprehend David; but Melcha told them he was sick in bed, and after a very bad night on't, was now fallen asleep; so she shew'd them the bed, which she had dress'd up on purpose for the fallacy, and somewhat panting under the coverlet, which they took for the sick man. All pass'd for current with the messengers, and so they returned to the king, with an account of every thing; but Saul sent them back again the next morning, with a peremptory command to bring David away as they found him; for die he must. Upon the second search, they turn'd up the bed-cloaths, and perceiv'd that Melcha had put a trick upon them; for there was no David to be found. Now the panting under the blankets was only a device of Melcha, who had convey'd into the bed the warm liver of a kid newly kill'd, to represent the palpitation. The officers told the king the whole business, and how his daughter had impos'd upon them. Saul reprimanded her severely for being so base as to take part with an enemy against her father; but she invented this plausible excuse to save herself by, viz. That her husband swore he would kill her if she would not undertake to conceal him, and help him away; and therefore she hoped he would pass over what she had done under such a force; for she must have sacrificed the life of his daughter, if she had not saved the life of his supposed enemy.

David with Samuel at Ramah, V. 18.

MELCHA had now obtained her pardon, and David was escaped safe to Samuel at Ramah, where he gave the prophet the history at large of the snares which had been laid for him; the adventure of the javelin, &c. without any pretence all this while of the least failing in matter of duty and respect, or of any miscarriage in his commissions; for God had still prosper'd him in whatsoever he undertook; and it must be added now for a farther aggravation, that God's peculiar favour toward him, was the very ground of all the hatred and envy that was stirr'd up against him.

The more God favours David, the more Saul envies him. Samuel takes David with him from Ramah to Galbaah. Ver. 19--22.

WHEN Samuel came to understand the extravagance and iniquity of Saul's way of proceeding, he took David along with him from Ramah to Galbaah *, and there they continued a while together; but so soon as Saul had gotten intelligence of David's being with the prophet, he sent a party of soldiers to take him up, and bring him away a prisoner; but the messengers, upon their arrival, found Samuel in the congregation of the prophets; and after a while, by the same spirit, they began to prophesy themselves too. Saul having notice of this, sent others, and then others, again and again still, upon the same errand, and it fared with them as with the former. Upon the third disappointment, all in a rage, Saul went himself, and when he was come almost to the place where Samuel was, the spirit of prophecy seized him also; and going a little farther, the impulse was so strong upon him, that he stripp'd himself stark naked, and prophesied a whole day and night so, in the sight of David and Samuel.

DAVID all this while thought himself very ill us'd by the king, considering how dutiful and useful he had been to him; but upon making his complaint to Jonathan, of the hard measure he had receiv'd, he advis'd him not to judge, or to suspect rashly, nor to be led away with private tales and suggestions, but rather to depend upon himself, that there was no mischief intended him by his father, who seldom did any thing of consequence without making him privy to it; or if any such thing had been, he himself would certainly have disclosed it to him. David on the other hand, affirmed with an oath the truth of the whole matter as he had set it forth, and besought Jonathan to venture rather to be a little credulous, where the life of his friend was at stake, than to suspend his belief, upon the hazard of coming to be convinc'd of his error by the loss of his friend. Neither is it to be imagined, says he, that the king, who knows you and me to be so particular friends, should ever communicate to either of us, a design he has upon the life of the other. David's discourse had more weight in it than Jonathan could have wish'd; so that being half convinc'd, and in some trouble at it, he only desir'd David to make use of his service, if there was any thing in the world wherein he might be useful to him. "I am sensible, "says David, of your good-will and readi- "ness to oblige me, and in that confidence I "am to mind you, that we are to have a "new moon to-morrow, and a festival in "course. The king will be there; and while "I was in waiting, I had the honour to be "one of the number myself. Now, if you "please, I can go out of the city, and pri- "vately wait your leisure somewhere about "the fields, where you may find me out. "If the king should ask for me, you may tell "him, that I am gone to Bethlehem, to cele- "brate the day with my own tribe, and that "I had your leave to go. If he shall speak "any thing kindly upon it as a good jour- "ney to him, or a God speed him, take that "for a certain token that he has no malice in "his heart against me; but if otherwise, you "are to take it for granted that he bears me a "grudge. Pray let me hear how you find "him, as you will be just to that sacred and "mutual league of friendship that is struck "betwixt us, and as you desire to make me "easy under my present calamity. If you "can think me unworthy of your affection, "or any way guilty toward your father, e'en "sheath your sword in the heart of me, "without waiting for further orders." Jonathan took these last words a little unkindly, but yet promis'd to do every thing as he was desir'd; and that if ever he should find his father in any plot or practice against David, he would be sure to give him timely notice of it; sealing this promissory declaration of his with the solemnity of an oath, that he would leave nothing unattempted that might conduce to his preservation. " says he, who fills and governs the universe, " and who knows the thoughts of my heart " in the very conception of them; let that God, " says he, be a witness to the faith that is " vow'd and promis'd betwixt us; and that I " will never give over searching into, and sift- " ing the private deliberations and purposes of " my father, till I shall have discovered the " bottom of his heart, and whether there be " any secret rancour in his thoughts or not, " that may work to your prejudice; and if I " shall be able to make any thing out at last, " whether it be for you, or against you, it " shall be the first thing I do to inform you of " it. The searcher of hearts will bear me " witness that this is true, and that I have " ever made it my earnest prayer to Almighty " God to bless and prosper you in your person " and designs; and you may assure yourself, " that he will be as gracious to you for the " future, as he hath been hitherto, and lay all " your enemies at your feet; which he will " most certainly do, even though my father " and myself should be found in the party " against you. In the mean while, pray be " sure to keep these things in memory; " and if it should be my fate to die before " you, remember to take care of my chil- " dren."

Jonathan and David agree upon a private way of intelligence, Ver. 18--23.

JONATHAN having now pass'd his oath, appointed David to withdraw into a certain part or corner of the field, which they two had agreed upon. " For, says Jonathan, I " will first go to my father, and when I have " sounded him as far as I can, I will come " back again to your hiding-place, as if I were " a shooting, and bring a boy along with me. " I shall then shoot three arrows, and if I bid " the lad take them up and bring them to me, " set your heart at rest, that all is well with " my father; but if I say any thing else, " take it for granted that you are in danger; " but assure yourself, however, happen what " will, it shall be my particular care that " you come to no harm. Only once again I " say, let not this friendship be forgot in the " days of your prosperity, but let it extend " to my children." David having received these assurances from Jonathan, went to the place according to appointment.

THE day following was the feast of the New Moon, where the king, according to custom, having duly prepar'd himself, sat down to supper, with Jonathan on his right hand, and his general Abner on the left, David's place being empty all this while. But Saul took no publick notice of it the first day, supposing that his absence might possibly be matter of scruple, for want of a regular and customary purification, after the company of his wife.

Saul enquires for David at a festival, Ver. 27.

Jonathan excuses him, Ver. 28, 29.

But Saul missing him again the next day, enquired of Jonathan, how it came to pass, that the son of Jesse should now absent himself from the festival two days together? Jonathan told his father, that he had given him leave to go into the country, and feast with his own tribe, upon the same occasion. " He " would fain have had me along with him, " says Jonathan, and truly I have so great a " friendship for him, that, if you please, I " should be well enough content yet to go to " him." This expression of Jonathan's provok'd Saul not a little, so that he was no longer able to conceal the mortal hatred he had for David, but broke out into an extravagant passion against his son upon it, calling him a traitor, and an enemy to his father; an abettor of, and a confederate with David, and a shameless conspirator with the common adversary of the family; for he must be wilfully blind, says he, that cannot see the absolute impossibility of Saul's ever being safe, so long as David is living; commanding him also at the same time to send for him, and deliver him up to justice. Jonathan, upon this, desir'd of his father very respectfully, to know what capital crime was objected against David.

Saul calls Jonathan a traitor to his father, Ver. 30.

This question transported Saul into such a rage, that he snatch'd up a javelin there within reach, and had certainly kill'd his son with it, if some of his friends then present had not interposed, and prevented it. There needed no other evidence of Saul's deadly malice to David, when the father had like to have murder'd his own son for his son-in-law's sake.

And strikes at him with his javelin, Ver. 33.

THIS furious outrage made Jonathan quit both the company and the feast; and what with the trouble he had upon him for his friend's danger, and what for his own, he pass'd that night without any rest either of body or mind; so that early the next morning, he took his bow and arrows, and a boy along with him, into the fields, under the pretext of going a shooting, but in truth, to give David the necessary information of what had passed. The first thing he did was to convey his intelligence by his arrows, as he said he would; after which he sent the boy away to the city upon an errand, for the better opportunity of a private conference with his friend. They were no sooner within sight one of another, but David cast himself down at the feet of his preserver, and in that posture saluted him; the other immediately taking him up, and both joining in one another's arms, to curse the malignity of the age, and their own hard fortune, that was now forcing them upon a separation, worse than the worst of deaths. When they had condoled their time out, and indulged all the softnesses of dear and parting friends, they took their final leave, with fresh vows and assurances never to depart from the conditions of their league, and so submitted at last to the necessity of going their several ways.

Jonathan informs David of the whole matter, Ver. 35, &c.

DAVID being now in great distress by the persecution of a watchful and an implacable enemy, and under the consideration of a certain death if he should be taken, went in his wanderings to Ahimelech the high-priest, in the city of Nob. He had no company with him, either friends or servants, which Ahimelech took notice of; and, not without some admiration, ask'd him the reason of it. He came by special order, he said, upon a piece of secret service from the king; and that for privacy sake, he had for the present discharg'd his train, and appointed them a set time and place, when and where they should attend him. He told Ahimelech likewise, that it would be a very friendly office, and a great furtherance to his business, if he would but supply him with necessaries for his journey. This being granted, he told him once again, that if he could but furnish him with a sword, or a ſpear, or any ſort of arms, it would lay yet another obligation upon him. It ſo happened that a certain ſervant belonging to Saul, and a Syrian by nation, was all this while within hearing. His office was that of a groom, and his name Doeg. The high-prieſt, ſaid he, had no arms, but the ſword that kill'd Goliah the Philiſtine, which was hung up and dedicated to God; and that ſword he might have if he pleas'd. David accepted of it; and with this ſword, making what haſte he could out of the juriſdiction of the Hebrews, he fled to the city of Gath in the land of the Philiſtines. This was in the reign of king Anchus.* David had no ſooner made his appearance there, but ſeveral of the king's ſervants call'd him to mind, and immediately acquainted the king, their maſter, that this was the man who had deſtroy'd ſo many thouſands of the Philiſtines. David therefore finding himſelf in as much danger of Anchus now, as he had been of Saul before, fell immediately to foaming at the mouth, and driveling like a mad-man, in order to induce the people of Gath to think him really mad: inſomuch that Anchus ſeverely reprimanded his ſervants, for troubling him with a perſon, who was not in his right ſenſes; and accordingly order'd him inſtantly to be turn'd out of his preſence and houſe.

By this artifice he got clear of Gath, and from thence eſcaped into the tribe of Judah, where he took up his reſting-place for ſome time in a cave in the field of Adullam, from whence he ſent to his brethren, to let them know where he was. His friends and relations, (and in truth other people promiſcuouſly) being advertis'd of the place of his preſent abode, came flocking in to him: ſome for the love and reſpect they bore to himſelf; others out of fear or hatred of Saul: ſome in fine, who were uneaſy in their fortunes, others in their minds, being unſatisfy'd with the preſent ſtate of things; ſo that upon the whole there were a matter of four hundred of them gotten together, and every man devoted to the ſervice of David with life and fortune.

In the ſtrength and confidence of this little body, David remov'd and march'd directly away to the king of Moab, with an addreſs to him for leave to himſelf, with his friends and relations there, being under ſome difficulties, to take ſanctuary in ſome part of his dominions, only till the ſtorm might blow over, and their affairs be put into ſome ſort of ſettlement at home. The Moabite king received David and his company very generouſly, and treated them with great honour and hoſpitality for the time they were there: that is to ſay, till by the order and direction of the prophet Samuel, David marched away with his people out of the deſart into the land of Judah, and ſo to Saris †.

When Saul came to underſtand (and it was not long firſt) that David had been ſeen upon his march in the head of a body of armed men, he was not a little terrify'd and troubled at the intelligence; for he had ſeen ſo many experimental proofs of the greatneſs of David's ſoul and courage, that he could not but reaſonably expect ſome mighty matter from him; which he apprehended would tend at leaſt to the perplexing and diſordering of his counſels, if not to the endangering of the very government itſelf. Upon this occaſion, he convened all his friends and captains, the people of his own tribe, and all his officers, civil and military, at his royal city of Gibeah; and there enthroning himſelf, at a place they called the Field, with his men of war, honour and buſineſs, about him, he ſpake to them from his poſt of ſtate, after this manner:

" Taking for granted, my friends and fel" low-tribeſmen, that the good offices I have " done you, the poſſeſſions I have beſtow'd upon
" you, the honourable and profitable commiſ-
" ſions that I have given you, are not as yet
" ſo abſolutely ſunk and bury'd, as to be quite
" out of your memory; I ſhall now put this
" ſhort queſtion to you; whether or no do you " expect greater benefits and advantages from
" the ſon of Jeſſe, than you have received " from me? for I find it manifeſtly, that all " your inclinations biaſs that way; and that " my ſon Jonathan miniſters both an example
" and an authority for your ſo doing: for I " am no ſtranger to the ſolemnity of a ſtrict " league and confederacy betwixt him and " David; nor of his abetting the cauſe of my " adverſaries with his power, intereſt, and " counſels. Now this is a matter that you " never trouble your heads about; but ſit look" ing on as idle ſpectators, in a careleſs indif" ference for the event."

These words of the king were follow'd with a general ſilence, till Doeg the groom, a Syrian, deliver'd what he had to ſay upon the point then in queſtion. The account he gave was this: " When I came, ſays he, to " the city of Nob, to the high-prieſt Ahime-
" lech, I ſaw David there to conſult the ora" cle. Ahimelech gave him conveniencies for " his journey, and the ſword of Goliah, and
" ſo helped him forward to go whither he
" pleaſed." After this declaration of Doeg, Saul order'd the high-prieſt to be ſent for with all his relations; to whom the king ſaid as follows:

" What have I done to make you give this " encouragement to a traytor to his prince?
" for the ſon of Jeſſe is no better. And yet
" who but you to entertain him; furniſh him " with proviſions and arms, and give him an-
" ſwers from the oracle, of the ſucceſs of his " deſigns! you cannot be ignorant that he is " now run away, in the conſcience of the ma" lice he has for my family, and in the fear of " being ſeized and puniſh'd for't."

The high prieſt made no oppoſition to the truth of the charge; but frankly confeſs'd that the reſpect he had ſhewn David, was not done ſo much out of regard to him, as to the king himſelf; for, ſays he, " I did not receive him
" as your enemy, but as the faithfulleſt of your " friends and officers; and, which is more, in " the quality of your ſon too, and a relation
" in ſo tender a degree of affinity and alliance:
" For how ſhould any body imagine that man
" to be your enemy, upon whom you have " conferr'd ſo many honours? or why ſhould
" not I rather preſume ſuch a perſon, without " any farther enquiry, to be your ſingular " friend? If he conſulted me about the will of " God, it is not the firſt time that he has " done it, nor the firſt time that I have given " him an anſwer: neither has it been always " alike. He told me that he was ſent in haſte

This was all plauſible and fair; but the fear of the danger wrought more upon Saul than the apology, though never ſo juſt; ſo that without giving any credit to the excuſe, he commanded the guards about him to ſeize Ahimelech and his family, and put them all to the ſword. The Hebrews flatly refus'd to execute ſo ſacrilegious a commiſſion; for it was no leſs, in the conſtruction of their religion, than to put any man to death who ſerv'd at the altar. Upon this ſcruple and denial, the charge was committed to Doeg the Syrian, who with an impious band of ruffians and aſſaſſins, like himſelf, began with the high-prieſt, and went through his whole family, to the number of three hundred and eighty five perſons *. This barbarous maſſacre was no ſooner over, but the ſame helliſh crew was diſpatch'd away to Nob, the ſeat and reſidence of the prieſthood, on the ſame errand; where they kill'd all the inhabitants they could find, to a ſingle perſon, ſparing neither age nor ſex; and, in concluſion, they laid the whole town in aſhes. Abiathar, the ſon of Ahimelech, was the only perſon that eſcap'd in this butchery, to verify an ancient revelation from God to the high-prieſt Eli, foretelling him, that the iniquity of his two ſons would in time to come be puniſh'd with the rooting out of the family. This execrable cruelty of Saul, in the extirpation of the ſacerdotal race, the putting of old men, women, and children to the ſword, without either pity for the one, or reverence for the other; the deſtroying of a city which God himſelf had honour'd with a peculiar privilege, by ſetting it apart as a nurſery for prieſts and prophets: this barbarous courſe, I ſay, of inhuman violences, ſhews us the licentious corruptions of fleſh and blood, when unbridled nature is left to itſelf, without any external check upon it. While men are low, poor, and impotent, in fear of laws and penalties; and in truth, under ſome ſort of neceſſity to appear honeſt, for want of power to be wicked, how temperate, juſt, and gentle; nay, how religious do they pretend to be? They live as if they own'd a providence, and believ'd the omnipreſence of an Almighty and an All-ſeeing God. But ſo ſoon as ever they come to be deliver'd from the clogs and impediments of theſe inabilities, and advanced to the authority of prerogative and government, they are no longer the ſame men, but ſhift like ſtage-players, and lay by their old manners with their dreſs, changing both the ſcene and the perſon. They grow bold, proud, and inſolent, quitting all reverence, either for God or man; and inſtead of exerciſing that piety and juſtice which can only ſecure men in that eminent ſtation from the ſtroke of detraction and envy, (for their very thoughts, as well as actions, in that height of elevation are expos'd to common cenſure:) they live and act, as if either God knew not what they did, or as if their greatneſs had tranſported them out of the reach of divine juſtice. When this arrogant vanity is once upon the wing, what havock does it make of men, and of things! what hurly-burlies and confuſions in the world! they govern by their paſſion, not their reaſon. Vain fears and groundleſs averſions toward ſome, and partial prepoſſeſſions of favour toward others, are the only counſellors they adviſe with. Now the reſult of theſe dictates is that which they impoſe upon the world for no leſs than a decree ratified in Heaven; and all this while, not one word or thought of the future. As for thoſe, in fine, who have done them ſignal ſervices, they commonly make them early acknowledgments, by honours and rewards; but then it is in every informer's power, by ſubornation or calumny, to ſtrip them for a word ſpeaking, not only of their dignities, but of their lives too; and all this without proof, probability, trial, nay, or ſo much as examination. And this tyranny exerciſes itſelf not ſo much upon the guilty, who deſerve to be puniſh'd, as upon the innocent, who may be oppreſs'd without danger.

WE find all this to be punctually made good in the preſent inſtance of Saul, the ſon of Kis, who was the firſt king of the Hebrews after the diſſolution of the Ariſtocracy, and the taking of the adminiſtration out of the hands of the judges. He put to death three hundred prieſts and prophets, upon the caprice of a bare jealouſy of Ahimelech. He laid their city in rubbiſh, kill'd all that were in it, and buried the dead under the ruins of it; doing all that in him lay toward the utter extinction of the ſacerdotal order and race, without leaving ſo much as one prieſt alive to ſerve at the altar, or any habitation to receive them. Abiathar, the ſon of Ahimelech, was the only man that eſcaped; and he carried the diſmal tidings of the deſtruction of his father and his family to David; which was no more, he ſaid, than he expected, when he ſaw Doeg there; who, he was ſure, would put the worſt comment of his having been with his father, to the king; and, in fine, he told Abiathar, that it was a very bitter affliction to him, to find himſelf any way the occaſion of ſo dreadful a calamity. But, ſays he, ſince it is ſo, keep you where you are, and ſtay with me, for you can be no where ſafer.

ABOUT this time there was word brought to David, that the Philiſtines were enter'd with an army into the province of Keilah, burning and deſtroying all before them, wherever they came. David had a mind to attack them, but not without conſulting the prophet first, for encouragement and direction. The prophet bad him go on and prosper; whereupon he presently drew out, fought the enemy, and routed them with a very great slaughter, and carried off a considerable booty. After this, he staid a while in Keilah, for a guard to secure them whilst they got in their harvest. Saul soon received a particular account of David's abode, and likewise of the action, as it was too considerable to lie long conceal'd. It was also observable, that the relation was deliver'd much to David's honour. Upon the intelligence of David's shutting himself up in a walled town, Saul look'd upon his business to be as good as done, and as the favour of a singular providence that had put his enemy into his hands; so that he gave out orders immediately for the besieging of Keilah, and not to quit the place till David should be brought to justice. But David being premonished by a revelation, that if he did not seasonably provide for himself, the people of Keilah would deliver him up to the king to save themselves, he quitted the city, and betook himself with his four hundred men into the desart, where he encamped upon a hill that was well fortified, by the name of Engelaïs *; but Saul understanding that David had left Keilah, countermanded his orders for the siege too; while David, with his people, removed out of the wilderness to Cæna, a place belonging to Ziphe, where Jonathan, the king's son, came to him, and saluted him with an intent to have some conference with him about things to come. He bad him despond of nothing; for all those present difficulties would vanish; for the time, he said, was at hand, when the whole nation of the Hebrews should be his subjects; advising him to consider, that blessings of that quality were not to be compass'd without toil and hazard. So they renewed their league of friendship over again, confirming it with a sanction of most dreadful imprecations upon him who should first act contrary to covenants; the obligation to be for life, and God to be a witness to it. This solemnity being performed, Jonathan left David there, much easier, and better satisfied than he found him, and so returned to his own home.

WHILE this was a doing, the men of Ziphe, to curry favour with the king, gave him to understand that David lay skulking about their grounds, and undertook, if Saul would be pleased to come to their assistance, to deliver him up; for it was but the securing of some narrow passes, and it would be impossible for him to escape. Saul highly extoll'd the zeal and good-will of the Ziphites, with very gracious acknowledgments of the obligation they had laid upon him, in telling him where he might find his enemy, and promis'd them large requitals also for the service they had done him; so he presently sent away his agents, if possible, to find out David, and to search all the hiding-places in the desart for him, promising to follow them himself in a very short time with his army. The people of Ziphe were wonderfully forward and officious, not only to serve as guides toward the discovery of David in his haunts, but for the very seizure of his person, and the delivering of him up into the king's power. But after all the villainy of this pragmatical zeal, their malicious purpose was at last disappointed. Now they might have held their tongues in the case, with all the security imaginable; so that the baseness of their thrusting themselves into the treachery of betraying a pious and an innocent person to ruin and destruction, contrary to law and justice, was only a scandalous wicked office, undertaken for the very wickedness sake; but mercenaries and parasites will stick at nothing.

The Ziphites officiousness to find out David, Ver. 22.

DAVID being seasonably advertis'd of the malicious conspiracy of the Ziphites, and of the king's being upon his march in prosecution and in favour of it, he quitted the place where he was before, and made away, as fast as he could, to a great rock in the wilderness of Maon. Saul having gotten intelligence upon the way, of David's removal, and what course he took, closely pursued him, and was come so near him, that Saul was on one side of the rock, and David on the other, and just ready to be hemm'd in, beyond all possibility of escaping; but by great providence, just in this precise instant, came the sad news to Saul, that the Philistines had broken in upon the Hebrews, and were ravaging their country. This intelligence diverted Saul from his pursuit of David, chusing rather to turn his arms upon the sworn enemies of the nation, and to redeem his country, than run the risque of losing all to gratify a particular pique against one single person. By this blessed providence was David deliver'd beyond all expectation; and his next retreat was to the streights of Engelaïs.

David withdraws to a rock in the wilderness of Maon, ibid. Saul follows him, Ver. 25.

The Philistines breaking in upon the Hebrews diverts him, Ver. 28.

His next retreat is to Engelaïs, Ver. 29.

WHEN Saul had encounter'd and beaten back the Philistines, word was brought to him once again in his return, where he might find David; for that he had been seen somewhere about Engelaïs. Upon this advice, Saul drew out three thousand choice men to march immediately after him. As they were upon the way, and within a little of the place, there was a deep, dark, spacious cave, and Saul stepp'd aside into it alone, as a place of privacy, upon a necessary occasion to ease himself. Now this cave happen'd to be the very place where David and his four hundred followers had hid themselves. One of David's people, who knew Saul very well, had the fortune to discover him, and presently went up to David with the good news, that now was his time to put an end to all his troubles, by taking the opportunity of a glorious revenge, in cutting off the head of his mortal enemy; for God had now deliver'd Saul up into his hands. But it neither suited with David's greatness of mind, nor with the sense and conscience of his duty and allegiance, to lay violent hands upon his anointed lord and master, whom God himself had set over him, and to return evil for evil; so that David only cut off a piece of the skirt of his garment, and so let him go, but repented in the very instant even of that too.

Saul marches after him, and happen'd into the same cave where David and his people were, 1 Sam. xxiv. 3.

David cuts off the skirt of Saul's garment, Ver. 4.

* Scrip Engedi; but 1 Sam. xxiii. 13. from whence this is taken, 'tis only said, "Then David and his men, "which were about six hundred, arose and departed out of Keilah, and went whithersoever they could go," not making any mention of Engedi, or, as Josephus calls it in the Greek, Engelaïs; the name of that place not occurring till the last verse of the same chapter, "Whither, 'tis said, he retreated, after Saul had given over pursuing "him;" as Josephus also observes a little lower.

UPON

UPON Saul's departing out of the cave, David follow'd into the open air, calling out after him. The king, upon the hearing of a voice he was ſo well acquainted with, turned preſently about; and David, with all decency of reverence and reſpect both to the perſon and the occaſion, addreſs'd himſelf to him in words to this effect:

David reaſons the caſe to Saul, in a moſt excellent ſpeech, 1 Sam. xxiv. 9--15.

"IT is a very unhappy thing, ſir, with your "majeſty's gracious leave for this freedom, "when a great prince has his ears ſo open to "calumniators and detractors, as to ſuſpect "the integrity of his try'd and moſt faithful "friends, upon the credit of the vaineſt and "falſeſt of men; that is to ſay, of pick-thank "flatterers and under-hand informers. Were "it not, under favour, a much more laudable "way to put every man to the trial of his ho-"neſty by his works? for words may be falſe "as well as true; but demonſtration by fact "is infallible. You may be pleaſed now, up-"on the force of this ſingle inſtance at preſent "before you, to conſult your reaſon, upon ſe-"cond thoughts; whether or no I have not "had hard meaſure, in being taken for a cri-"minal, upon the ſuggeſtion of an evil inten-"tion that never ſo much as enter'd into my "thought; and yet it has (moſt unhappily to "me) ſo far gain'd belief with your majeſty, "that I go in danger of my life every hour "of the day and night, upon a bare and un-"grounded jealouſy of my guilt. Can any "thing, with pardon, be clearer than the "evidence of your majeſty's miſtake, when "you ſuſpect me for malicious practices upon "your life, as well as on your family? How "will your majeſty look God in the face with "this guilt upon your conſcience, that you "are ſtill practiſing upon the life of a perſon "who had you wholly at mercy, and the op-"portunity of gratifying his revenge, which, "had you had the like againſt me, you would "not have let ſlip out of your hands; and "yet ſpar'd you out of good-nature, juſtice, "and reſpect. Look you ſir, ſays he, I could "as eaſily have taken your head from your "ſhoulders, as this piece of ſtuff from your "mantle, [ſhewing the ſkirt that he had cut "off, to confirm the truth of what he ſaid;] "and yet I had not the heart to indulge a "revenge, though never ſo juſt; while you "at the ſame time, without any difficulty or "ſcruple, purſue me with a moſt injurious "perſecution. But let God judge betwixt us, "who will determine, in the concluſion, "which of the two was in the right."

SAUL was ſo confounded at the modeſty of the young man, and in ſuch admiration at the good-nature and humanity of David, in ſparing his life after ſo many bitter provocations, that he could not forbear groaning upon the thought of it; and upon David's anſwering his ſigh with another, "No, no, ſays "Saul, theſe lamentations will better become "me; for as you, on the one hand, have "been the cauſe and the author to me of a "great deal of good; ſo have I, on the other "ſide, made you a return only of cruelty and "miſery for all your obligations and benefits. "You have in this, ſays he, given viſible de-"monſtration that you are not degenerated "from the generoſity and goodneſs of the "antients; who, when they had their ene-"mies at mercy, choſe rather to diſmiſs them "ſafe and free, than to make an ill uſe of the "advantage they had over them. Now do I "manifeſtly perceive by the paſſages of this "day, that God has ſet you apart for this "kingdom, and that the whole nation of the "Hebrews is to be ſubjected to your govern-"ment; wherefore I have this requeſt to make "of you, that you give me your promiſe, upon "oath, to forgive all the injuries I have done "you; and that when you come to be poſ-"ſeſs'd of your government, you will be mer-"ciful to my family." David paſs'd his promiſe upon oath to do as he was deſir'd, and ſo diſmiſs'd the king, and departed himſelf with his train to the ſtreights of Mizpeh.

And asks David forgiveneſs, Ver. 21, 22.

AT or about this time died the prophet Samuel, a perſon in great reputation among the Hebrews, for his probity and virtue; and the people gave an eminent proof of the eſteem they had for him, in the magnificence and expence of his funeral. They buried him at Ramah, in his own country, and mourned for him afterward a long time, not with the ceremony of a formal publick ſorrow, but every individual had a diſtinct and a particular ſhare in the loſs; for he was a man of a natural benignity and juſtice, and moſt remarkably in God's favour for his virtues. After the death of Eli, he govern'd twelve years alone; and then in the reign of Saul, eighteen years more, ending his days according to the relation that is here ſet forth.

The death of the prophet Samuel, 1 Sam. xxv. 1.

Samuel's character.

THERE lived at that time near the place where David frequented, a certain man of Ziphe, of the city of Emma*, who was very wealthy in herds and poſſeſſions; for he had in his grounds three thouſand ſheep, and a thouſand goats. David was ſo much his friend, that he ſet his own people to aſſiſt in looking after his flocks; forbidding them upon their uttermoſt peril, either for avarice, or for hunger, or upon any other pretence whatever, to touch ſo much as one hair of them; no, though they were abſolutely ſure of not being detected; continually inculcating to them the duty and obligation they lay under of living according to the rules of juſtice, and in conformity to the will of God, who was never pleaſed with any man that coveted, or laid violent hands on the goods of his neighbour. By this good diſcipline, David reſtrained thoſe about him from violences, and kept them within bounds; imagining all this while, that the kindneſs he had ſhewn, and the good and generous offices he had done, were conferr'd on a perſon of worth and honeſty, who would be ſure to make him grateful acknowledgments, and a ſuitable return.

The hiſtory of Nabal, Ver. 2.

BUT Nabal (for that was the man's name) was a brutal ill-natur'd wretch; yet the huſband of a notable, diſcreet, prudent and agreeable woman. One day as he was ſhearing his ſheep, David ſent ten of his people to Nabal with the compliment of a thouſand good wiſhes to him, and deſiring only ſome moderate ſupply of proviſions out of his abundance; for his ſhepherds could inform him, that all the while they had been together in the deſart, they had been ſo far from doing him any injury, that they had rather kept and preſerved his sheep for him; closing the discourse with an assurance, that what friendship soever he should do for David upon this occasion, should be abundantly acknowledg'd. The answer that Nabal returned them was rude and churlish, like himself. "David! says Nabal, why who's "that same David, I wonder?" They told him he was one of the sons of Jesse. "Yes, yes, "says Nabal, your runaway-servants look up- "on themselves to be brave fellows, I war- "rant ye." This contemptuous affront enraged David to that degree, that he immediately put himself at the head of four hundred men, leaving two hundred more behind with the baggage, (his number being now encreased to six hundred) with a vow and determination that very night to cut off Nabal, with his house and family. Now David's indignation against him, was not so much for his barbarity and ingratitude, where he had been so frankly obliged, but for the virulence of so insolent an outrage against a man that never did him an injury.

Nabal's churlishness and ribaldry against David, 1 Sam. xxv. 10, 11.

David vows a revenge upon Nabal, V. 12.

While matters were in this posture, one of Nabal's shepherds and servants carry'd the story of this encounter to the mistress; telling her, how David being distress'd for provisions, and having sent to her husband to desire some small relief of him, was not only refused by him, but answered with unsufferable and opprobrious revilings; though David had ever dealt honourably and respectfully by him in guarding and securing his flocks from injuries and violence; telling her further, what apprehensions they had of the mischief that the sense of this indignity might bring upon herself and her husband. So soon as Abigail, (for so she was called) the wife of Nabal, had heard their story, she presently call'd for the asses out; caused them to be laden with presents, and, unknown to her husband, (who was at that time suddled, and senseless) she put herself upon the way to find out David; whom she met coming down the straits of the mountain, and four hundred men following him, with an intent to take vengeance upon Nabal. Abigail no sooner saw him approach, but leaping from her ass, she threw herself prostrate upon the ground, and "humbly besought David to pass "over the words of her husband, as one whose "name was suited to his nature; Nabal in "Hebrew signifying a fool and a madman. She "pleaded for herself, that she saw none of the "messengers that were sent to her husband; "begged pardon, and desir'd David to give "God thanks for sending her as the instru- "ment to keep his hands from blood: and, "sir, says she, may you still preserve yourself "clear of that pollution, that God may turn "the vengeance that threatens Nabal upon the "heads of your enemies. Be pleased, I be- "seech you, to accept of the good-will of "your poor servant, with these small presents; "and upon my humble request, to pass over "the offence of my husband, who had so just- "ly incurr'd your displeasure; for there is no- "thing so well becoming the character of the "person, that Providence designs for a crown, "as clemency and compassion. David was "pleased to receive the presents, telling her "that she had reason to bless God that put it "into her heart to come hither this day; o- "therwise says he, you should never have liv'd "to have seen another; for I had sworn to "myself to lay your house in ruins this very "night, and not to leave one soul alive in the "family of that ungrateful man, who had cast "so many indignities upon me, and those that "belong to me. You are now come in a bles- "sed hour to allay my rage, and put a stop to "my resolution; but yet after all, though I "am content for your sake, to forgive Nabal's "fault against me, there is a judgment still "behind that attends him; and his ill-man- "ners will be his ruin some other way." With these words, David discharged Abigail, who went directly home, and found her husband carousing among his companions, and so sottishly drunk with wine, that there was no speaking to him that night; but the next morning, when he was become sober, she told him the whole story from beginning to end; which struck him with such an astonishment, that he was seized with a dead palsey upon it, and died in ten days. David, upon the news of his death, was heard to say, that the judgment was righteous, and that God had avenged his cause, while he that receiv'd the injury came off with clean hands. The world may gather from this example, that there's no avoiding the stroke of divine justice; and that it is Providence that governs the world, not passion or chance; but that both good and wicked men are either rewarded or punished in their own kind.

Nabal's wife, Abigail, meets David and pacifies him, V. 23--35.

David pardons Nabal for Abigail's sake, V. 35. but foretels a judgment to attend him.

Nabal dies, as David had foretold, Ver. 38.

After the decease of the husband, David sent a message, and an invitation to the widow; desiring her to come over to him; for he would take her to his bed as his lawful wife. Her answer was, that she was not worthy so much as to wash the feet of David; but she went to him, however, with all her equipage, and became his wife; an honour that she was indebted to for the graces both of her mind and person; for it was her prudence, modesty, and beauty, that recommended her to this preferment. David had also a former wife, [Ahinoam] a native of Abesar; but as for his late wife Melcha, the daughter of Saul, her father gave her away to Phalti, the son of Lisus * of Gethla. It was not long after this, when the men of Ziphe brought a fresh account to Saul, that David was come into their quarters again, and that with a little help he might be easily taken. Upon this intelligence, Saul immediately marched thither with three thousand men; and the night coming on, he pitched his tents at a place called Sicella †. When David came to understand that Saul was moving that way, he sent out his scouts for a particular information where the enemy lay; and word being brought that they had posted themselves near a place call'd Sicella, David got up in the night, and with only Abishai, the son of his sister Zeruiah, and Ahimelech the Hittite, went directly, without the privity of any other person, into the camp of the enemy; where they found the king in his tent, with his general Abner, and his guards about him, all fast asleep.

Abishai, seeing the king in his bed, and his launce by him, would needs have nailed him immediately to the ground; but David held his hands, and told him, "Abishai, says he, "Saul is God's king, and his person sacred, "let the man be never so wicked; and he is "only accountable for the ill management of "his power to him who gave him the power "itself.

" itſelf. But for a proof, however, that I had " him at mercy, though I would not make a " bad uſe of the advantage, I will now take " away his launce and pitcher of water from " his bed-ſide." David leaving the camp as ſilently and unperceiv'd as he came into it, and betwixt the darkneſs of the night, and the ſtrength of his own reſolution, he went his way, without any apprehenſion of danger upon the adventure. He paſs'd the river, and then getting up to the top of a mountain near at hand, within hearing of the camp, he called out from thence to Abner and the guards, as loud as he could, to wake them: Abner ſtarted upon this clamour; and hearing himſelf call'd upon by name, cry'd out aloud to know, who it was that would ſpeak with Abner? anſwer was made, it was David, the ſon of Jeſſe, one of your fugitives. " Are you " a fit man, ſays David, to be a great prince's " favourite; a general of his army, and to " take upon you the guard of his royal perſon, " and under all theſe honourable obligations, " to lie dozing and ſtretching your ſelf at " eaſe, when your maſter's life is in danger? " can you tell me what is become of the king's " launce, and the pitcher of water that were " this night taken by the enemy out of his tent, " and from his very bed-ſide? and you, in the " mean time, and your guards, all faſt aſleep " about him, without knowing any thing of " the matter? whether this were neglect, or " treachery, 'tis equally the ſame; for whe- " ther it was the one, or the other, you do " certainly deſerve to loſe your head for " it."

He croſſes the river, and chides Abner and the guards, for looking no better to their maſter, Ver. 15, 16.

WHEN Saul came to find this to be David's voice, and himſelf now a ſecond time betray'd, betwixt the frailty of his own drowſineſs and the neglect of the guards, into the hands of the very perſon, whoſe life he himſelf was now about to take away; miſtaking the beſt friend he had for the moſt mortal of his enemies: Saul, I ſay, was ſo ſenſible of David's goodneſs and reſpect, under the greateſt of provocations, and not without ſome ſort of right to be ſevere upon him, that " he gave " him publick thanks for his life: bidding " him ſet his heart at reſt for the future, and " fear nothing, but return in peace to his own " habitation; for he found by experience, he " ſaid, that his life was not dearer to himſelf " than it was to David; whom he look'd upon " as his preſerver, and a perſon of ſo try'd " and unchangeable affection to him, that not- " withſtanding all baniſhments, hazards, and " ill uſages; loſs of friends, and many violent " attempts upon his life, he returned him no- " thing but benefits for injuries, and good for " evil." David, at laſt, deſired him to ſend ſome body to fetch back the launce, and the pitcher; appealing upon the whole matter to the righteous God of heaven and earth, to judge betwixt them, and to bear him witneſs, that when he took away Saul's launce and pitcher, he could with as much eaſe have taken his life.

AFTER this ſecond deliverance, Saul returned ſafe to his palace. But David having no mind to venture himſelf any longer in a place where he was ſtill in danger of being taken, remov'd with his ſix hundred men into the land of the Philiſtines, to live there, with the conſent and liking of all his people. Being now come to Anchus *, the king of Gath, (one of the five principal cities belonging to the Philiſtines,) the king entertains David and his two wives, Ahinoam and Abigail. Saul all this while had notice ſtill of David's motions; but after two diſappointments already, and falling into the very ſnare himſelf that he had ſet for David, he left his adverſary to take his fortune, and, deſiſted from the purſuit.

Saul gives over the purſuit of David, Ver. 4.

DAVID found himſelf uneaſy in the city of Gath, and ſo took the freedom to deſire of the king this addition to his former bounties; that he would be pleaſed to aſſign him ſome place or portion of ground in his dominions, for himſelf and thoſe that belonged to him, to live upon; for it gave him ſome uneaſineſs, he ſaid, to continue ſtill in a place where he muſt appear burdenſome to the people. So the king gave him Sicella † to himſelf and his heirs for ever; and David retained ſo great a kindneſs for the place, even after he came to be king, as to reſerve it for a private poſſeſſion for himſelf and poſterity ever afterwards; but of this more at large in another place.

King Anchus gives David the city of Sicella to him and his heirs, Ver. 6.

DAVID's ſtay in Sicella was four months and twenty days, whence he made ſeveral inroads upon their neighbours, the Sarites and Amalekites, carrying away vaſt booties of mules and camels; but taking no priſoners, for fear they ſhould diſcover the whole myſtery to Anchus. He made the king preſents, however, out of the ſpoil, who would be asking him now and then, where he met with all that pillage. His anſwer was, that he had made incurſions into the ſoutherly parts of Judea, and there he found it. There was no great difficulty to make Anchus believe a ſtory that his heart was ſo deſirous to have true; for it was reaſonably to be preſumed, that after all this havock and outrage committed by David upon his own countrymen, he would never dare to look homeward again; and by that means have nothing left to truſt to, but the ſervice of king Anchus. The Philiſtines were about this time preparing for a war againſt the Hebrews, and a general rendezvous appointed upon ſuch a day, in Rengam, where Anchus was to draw them into a body, and thence to lead them out againſt the enemy. The king ſpoke to David alſo to join him, with his ſix hundred men over and above his own troops; who not only promiſed it with great readineſs, but told Anchus further, that the time was now at hand, that would put it into his power to make him an honourable return for all his bounties. The king, on the other hand, paſſing his royal word to David, the more to oblige him, that if he ſucceeded in this battle, he would do him all the honour that in him lay, and in particular give him the command of his guards.

Saul consults the ghost of Samuel. The spirit foretels him the loss of the battle, with the death of himself and his sons; and it proves so accordingly. The Amalekites pillage and burn Siceila. David pursues, and cuts them to pieces.

All diviners, soothsayers, and fortune-tellers banish'd the kingdom, 1 Sam. xxviii. 3.

IT is to be noted, that Saul had already banished all diviners, soothsayers, fortune-tellers, and all other people whatsoever of such vain pretensions, out of his dominions; but the prophets he still retained. News being now brought him that the Philistines were advanced as far as Sunem, and encamped upon the plain there, he went out to meet them, and drew up near the mountain of Gilboah, directly over-against the camp of the enemy. The armies being now in sight one of another, Saul found the Philistines so much superior to the Hebrews, both for order and number, that his heart misgave him, and sunk upon it; and this terror put him upon consulting the prophets about the event of the expected battle. The question being put, and no answer return'd, the silence of the oracle was worse to Saul than all the rest; for he look'd upon it to be so foreboding a presage of an evil fate at hand, that he fell into a downright desperation upon it; and yet such was the hardness of his heart, that though God had withdrawn his favour from him in such a signal manner, and he himself conscious of it, he had still a recourse, after all this, to conjurors and wizzards, to learn the event of things, and set people at work to find him out some cunning woman who could foretel things to come; for there are a sort of people that take upon them to call up the ghosts of the dead, and thereby to resolve such questions about future contingencies as the querists shall please to ask them. While he was upon this enquiry, one of his family told him, that he had heard of such a sort of a woman at Endor. Upon this information, Saul without any more ado, disguises himself; and taking two confidents along with him, goes directly to the famous woman at Endor, without acquainting any body else. The first thing he said upon coming up to her, was to desire some trial of her skill, in calling up the ghost of such a certain person as he should name. The woman excused herself, out of a reverence to the king's edict, which had forbidden this way of divination, upon pain of banishment; wherefore she besought him not to betray her into a snare; for if she should pretend to give a resolution, and be detected, the practice would most infallibly be her ruin. But this refusal would not satisfy Saul; so that pressing her still more and more, with bitter imprecations upon himself, that no mortal should ever know of one syllable that pass'd betwixt them, either question or answer, she was prevail'd upon at last, betwixt oaths and importunities, to venture herself upon the credit of such assurances that she was in safe hands.

Saul disguises himself, and goes to the witch of Endor, Ver. 8.

Saul bids her call up the ghost of Samuel, Ver. 11. It appears, Ver. 12.

IMMEDIATELY upon her consenting, Saul bad her call up the ghost of Samuel. She knew nothing at all who this Samuel was; but however, upon her calling him up, the ghost appear'd. The woman was under an astonishment at the sight of so divine a figure, and turning toward Saul, asked him, "If he were "not Saul the king, (for Samuel had told her "as much.") Saul making answer, "That "he was the man; and observing her to be "trembling, and in disorder, desir'd to know "what might be the cause of that confusion." "She saw the resemblance, she said, of an "antient man, with a radiant glory about "him, ascending from the earth." Saul demanded of her what kind of figure, of what years, and in what habit he seem'd to be? "A man in years, she said, of a venerable "aspect, and in a sacerdotal vest." By this description Saul concluded it to be the figure of Samuel, and fell down upon his face and worshipped. "The spectre demanded what "he gave him this trouble for, to take him "from his place of rest?" Saul replied, "That it was absolute necessity; for he was "threaten'd, he said, with a mighty army, "and wanted advice what to do; God had "forsaken him, and he had neither prophets, "dreams, nor visions to fly to for direction. "For these reasons he had now recourse, he "said, to Samuel, as his last refuge, and a "person that he had ever found favourable to "himself and his affairs." Samuel foreseeing that Saul had but one day more to live, told him, "How vain a thing it was for him who "knew himself forsaken of God, to launch "out into unseasonable curiosities, what should "hereafter become of him. But, says the "ghost, since nothing else will serve your "turn, I am to tell you, that God Almighty "has determin'd that David shall be put into "possession of the government, and bring the "present war to a happy conclusion, while "you yourself are to lose your crown and "your life together, for your disobedience "to God in the business of the Amalekites, "and for the contempt of his commands, "which from my lips you received by his or-"der while I was living. Know further, "that you are to be with me to morrow; "your army shall be overthrown, and your-"self and your sons fall in the battle."

The difcourse betwixt Saul and the spectre, V. 15.

The spirit foretels David's coming to the government, and Saul's losing his crown and his life, and his sons in the battle, Ver. 19.

THESE words struck Saul speechless, and in a manner dead; for he fainted, and fell to the ground upon them; whether out of the transport of so surprizing a sentence, or out of weakness of body with over-fasting, may be a question; for he had eat nothing for four and twenty hours before; but coming at last a little to himself again, the woman was very earnest with him to take somewhat of sustenance to support nature; desiring no other consideration for the dangerous office she had render'd him, than to have the putting of him into a condition of strength and ability to return to his army. She was sensible enough of the hazard she had run in the exercise of a forbidden profession; and especially in the violation of a decree at the desire (unwittingly) of him that made it. After a great many importunities and refusals, in the depth of his desperation, Saul was prevail'd upon, in the end, to admit of some refreshment. So the woman, though so poor that she got her living by her daily labour, kill'd her only calf, dress'd it, and set it before Saul and his servants, with her whole fortune in that treat; who, in fine, took his repast, and returned that night to his army.

Saul falls into a swoon, Ver. 20.

I MUST

The wonderful good-nature and generosity of this woman of Endor, 1 Sam. xxviii. 21, &c.

I MUST not pass over here the candour, the good-nature, and the greatness of this woman's mind, without some note of admiration. The king had forbidden her the practice of an art that was the only maintenance of herself and family. Here comes a guest and a stranger to her, that she had never seen before; but a person in misery, and one that had need of her advice in the way that he himself had forbidden; for it prov'd to be the king. She receiv'd him, treated him, and reliev'd him; and all this she did willingly and chearfully; nay, and so frankly too, that she gave him all she had, and without any prospect or contemplation of a reward, by gaining the king's favour; for he, she knew, was doom'd to die; beside that over and above the piety of these offices, she did all this for the very man whose prohibition had been the ruin of her. This proceeding was quite contrary to the custom of the world, that makes charity an interest, and gives or relieves only to get by the bargain, putting out virtue, as they do money, to interest. We may reckon that we have recommended to us in the great example of this generous woman the honour and humanity of doing good offices to all people in necessity; beside that a sincere and unaffected charity, is a virtue of all others the most acceptable in God's sight.

AFTER this right done to the woman of Endor, there is somewhat further to be said upon this occasion by way of admonition, that all sorts of people may be the better for it, those especially who are born great, and prompted by honourable inclinations to the love and practice of virtue; for this it is that makes men immortal even upon earth, and inspires princes and governors with generous thoughts and resolutions, in defiance not only of danger, but of death itself, when the safety and well-being of their country required it.

The character of a glorious hero, in the instance of Saul.

THIS case of Saul is an eminent instance to my purpose. He knew most certainly that he was to die in this battle; for the prophet had told him as much. But he persisted yet in a resolution to stand his fate, without betraying his army to the enemy, or exposing his royal dignity to scorn, for the saving of his carcase. He made it his glory to die fighting for the defence of his government; and rather to have his sons and his whole family die partners with him in the honour of the action, than to leave them behind him, under anxious uncertainties how their survivors may prove, comforting himself with this, that a good name would supply the failure of any other posterity. This is the man, that, in my opinion, deserves the character of truly just, brave, and wise; and I would have the same veneration paid to all publick-spirited examples of his pitch and elevation, either past or to come; for let history say what it will of some men that may yet do great things, perhaps upon the hope or assurance beforehand of coming off safe and victorious; these men are not to be look'd upon as heroes of the first rate, (though much however to be esteemed,) but those rather, who like Saul, stand firm and unshaken in a fearless defiance of the worst of fatalities, and under the certainty even of death itself. What mighty matter is it for a man to venture his life upon a common chance of war, and betwixt hope and fear, to make the best of all favourable accidents! The other is the great soul, that when he knows he is to perish, boldly advances upon his destruction; meets it, and encounters his fate, though without any hope or thought of surmounting it. Be this spoken to the immortal honour of Saul, who hath made himself exemplary to all lovers of glory; and whoever would celebrate himself to after-ages, must tread in his steps; princes especially, to whom it is so necessary to have exalted minds, answerable to the sublimity of their fortunes, that a mediocrity, either of courage or of virtue, is a kind of a scandal upon them. More might be said upon the subject of Saul's dignity and resolution: but not to make this digression too tedious, I shall now go on where I left.

Anchus brings up David and his men to the army; but the great officers will not admit any Hebrews, 1 Sam. xxix. 2--5.

THE Philistines having drawn their troops together from all quarters, according to their distribution into tribes, kingdoms, and governments, Anchus the king of Gath, with his men after the rest, and David with his band of six hundred after Anchus; several of the Philistine commanders taking notice of a mixture of Hebrews among them, enquir'd from whence they came? who sent for them? and what they did there? Anchus made answer, "That the young man there, (pointing to "David,) was a servant of Saul's, who was "fallen under his displeasure, and forced to "fly for his life. He came to me, says An-"chus, with the people he has about him, for "sanctuary; so I receiv'd him, and provided "for him; and now upon this occasion he has "promised me his uttermost assistance against "Saul, in requital for his protection, and to "gratify his revenge." The Philistines were one and all against trusting a profess'd enemy, and were rather for having him remanded; for they did not know, they said, what mischief the treachery of such a party might do upon such an occasion. And for the difference betwixt him and his master, the service he might do him upon this opportunity, would compound for forty such breaches; wherefore Anchus should do well, they said, to consider what he was doing, and without more words to send him back to the habitation he had assign'd him; for this was the David, they said, that the virgins cried up so in their songs, for killing so many thousands of the Philistines. Anchus could not oppose the force and reason of the objection; and therefore he thought fit to take David aside, and discourse him upon that subject. "Young man, says he, upon the "certain proof and experience that I have "received of your fidelity and courage, I "have now entertained you as my ally and as-"sociate in this expedition; wherefore with-"draw yourself immediately to the place I "have allotted you, and have a particular "care there of the peace of my people, and "the country near you, for fear my enemies "should take advantage of my absence, and "press me with troubles at home. You will "do me the office of a kind ally, every jot "as effectually in that government, as if you "were my second in the army; and in the "mean time, I am as much your friend as "ever." Upon this declaration of Anchus, they parted, and David, according to his order, went his way to Sicella.

Achish remands David to Sicella, Ver. 10.

Sicella taken by the Amalekites, and burnt, 1 Sam. xxx. 1.

But in the mean time, while David was following the camp of the Philiſtines, the Amalekites fell upon Sicella, took it, and laid it in aſhes; making the like havock in the country thereabouts: they pillag'd all, in fine, wherever they came, and at laſt went home again with what booty they could carry along with them. David, at his return, finding the place of his habitation deſtroy'd and deſolate, his own wives, and the wives and children of his fellow-ſoldiers hurried away priſoners, with all that belong'd to them, he broke out into ſo paſſionate an extravagance of lamentation and outrage, that he rent his cloaths, and wept himſelf a-dry, even for want of matter to ſupply more tears. His followers were ready to ſtone him too, for the loſs of their wives and children; for he was the cauſe of all, they ſaid; and the whole miſcarriage was laid at his door.

David's followers charge the loſs of their wives and children upon his account, Ver. 6.

When David had mourn'd himſelf a-weary, he came at laſt to think of applying to Heaven for comfort; and ſo deſired Abiathar the high-prieſt to put on his pontifical robes, and conſult God in form, and then report the oracle. The queſtion was, whether or not, in caſe of overtaking the Amalekites upon the purſuit, the Hebrews might be allowed to receive their wives and children again, that had been taken from them before, and revenge themſelves upon the enemy. The high-prieſt bad David follow them, and proſper. Upon which encouragement he took his ſix hundred men, and incontinently purſued them to the brook Beſor, where they found an Egyptian that had loſt his way, and was ready to periſh with hunger, having been three days in the deſart without eating. They took pity upon him, and after giving him a little refreſhment, they ask'd him who he was? and to whom he belong'd? He told them he was an Egyptian born, and a ſervant to a perſon who was at the ſacking and burning of Sicella, and the country thereabouts; who left him upon the way, in his paſſage home again, becauſe he was ſo faint, that he could not keep up with the troops. David made uſe of this Egyptian for his guide, upon the trace of the Amalekites, whom he overtook at laſt, and found them tumbling upon the ground; ſome feaſting, others carouſing; and ſome again with much pride and vanity, in the contemplation of their late booty. But, in ſhort, while they lay dozing, and drown'd in ſleep and drink, and their thoughts wholly ſet upon their caſe and pleaſure, heedleſs, defenceleſs, and unarmed, David fell upon them in this diſorder and confuſion, mingling their blood with their wine, and with great eaſe doing dreadful execution upon them; ſo that upon the main, what with thoſe who had no arms at all, and thoſe who had arms, but were too drunk to uſe them, there eſcaped of the whole number not above four hundred perſons, who were carried off by the ſwiftneſs of their camels. The purſuit laſted from noon till night; and in the cloſe of the action they recover'd their wives, children, and booty.

David puts the queſtion to Abiathar, whether to purſue the Amalekites, or not, Ver. 7, 8.

The high-prieſt bids him follow them, and proſper, ibid.

David purſues, and overtakes them at the brook Beſor, Ver. 9.

David falls upon them in ſleep and drink, and makes a terrible ſlaughter, Ver. 16, 17.

The Hebrews recover their wives, children, and booty, Ver. 18.

David had but four hundred men with him in this adventure; the other two hundred (part of the ſix) were left behind for a guard to the baggage. Upon his return from the chace, and the ſpoil, the four hundred that were upon the action would not allow the other two hundred that were upon eaſier ſervice, to have any part in the booty, more than that of their wives and children. David look'd upon it as an unreaſonable propoſition. "For, ſays he, "the victory was given by God, and being a "bleſſing upon the common cauſe, it is but "reaſon that the whole body ſhould partake "of the benefit, eſpecially where the one part "was upon duty, as well as the other; and "at the ſame time preſerv'd the baggage." This deciſion paſs'd into a law, which is ſtill in force to this very day; that is to ſay, the ſpoil to be equally divided betwixt them that guard the baggage, and thoſe that fight the battle. David, after his return to Sicella, ſent up and down to his friends and acquaintance in the tribe of Judah, preſents out of the ſpoil. We ſhall paſs now from the deſtruction of Sicella, and the total overthrow of the Amalekites, to a bloody victory obtained by the Philiſtines over the Hebrews.

A bloody battle, 1 Sam. xxxi. 1.

The armies join'd, and the encounter was very ſharp. Saul, and his ſons, did all that was poſſible for brave men to do; but finding themſelves oppreſs'd with numbers, (for the whole ſtreſs fell upon them,) they had no more to do, they ſaw, than to die honourably, and to ſell their lives at ſuch a rate, that the enemy ſhould have little reaſon to boaſt of the purchaſe. They were ſurrounded, in fine, with freſh numbers; and ſtill as they cut off one party, they were aſſailed by another; ſo that in the end they themſelves were forced to ſubmit to the neceſſity of an inſuperable fate. Upon the fall of Saul's ſons, to wit, Jonathan, Aminadab *, and Melchi, that were ſlain in the heat of the battle, the whole army fell into a confuſion, and fled in a direct rout, the Philiſtines preſſing upon the rear with a prodigious ſlaughter. Saul ſhifted for himſelf a-while, with a ſmall body of his own, till in the end they were broken all to pieces by the Philiſtines darts and arrows, and he found himſelf ſo weakened with wounds and loſs of blood, that after all his heroical exploits, he was not able either to ſtand upon his legs, or to do execution upon himſelf. In this extremity, he called to his armour-bearer to do him the good office, that he might not fall alive into the hands of his enemies. But the ſervant excuſed himſelf out of the veneration he had for majeſty, and upon that refuſal Saul caſt himſelf upon the point of his own ſword; but not being able to finiſh what he had begun, he took notice of a young man an Amalekite there at hand, and deſired him to take the ſword, and ſome way or other give him a diſpatch. He did it at firſt asking, and in the ſame inſtant made prize of Saul's golden bracelets, and of his royal crown, and moved off with them immediately as faſt as he could. When the armour-bearer ſaw that Saul was dead, he laid violent hands upon himſelf too; and there was not one man of the king's guard who out-liv'd his maſter. This battle was fought near the mountain of Gilboah.

Saul's ſons, Jonathan, Aminadab, and Melchi, are all ſlain, Ver. 2.

An Amalekite diſpatches him, and takes away his crown and bracelets, 2 Sam. i. 10.

No ſooner had the Hebrews of the valley beyond Jordan, and the cities on the plains, gotten intelligence of the death of Saul and his ſons, and of the entire deſtruction and diſſolution of his army, but they withdrew themſelves out of their open towns into faſtneſſes neſſes and ſtrong holds; while the Philiſtines took poſſeſſion, and without any difficulty made themſelves maſters of the places the other had quitted. On the next day after the battle, the Philiſtines coming into the field to view the dead, found the bodies of Saul, and his ſons, among the reſt. They ſtripp'd them, cut off their heads, and ſent expreſſes every way up and down with the news of this defeat. Their arms they depoſited in the temple of Aſtarte *, and their bodies they expoſed upon gibbets, under the walls of the city of Bethſhan, known at this day by the name of Scythopolis. This barbarous outrage upon the bodies of Saul and his ſons, coming to the ears of the men of Jabeſh-Gilead, they took up ſuch an indignation at the inhumanity of refuſing them the laſt rites of burial, that ſome of the moſt daring and enterprizing among them, (that place producing men of the greateſt courage and reſolution,) made up a party, and travelling all night, took down the bodies of Saul and his ſons from the walls of Bethſhan, and carried them away to Jabeſh; not a creature daring to open his mouth againſt them. Their deaths were lamented by the whole people of the place, who gave their bodies a publick and an honourable interment in the chief part of their province. They ſpent ſeven days in ſo ſtrict a ſolemnity of faſting and mourning, that men, women, and children, were all bound indiſpenſibly to obſerve it.

THIS was the end of Saul, according to the prediction of Samuel, for his not proſecuting the war againſt the Amalekites, according to his order, and for the maſſacre of Ahimelech, and his family, with the devaſtation even of the ſacerdotal city itſelf. He ruled in the days of Samuel † eighteen years, and twenty two more after his deceaſe, coming to this unhappy end in the ſame manner as it is here ſet forth.

CHAP. I.

David's lamentation for the death of Saul and Jonathan. The tribe of Judah ſets up David for their king. Abner ſets up Iſhboſheth. Abner marches againſt David, and is defeated by Joab. Hazael purſued Abner, and Abner kills him. Abner taking a diſguſt at Iſhboſheth, goes over to David; and is afterwards baſely murder'd by Joab. David paſſionately laments him.

2 Sam. i. 1. THE battle laſt above-mention'd, was fought upon the very day of David's coming back to Sicella, from the overthrow of the Amalekites: and on the third day after that, came the perſon who had killed Saul, and made his eſcape out of the battle. He advanced toward David with aſhes upon his head, and his clothes all rent, and ſo threw himſelf down proſtrate at his feet. David asked him who he was, and from whence he came in ſuch a dreſs? he told him he was an Amalekite, and came from the unfortunate battle of the Hebrews, where the king himſelf, and his ſons, were miſſing after the battle, beſide many thouſands of the army. "I ſhall ſpeak no more, "ſays he, than what I ſaw with my own eyes. "It was my fortune to be near the king, when "he was in his extremity. He caſt himſelf "upon the point of his own ſword; but ſo "faint with his wounds, that he could not "execute what he had begun: ſo that upon "his earneſt deſire, I was forc'd to do the of-"fice for him, to keep him from falling alive "into the hands of his enemies." He ſhew'd David at the ſame time the bracelet, and the crown that he took from the dead body, to confirm the truth of his ſtory, which he reſerved for a preſent to David. There was no place left for doubting after this evidence; ſo that David rent his clothes upon it, and ſpent the whole day with his friends, in tears and lamentations. But the moſt ſenſible part of his affliction was the loſs of Jonathan, his ever dear, and faithful friend, and more than once the very preſerver of his life. Now ſo tranſcendant was the virtue of David, and the generoſity of his good-nature toward Saul, that notwithſtanding ſo many repeated practices upon his life, he did not only deplore his misfortune, but order'd the criminal to be deliver'd up to juſtice; not only upon his own confeſſion, but upon the more certain evidence of his guilt, in the crown and the bracelet, that he took from Saul after he was dead, to carry them to David: and proving himſelf over and above, to be the true brood of an Amalekite, by owning the very principle of a regicide. To ſay nothing of ſeveral elegies and epitaphs of David's compoſition to the honour of Saul and Jonathan, which are ſtill extant this very day.

WHEN

WHEN David had paid his laſt duties to the honour and memory of Saul and his ſons, and that the term of the mourning was expir'd, he conſulted God by the prophet, which of the cities of Judah ſhould be allotted him for his habitation; and it was anſwer'd Hebron: wherefore he left Siceila immediately, and repaired thither, with his two wives, and the guards of his perſon that he had about him; whither the whole body of the tribe came ſoon after, and in a full convention with one voice proclaimed him king. David had heard by this time of the generous and reſpectful behaviour of the men of Jabeſh toward Saul and his ſons, and how bravely they reſcued their bodies from the gibbet, in the face of the enemy, and gave them a pompous, and an honourable burial: ſo that he ſent them particular acknowledgments, in his own name, for what they had done in favour of thoſe princes, as an obligation that ſhould for ever be remember'd to their advantage: the ſame meſſenger giving them alſo to underſtand, that the tribe of Judah had created and declared David their king.

Hebron, by God's appointment, falls to David's lot for his habitation. 1 Sam. ii. 1, 2.

The people with one voice, proclaim David, king, V. 4.

IN this juncture, Abner the ſon of Ner, and Saul's general, a man of great courage and reſolution, and naturally cut out and qualify'd for glorious undertakings. This great man, I ſay, had no ſooner heard of the death of Saul, Jonathan, and two other of his ſons in the late battle, but away he poſted to the camp to look after Iſhboſheth; at that time, the only ſurvivor of Saul's male iſſue. So he found him at laſt, and to ſecure him from danger, croſs'd the river Jordan with him, and got him to be accepted and declared king of all Iſrael, the tribe of Judah excepted; appointing Meanahaim * for his reſidence, which ſignifies as much as the camp. Abner was ſo incenſed againſt the tribe of Judah for the choice of their king, that he reſolved to make war upon them for it, and ſo detach'd a body of the ſtouteſt men he could pick out, for the encounter. Joab, the ſon of Suai, and Zeruiah, David's ſiſter, had the command of David's army; taking his two brothers, Abiſhai and Hazael, along with him. When they were advanced to a certain fountain of Gibeon, the two armies, being now in ſight of one another, drew up, but as they ſtood in order there, and ready to engage, Abner propounded a trial beforehand between an equal number of each ſide, to ſee which were the braver men of the two. So by conſent they ſent out twelve and twelve to diſpute the point, betwixt, and in ſight of the two armies. They began the combat with their darts, and then fell in with their ſwords; every man taking his adverſary by the hair, and digging and ſtabbing one another till they all fall dead upon the place. Upon this, the armies join'd, and for a good while fought furiouſly on both ſides: but in the end, Abner was totally routed, and put to flight; Joab, and his two brothers cloſely purſuing them, encourag'd their men, both to the chace, and the execution. But no man ſtuck ſo cloſe to him as Hazael, who was ſo ſwift of foot, that he had the better of moſt horſes; and having ſingled him out, preſs'd cloſe after him, without turning either to the right hand or to the left. When Abner found he preſs'd ſo hard upon him, he offer'd him a ſuit of arms to let him go; and ſeeing he could not thereby prevail upon him to deſiſt from the purſuit, he fairly adviſ'd him not to put him to the neceſſity of doing him a miſchief, for the ſaving of his own life; after which he could never think of looking his brother in the face again. Abner perceiving by this time, that Hazael was not to be wrought upon, he turned his launce in his flight, and ſtruck his purſuer dead upon the place. This accident put ſome kind of ſtop to the purſuit; for the people gave over the chace to ſtand gazing at the ſpectacle. But Joab and his brother Abiſhai were now paſt the dead body, and ſo exaſperated againſt Abner for the death of their brother, that with an incredible ſpeed and vigour, they preſſed the purſuit till towards ſun-ſet, to Mathon; that is to ſay, the Aqueduct. In this place, Abner, with the tribe of Benjamin, took the advantage of a riſing ground to obſerve the enemy, and from thence to reaſon the caſe with Joab after this manner. "That this outra-
"gious animoſity was already gone too far a"mong people of the ſame blood and profeſ-"ſion. As for your brother Hazael, ſays he,
"I begg'd of him to be quiet, and let me a"lone without purſuing any farther; but he "brought it to this in the concluſion, that I
"muſt either take away his life, or loſe my "own; ſo that he may even thank himſelf for
"this miſcarriage." Joab could not oppoſe the reaſonableneſs of Abner's plea, and ſo cauſed a retreat to be ſounded; encamping upon the ſame place that night: but Abner continued his march over the river Jordan, and ſo to the palace of Iſhboſheth, the ſon of Saul. Joab, the day following, took a view of the dead; (which he cauſed to be buried) computing that Abner loſt three hundred and ſixty men, and David nineteen; without reckoning Hazael, whoſe body was carried by Joab and Abiſhai, to Bethlehem, and there laid in the ſepulchre of their fathers; from whence they returned to king David at Hebron.

THIS controverſy betwixt the houſe of David, and the houſe of Saul, was the riſe of a long civil war among the Hebrews; but ſtill as David and his party got the better of it in all encounters, ſo the ſons of Saul, on the other ſide, were ſtill worſted in whatever they undertook. David, in the mean time, had ſix ſons † by as many wives. There was Ammon, the ſon of Ahinoam; Daniel, the ſon of Abigail; Abſalom, the ſon of Maacah, the daughter of Tolmai, king of Geſhur; Adonijah, the ſon of Haggith; Sphacia, the ſon of Abithal, and Jethrakam the ſon of Egla.

This diſpute betwixt the houſes of Saul and David, prov'd the occaſion of a tedious civil war, 2 Sam. iii. 1.

David had ſix ſons in Hebron by ſix wives, V. 2, 3, 4.

IN the proſecution of this civil war, it was the prudence, the intereſt, and the popularity of Abner, more than any thing elſe, that ſupported the pretenſions of Saul's family, and kept the people in their obedience to Iſhboſheth. But this prince being informed that Abner liv'd in a ſcandalous familiarity with Rizpah, the daughter of Sibeth, one of his late father's concubines, he laid it directly to his charge, and reprimanded him ſo ſeverely about it, that it put him into a ſevere fit of melancholy and indignation, to find all his faithful ſervices to Saul, and his family, ſo ill requited. Upon this provocation, Abner Iſhboſheth reproves Abner for his familarity with Rizpah, one his father's concubines, V. 7.

* Μαναείμ, Joſ. † See 2 Sam. iii. 3, 4. and compare the original and the old Latin tranſlation.

This reproach provokes Abner to meditate a revenge, 2 Sam. iii. 8.

meditated a revenge, no leſs than the taking of the crown off from Iſhboſheth's head, and ſetting it upon David's; and giving the world to underſtand, that Iſhboſheth was not advanced to the government for any virtue, or ability of his own, but wholly by the advice, arms, intereſt, recommendation, and the try'd fidelity of himſelf alone.

Abner compounds with David for the bringing of the tribes over to him, Ver. 12.

WHILE this humour was at work, he ſent a commiſſioner to Hebron, with full power to ſtrike up a league with David in his name, upon this ſingle condition, that from and after the time of Abner's drawing off all the tribes from Iſhboſheth to David, and advancing him to the throne by the univerſal conſent of the people, Abner ſhould be received from that day forward as David's firſt miniſter and favourite. Nothing could have been more welcome to David than this propoſal of Abner's, and it was entertained accordingly. The firſt thing he deſired, as the earneſt of a future alliance, was the reſtoring Melchole *, whom he had purchaſed with very great labour and hazard, beſide the heads of ſix hundred Philiſtines, paid down upon a bargain for her with Saul. So Abner took Melchole out of the arms of Phalti, upon whom ſhe was beſtow'd, with the privity and aſſiſtance of Iſhboſheth, who had been already poſſeſs'd with the merits of the cauſe, and the reaſonableneſs of the demand; David having written to him upon that ſubject. While things were at this paſs, Abner call'd the elders and the commanders; or in ſhort, the principals of the people, both military and civil, together: to whom he deliver'd himſelf upon the preſent occaſion to this purpoſe.

David embraces the motion: inſiſting only to have his wife Melchole reſtor'd, V. 13. Abner procures the reſtoring of Melchole, with Iſhboſheth's good liking, V. 14, 15. Abner calls together the principals of the people, Ver. 17—20.

"THERE was a time, ſays he, when you "would have gone over from Iſhboſheth to "David, and I was againſt it; but you are "now at liberty to do what you pleaſe: for "the prophet Samuel hath moſt infallibly aſ"ſur'd us from the voice of God himſelf, that "David is the man whom divine providence "hath deſigned for the king and governour of "the whole nation of the Hebrews: and that "it is he, and only he, that is to avenge us "upon the Philiſtines, and to bring them un"der our yoke." Theſe words were ſo clear a diſcovery how Abner ſtood inclin'd, that the heads of the people, and of the army, fell in unanimouſly with his opinion; and from that time forward, declar'd and acted openly in favour of David. When they had proceeded thus far, Abner, in the firſt place, call'd for the Benjamites, of whom alone conſiſted the life-guard of Iſhboſheth, ſpeaking to them in the ſame manner with the former, and with the ſame effect too; for they all declar'd themſelves as one man for David.

The people declare themſelves for the intereſt of David, ibid. Abner brings over the guard alſo into David's party, ibid.

WHEN Abner had made this advance toward the performance of his conditions, he took about twenty men of his own choice away with him to David; in order, partly, to the ratifying of the treaty; and in part, for common ſatisfaction, becauſe men are better pleas'd to do their own buſineſs themſelves, than by proxies. And he had in it alſo this farther end, that the proceedings on both ſides might be the more impartially tranſmitted from the one to the other, and an exact report made of what had paſs'd betwen himſelf and the heads of the tribes, and how he had now brought over the Benjamites to David's party. Abner and his company were treated by David with all imaginable freedom and magnificence, for the time they ſtaid; but after ſome few days, he deſir'd for the preſent to be diſmiſs'd, that he might conduct the army and the people to him; and, upon delivering up the government into his hands, by the conſent of the whole nation, make good what he had undertaken.

Abner goes to David, and takes twenty men along with him, ib.

Abner and his people are fairly entertain'd, and diſmiſs'd, ib.

ABNER was preſently diſpatch'd according to his deſire, and hardly got out of the gates of Hebron, at one end of the town; but Joab, David's general, who had been ſomewhere abroad (it ſeems) came in at the other: where being given to underſtand that Abner had been in private with David, upon certain propoſals to ſettle him in the government, the conditions offered and accepted, and a league ſolemnly ratify'd betwixt them, and himſelf juſt then ſent back upon that errand, an outragious jealouſy enter'd into Joab's head, that this intrigue of Abner's would be his ruin, and ſupplant him not only in his maſter's favour, but in the moſt honourable of his commiſſions: eſpecially conſidering that Abner was a man of policy and addreſs, and one who knew well enough how to improve a critical juncture to his own advantage.

Abner's privacy with David gives Joab a mortal jealouſy of him, Ver. 22, 23.

THE venom of this envy began now to work in the heart of Joab, and his firſt recourſe was to back-biting and detraction. Hereupon he endeavour'd to perſwade the king by artful inſinuations, that he ſhould do well to have a care how he truſted Abner; for his buſineſs was, above all things in the world, to eſtabliſh the family of Saul in the government. His pretences were only ſnares; and upon the gaining of his point, and pumping out what he had a mind to know, he was now gone home again to reap the fruits of his falſe-dealing. When Joab found that there was no good to be done upon David, by calumny and ſlander, to the prejudice of Abner, he bethought himſelf of a ſurer and ſhorter way of doing his buſineſs, by taking away his life; and ſo diſpatch'd meſſengers after him in David's name, to call him back again with all imaginable expedition, under a pretext of ſomewhat forgotten in his inſtructions that was very conſiderable. They overtook him upon the way at a place call'd Beſira †, about twenty ‡ furlongs from Hebron; and upon delivering their meſſage, Abner very innocently went back with them to the city, little dreaming of what afterwards befel him. Upon his coming up to the walls of the town, there ſtood Joab in the gate, with a wonderful appearance of kindneſs and humanity, ready to receive him, (as the deepeſt hypocrites, when they deſign the greateſt villainy, put on the moſt ſanctified countenance, and ſhew the faireſt outſide;) ſo taking him aſide, as upon ſome private buſineſs, he took the opportunity of a ſecret corner out of ſight, only his brother Abiſhai in company with him; and ſurprizing him at unawares, plung'd his ſword into his guts. Thus Joab calumniates Abner to David, Ver. 24, 25.

When backbiting would not do, Joab has recourſe to violence. Joab counterfeits a meſſage from David to Abner, Ver. 26, 27.

was this brave man taken off by the perfidious malice and treachery of Joab, in revenge (as he pretended) for the death of his brother Hazael, who was slain in the battle of Hebron, upon the violent pursuit of Abner; but in truth, to gratify his jealousy and revenge, for fear of being supplanted in his court preferments. This instance is sufficient to convince us, that men abandon'd to the lusts of avarice and ambition, will stick at nothing; for they are never at ease so long as they see any thing above them. So long as they are in the pursuit of what they eagerly desire, they press their ends, without ever examining or considering the means. There is no such thing as scruple of honour or conscience in the case; but right or wrong, how to accomplish their ends; and they are still bolder yet in the defence and maintenance of a thing ill gotten, than they were in the acquiring of it; for they can better bear a miscarriage in missing what they would have been at, than the shame of having any thing forc'd away from them that they have acquired. They will, in short, struggle harder to keep what they have, especially when they have tasted the sweet of it, than to get what they had not. But here's enough in a word upon this point.

The death of Abner goes to the heart of David. Ver. 28, &c.

THE news of Abner's death pierced the very heart and soul of David, insomuch that upon the very hearing of it, he stretched forth his right hand toward Heaven, in an appeal and protestation, upon the whole matter, that he was neither privy nor consenting to the fact; cursing most bitterly the assassin, whoever he was, his family, and all his accomplices: and all this, not only in a detestation of so base and unmanly a practice, but likewise to purge himself, upon the strictest niceties of faith and honour, that he had been true to Abner. He appointed by proclamation a publick mourning for him, with all the solemnities of tearing garments, and putting on of sackcloth, he himself with his great ministers and officers assisting at the funeral, and giving sufficient demonstrations, by wringing of hands, beating their breasts, and other expressions of sorrow, both of the veneration they had for Abner's memory, and the sense they had of so inestimable a loss, all people being now fully satisfy'd in the conclusion, that David was far from approving or consenting to so execrable an act. He caused the body to be interr'd at Hebron, with great state and magnificence, composing an epitaph himself, to the honour of the deceas'd. He was the chief mourner, and a president to all the rest, who acted in conformity to his example. The death of Abner, in a few words, afflicted him to such degree, that his friends could not prevail upon him to touch either meat or drink that whole day. The severity of this religious strictness gained exceedingly upon the affections of the people, and particularly upon the friends of Abner; to whom nothing could be more acceptable than this last testimony of David's veneration and esteem for his person and memory, now he was gone; for he did not treat him, they saw, with a slight and ignominious way of burial, as an enemy, but with all the tenderness of generosity, justice, and friendship. Beside that it highly elevated the character of David's piety and good-nature, in giving men to understand what they might expect from him themselves, if ever Abner's case should come to be theirs. So that David, in this way of proceeding, consulted his interest as well as his reputation and virtue; for after this proof, he was never suspected for want of good-will to Abner.

David does all possible honour to the memory of Abner. ibid.

David's high esteem for Abner, ibid.

WHEN the company were upon the point of breaking up, David entertain'd them with a short discourse to the advantage of Abner, and first upon the account of his own particular unhappiness, in being depriv'd of a friend he had so great a value for: and then with a respect to the publick, how much the whole nation suffer'd in the loss of so brave and so wise a man; and, in short, a person so necessary both for war and counsel. But God, (says he) who governs all things, will not let this murder pass unrevenged: he is my witness, that I am not in condition to call Joab and Abishai to an account; for they have a greater interest in the army perhaps than I myself: but this I dare pronounce, that sooner or later, divine justice will find them out. Thus it was that Abner ended his days.

CHAP. II.

Baanah and Rechab present David with the head of Ishbosheth; who orders them to be put to death by exquisite torments. All the tribes own David for their king. He raises an army, and takes Jerusalem. Joab the first that scales the wall.

Ishbosheth hath a very great loss of Abner, 2 Sam. iv. 1.

THE death of Abner was a most terrible mortification to Ishbosheth the son of Saul; for in him he lost a dear friend and a near kinsman, who was the chief instrument in advancing him to his father's throne: neither did he himself long survive him neither; for he was treacherously murder'd soon afterward by Baanah and Rechab, the sons of Rimmon. These two brothers were Benjamites, and of the first rank among them. They were thinking with themselves, that if Ishbosheth were but taken out of the way, David would be clear of all competitors. Upon which consideration, they concerted the matter betwixt them, how they might do him that piece of service; making no manner of doubt, but honours and commands in abundance would be conferr'd upon them as rewards for the performance of so good an office. So that at a time when he was alone in his bed-chamber, and taking his afternoon's repose, no guards at hand, and the very servant that commonly kept the door, wearied and fast asleep, they took their opportunity to steal into the chamber, kill'd him in his sleep where they found him, cut off his head, and posted away with it all night toward Hebron, the sooner to get clear of the people they had injur'd, and to bring the present so much the fresher to him whom they pretended to oblige. When they came to their journey's end, they presented it to David, not a little valuing themselves upon the merit of having destroy'd his competitor for the empire: but their entertainment was not answerable to their expectation, as will appear by what David said to them upon this occasion.

Nay, and it was at the inſtance " too of Saul himſelf, that he did it, to pre- " vent the indignity of being taken alive by " his enemies. Am not I the ſame man, do " you think, at this day, that I was then? " or am I turn'd ſo abandon'd a wretch ſince, " as to countenance the moſt profligate of men " and of actions, and to reckon myſelf under " an obligation to you for dipping your hands " (upon my account, as you would have it " thought,) in the blood of your Lord? The " cutting of his throat in his bed too; and " the throat, over and above, of a perſon ſo " juſt, that he never did any wrong; and ſo " generous a patron and benefactor to your " ungrateful ſelves, that all the advantages " you can pretend to in this world, are but " what you ſtand indebted for to his bounty " and goodneſs; wherefore you ſhall now pay " for your breach of faith to your maſter, and " for the ſcandal you have caſt upon me, both " at once; for what greater wound could any " man give me in my reputation, than to ex- " poſe me for a perſon that could take plea- " ſure in the tidings, or give countenance to " the committing of ſo barbarous and inhu- " man a murder?" Upon theſe laſt words, he gave order to have the two regicides put to exquiſite torments, and the head of Iſhboſheth to be laid in the monument of Abner, with all the formalities of funeral rites and honour.

The two regicides tormented to death, and all honour done to Iſhboſheth's body, 2 Sam. iv. 9.

So ſoon as this execution and ceremony was over, all the elders and great officers of war and peace came thronging to David with a compliment of recognition, and with a tender of their lives and fortunes at his ſervice; not forgetting to mind him of the zeal and devotion they ever had for him, even in the life of Saul, and when they had the honour to ſerve under his command; enlarging upon it, how the prophet Samuel, according to God's order and appointment, had declared him king, and the government to deſcend to his ſons after him; foretelling that the great work of ſubduing the Philiſtines, was reſerved for him alone, and conſequently the ſettling of Iſrael in the poſſeſſion of a laſting peace and ſafety. David highly commended them for their good will and diſpoſition; encouraging them to go on as they had begun, with an aſſurance, that he, for his part, would never give them cauſe to repent it. David accompanied this declaration with a ſplendid treat; and when he had entertained them with all greatneſs, humanity, and freedom, he ſent them away with a ſummons to the whole body of the people to meet at his palace.

All the elders and great officers make their court to David, 2 Sam. v. 1, 2, 3.

He gives them a magnificent treat, and ſummons the whole body to attend him at his palace, ibid.

THERE gather'd together upon this call, of the tribe of Judah, ſix thouſand and eight hundred men armed with ſhield and launces. Theſe had been hitherto of the party of Saul, over and above thoſe of the ſame tribe who had made David king by themſelves. Of the tribe of Simeon, ſeven thouſand, an hundred, and upwards. Of the tribe of Levi, four thouſand and ſeven hundred, with their leader Jehoida; and with theſe was the high-prieſt Zadock, with two and twenty eminent men of his relations. Of the tribe of Benjamin, four thouſand * armed men; for this tribe was altogether of opinion, that ſome of Saul's family would ſucceed to the government. Of the tribe of Ephraim, twenty thouſand and eight hundred; ſtrong hale men, and of great courage. Of the half tribe of Manaſſes, eighteen thouſand. Of the tribe of Iſſachar, two hundred cunning men, who could foretel things to come, beſide twenty † thouſand in arms. Of the tribe of Zebulun, fifty thouſand choice men, and well armed; this tribe coming over to David entire. All theſe us'd the ſame armour as the tribe of Gad. Of the tribe of Naphthali, a thouſand eminent commanders, armed with ſhield and ſpear, with almoſt an ‡ innumerable multitude of their followers. Of the tribe of Dan, twenty ſeven thouſand†† choice men. Of the tribe of Aſher, forty thouſand; and of the two tribes beyond Jordan, and the other half of the tribe of Manaſſes, that were armed with ſhield, ſpear, ſword, and helmet, an hundred and twenty thouſand. The remainder of the tribes wore ſwords alſo.

THIS is the muſter-roll of thoſe who came up to David to Hebron. They brought corn, wine, and other neceſſary proviſions with them in abundance, and with one voice proclaimed David to be their king. When they had ſpent three days there, in feaſting and jollity, David marched out at the head of this army to Jeruſalem. The Jebuſites, a people of the race of the Chanaanites, were at that time in poſſeſſion of the city; and upon David's advance toward them, they ſhut their gates upon him, and in a pleaſant way of defying David and his troops, brought out their lame, and their blind to the walls for the guard of the town. They ſhould need no other guard, they ſaid, for the encounter of ſuch an enemy; ſo great was their confidence in the ſtrength of the place. David was ſo incenſed at this contemptuous mockery, that he reſolved immediately to attack the city; reaſonably computing, that if he made an example of the people of this place, it would ſtrike a terror into all others for the future. So David fell on with the flower of his army; and, upon a general aſſault, enter'd the lower town; but the caſtle ſtill held out. David finding it to be a ſtrong place, the attempt likely to be hazardous, and his honour at ſtake upon the carrying of it, he bethought himſelf how he might inflame the courage of his men by ſome extraordinary propoſal of honour and reward; and by that incentive to kindle an emulation among his people who ſhould do beſt: David paſs'd his royal word,

CHAP. III.

Jerusalem call'd the city of David, who takes the town, fortifies, adorns it, and keeps his court there. The king of Tyre seeks his friendship and alliance. David's wives and children.

WHEN they had clear'd the castle of the Jebusites, and repair'd the town, the king gave to Jerusalem the name of the city of David, and made it his place of residence during his reign. This was after he had ruled seven years and six months over the tribe of Judah in Hebron. Upon the establishment of his court at Jerusalem, success attended his affairs every day more and more; for God in his providence designing it for a seat of glory, had a peculiar kindness for the place.

Jerusalem called the city of David, 2 Sam. v. 7.

ABOUT this time, Hiram, the king of Tyre, sent an embassy to David, upon a treaty of friendship and alliance, and presents likewise along with it of cedar wood; builders and master-workmen toward the erecting of a palace for him at Jerusalem. David fortified the upper town, and laid that and the citadel both in one, with a wall about them, and gave the command of it to Joab. David was the first who chang'd the name of it, and it was after the casting out of the Jebusites; for in the days of our father Abraham it was called Solyma; and some will have it that Homer pointed at this city, when he speaks of the people of Solyma; for the word Hieron*, or Temple, signifies in the Hebrew, security or a fortress. Now the whole time of the war with the Philistines, from the Hebrews dividing their lands, under the command of Joshua, to the day here spoken of, was reckon'd to be five hundred and fifteen years; but the Barbarians kept the possession of Jerusalem all along, till they were beaten out by David.

Hiram propounds an alliance with him, Ver. 11.

David fortifies the place, and gives the command of it to Joab, 1 Chron. xi. 8.

Jerusalem of old called Solyma.

Now there was among the Jebusites a very rich man, one Orphan, who had done many good offices for the Hebrews, and deserved singularly well from David himself, as will be seen hereafter in its proper place. This man, upon the sacking of the town, was preserved by the king in all the heat and fury of the soldiers, and his name must not be pass'd over in silence.

Orphan a Jebusite, and a particular friend and favourite of David's.

DAVID took several wives (beside concubines) more than he had before; by whom he had eleven children, as Amnon, Ellus, Ebas, Nathan, Solomon, Jebar, Eliel, Phalna, Ennaphen, Jenas, Eliphal; and a daughter named Thamar, who was the sister of Absalom. Nine of the sons were lawfully begotten; but the two last by concubines.

CHAP. IV.

David's signal victories over the Philistines and their allies. The ark brought to Jerusalem. Uzzah struck dead for touching it. David sings and dances before it; and his wife Melchole ridicules him for it.

WHEN the Philistines understood that David was made king of all Israel, they drew out their army, and encamp'd in a place call'd the valley of the giants, not far from Jerusalem. Upon this occasion, David, who would do nothing without counsel and direction from above, appointed the high-priest to inform himself in the way that God had prescribed, what might be the event of this battle. He received a comfortable and an encouraging answer, and so drew out, and march'd immediately to fight the enemy. David so ordered the matter, that upon the very instant he fell by surprize upon the Philistines, front and rear, and put them to a total rout, killing multitudes upon the place, and giving chace to the rest.

The Philistines draw out against David, near Jerusalem, Ver. 17.

THIS was a signal victory, easily obtain'd, and without much opposition; but it must not be therefore infer'd, that the army of the Philistines was inconsiderable, for either numbers or soldiers; for Syria and Phœnicia, and several other warlike nations, were all engaged in the confederacy: it had been otherwise impossible, after so many defeats, and the loss of so many thousands, they should ever have brought an army into the field again. As for example, upon this very overthrow, they follow'd it with an invasion of thrice the number they had before, and had the confidence to post themselves in the very same place again.

The Philistines, a confederacy of several nations.

DAVID, upon this juncture, consulted the oracle as formerly, and received order to lie still with his army in a certain wood, call'd the grove of mourning, not far from the enemy; and from thence not to move, or to make any attempt upon any occasion whatsoever, till he found the branches of the trees in an agitation, as of their own accord, and without one breath of air stirring to cause that motion. David kept punctually to his order; and so soon as ever the providential sign was given him, he advanc'd that very moment, as to a certain and a predetermin'd victory. The Philistines shrunk upon the first push; but when they came to close fight, they ran outright, with the Hebrews at the heels of them, and their swords in their reins; following the chace, and doing terrible execution till they came to Gazar, a town situate upon the borders of either party. Their next work was to pillage the camp, where they made themselves masters of a prodigious booty, with little trouble or hazard, seizing their idols among other things, and breaking them to pieces.

David consults the oracle again, and receives his orders, V. 23.

David charges the enemy; puts them to the rout; pursues them, and pillages the camp, Ver. 24, 25.

THE danger of this war being speedily and happily over, the king was pleas'd, by the advice and assent of his great council of elders and officers, to draw together the whole force he was able to make, out of all the tribes under his jurisdiction; together with the priests and Levites; and so to march with this great body directly to Kiriath-Jearim, and bring the ark of God from thence to Jerusalem, being the place designed for his holy worship, and for the celebration of all sacrifices, ceremonies, and religious rites for the time to come. If this care had been taken in the reign of Saul, it would have been much better both for king and people.

The manner of transporting the ark, Ver. 3, 4, 5.

The tribes being met according to appointment, and all things in readiness for the removal of the ark, David himself also assisting at the solemnity, the priests took it out of the house of Aminadab, and laying it upon a new waggon with oxen to draw it, left the ark in charge with their children and relations, to take care of it. The king himself went foremost; and after him follow'd a multitude of people, glorifying God with sacred hymns and psalms, and other delightful airs, after the fashion of the country; and dancing all along as they went, to the sound of harps, cymbals, and other musical instruments; conducting, after this manner, the ark toward Jerusalem. As they were upon the way at a certain place call'd the Threshing-floor of Chidon, or Nachon, the oxen staggering with the ark, Uzzah put forth his hand to keep it from overturning, and was immediately struck dead by a divine vengeance, for presuming to touch it, he not being in holy orders. This exemplary death of Uzzah was a great affliction to David himself, and to all his people; and they called the place Perez-Uzzah, or the breach of Uzzah; which name it beareth unto this day. David was so struck with the dread of this judgment, that for fear Uzzah's case might come to be his own, if he should receive the ark into the city, (his fault being only the temerity of touching it,) he suspended the carrying of it to Jerusalem, and turned off with it upon the way, into the house of a certain good man and a Levite, whose name was Obed-Edom: there it lay deposited for three whole months, in which time it was observ'd, that every thing prosper'd in the family, and that the master of it grew rich to admiration. It was in every body's mouth, in fine, how strangely Obed-Edom was improv'd in his fortune since he had the ark under his roof; and that of a very poor man before, he was now all on a sudden look'd upon as a man considerable for wealth; and in so good a condition, that he was the wonder as well as the envy of his neighbours. The rumour of this change coming to the king's ear, set David's heart at rest, as to any danger from the ark; so that he resumed his former purpose of transporting it to Jerusalem; which was done after this manner.

Uzzah struck dead for putting out his hand to save the ark from falling, Ver. 6, 7.

The ark lies deposited for three months in the house of Obed-Edom, V. 11.

The removal of the ark to Jerusalem, Ver. 12.

The priests had the charge of carrying it, and seven choirs of singing men, according to the king's appointment, marching before it, David himself bearing his part in the consort, with dancing and singing to his harp; which his wife Melchole (the daughter of the late king Saul) utterly disliked, as an action of too much levity, and below the dignity of David's character. The ark being brought to the city, it was disposed of into the tabernacle, which David had made on purpose for it. Upon the occasion of this festival-meeting, there were sacrifices and peace-offerings in abundance, and sufficient for the whole multitude; for there was not a man, woman, or child there, who had not a cake and a part of the flesh of the sacrifice given them; and when they had eaten plentifully, David returned to his palace.

His wife Melchole met him upon the way, with a thousand good wishes and blessings, but still reproving him for dancing and capering about, so unlike a king, and for uncovering himself in the eyes of his hand-maids and servants. David told her that he was not asham'd of doing any thing that he knew was acceptable to that God who advanced him to the throne of Israel, in preference to her father, and all other pretenders; and that he would sing and dance again and again, without regarding at all, how either she or her hand-maids took it. This Melchole had no children by David; but by her other husband, to whom Saul had given her in marriage, upon taking her away from David, she had five sons; of whom hereafter.

David proposes the building of a glorious temple, 2 Sam. vii. 2.

David was so sensible of God's goodness towards him upon the daily successes of whatever he took in hand, that he began to make it matter of conscience to live in a palace of cedar himself, that was as stately and as beautiful as art and ornament could make it; and at the same time to lodge the ark in a tabernacle; so that he resolved to erect and dedicate a temple to God's honour and worship; and according to the prediction of Moses, he communicated the design to the prophet Nathan; who upon counsel and advice, encourag'd him to proceed upon the work; for he might be sure of God's special favour and providence along with him. These words served more and more to animate and confirm David in his purpose and design.

The prophet Nathan encourages the project, V. 3.

In the night following, the word of the Lord came unto Nathan, saying, "Go and "tell David that I accept of his good-will in "being the first proposer of erecting a temple "unto my service; yet in regard that the "necessity of his wars hath made him a man "of blood, I cannot permit the doing of this "work in his days; but let him know, that "after a long and a happy life of his own, "he shall commit the care of the undertaking "to his son and successor Solomon; whom I "shall be as tender of as a father can be of "his own child, and continue the govern-"ment in the line of his family; or in case "of his committing iniquity, I will only pu-"nish the transgression with bodily sickness or "famine; not with a total rejection, as I did "Saul." The prophet, without any delay, acquitted himself of his commission; and it was so welcome a message to David, to see the succession secur'd to his posterity, and the honour of his family so graciously provided for, that he betook himself immediately to the ark of God, fell down upon his face, and worshipped. "Lord, says he, thy holy name "be prais'd for all thy benefits and mercies! "thou that hast taken thy servant from the "sheep-fold, and advanced him to this height "of dignity and power! Lord, says he, I "bless thee for all this; for thy continued "providences to myself, and thy promises to "my posterity; and for thy multiplied deli-"verances and protections to thine own peo-"ple." With this benediction, and a hymn, he finished his prayer, and departed.

Several mighty victories obtain'd by David against the Philistines, the Moabites, and the king of the Sophenians.

David resolves upon a war with the Philistines, and marches with an army into the enemy's country; invades the Moabites, overcomes them, and makes them tributaries; and totally destroys Adrazar the king of the Sophenians, 2 Sam. viii. 1--8.

DAVID, who could not endure to lie idle, meditated a war, not long after this, against the Philistines, being much animated to this enterprize by a prediction, that he should overcome all his enemies, and leave his kingdom in peace to his successor. In order to this war, he appointed a day and place for a rendezvous; summon'd his troops together; and when he was in condition to march, made an incursion into the enemy's country; overcame them in a pitch'd battle, took possession of a good part of their lands, and annexed them to the jurisdiction of the Hebrews. He made war then upon the Moabites, destroy'd two thirds of their army, took the rest, and made them tributaries. After which he overthrew Adrazar *, the son of Arach, king of the Sophenians; whom he encounter'd not far from Euphrates, and kill'd him twenty thousand foot, and five thousand horse; taking also a matter of a thousand chariots, of which he reserved only an hundred for his own use, and burnt the rest.

David overthrows Adad; subdues the Idumeans; provides for Mephibosheth the son of Jonathan, and makes war upon the king of the Ammonites.

Adad joins his friend Adrazar against David; comes to a battle near Euphrates, and receives a total overthrow.

IN the mean time, Adad, king of Syria and Damascus, hearing that David had made war upon Adrazar, his singular good friend and ally, dispatch'd away a considerable army to his succour, in hopes to remove the seat of the war; and after several skirmishes, he came to a battle with David near Euphrates; where he lost the greater part of his army, twenty thousand being cut off; the rest sav'd themselves by flight. Nicolaus makes mention of this same Adad, in the fourth book of his history, as follows. "A long time after, says he, one "Adad, a valiant man, and a native of the "place, had the command of Damascus and "Syria, Phœnicia only excepted. There "happen'd to be a war betwixt this same "Adad and David, the king of the Jews, "and several battles fought between them; "but in the end, Adad was overcome at Eu-"phrates, behaving himself with the resolu-"tion of a brave prince, and a great captain." And the same author, treating further of his posterity, says, "That the government was "handed down from father to son, to the "tenth generation; the successor still receiv-"ing the father's name with the empire, as "the Ptolemies among the Egyptians. The "third, in order from this Adad, and the "greatest man of the family, out of a gene-"rous zeal to repair the honour that his grand-"father lost by this defeat, pour'd in an ar-"my upon the Jews, and laid waste Samaria." And our historian was not mistaken in this part of his relation; for this is the Adad who invaded Samaria in the reign of Ahab king of Israel; of whom we shall say somewhat further in due time and place.

Another Adad of the family breaks in upon Samaria, 1 Kings xx. 1.

WITH this victorious army David over-ran Damascus and the rest of Syria; left garrisons behind him where he saw convenient; laid the country under contribution, and so return'd home again; carrying with him to Jerusalem the golden quivers, and other rich equipage that was taken from Adad's guards; and dedicating the spoil and trophies to God, in acknowledgment of the victory he had obtain'd through his favour and protection. All these valuable spoils, and a great deal more, were afterwards taken away by Sysack the king of Egypt, upon the sacking of Jerusalem, in his war with Rehoboam, David's grandson. But we shall have occasion to be more particular upon this subject elsewhere.

WHILE David was in the course of his successes, and God's special direction and assistance manifestly along with him, he made an attack upon Bettea and Machon †, two of the most considerable cities that Adrazar had in his dominions; both which he took by assault, with gold and silver in them to an inestimable value; beside a great quantity of a sort of brass, esteemed of a greater value than even gold itself. This was the metal that Solomon afterward made use of for his fair and beautiful basons, and a huge vessel call'd the sea, upon the finishing and adorning the temple.

He takes Bettea and Machon, with a mighty pillage.

WHEN the king of Hamath ‖ came to understand that Adrazar had lost his whole army, and was utterly undone, he thought it his wisest course, (for fear the like fate might attend him) to court David by a voluntary proposal, into a treaty of friendship and alliance. So he sent his son Joram to him, with a compliment of congratulation for the victory he had gain'd over their common enemy; (for so was Adrazar reputed) and with instructions also to sollicit a league of amity and fair understanding betwixt them; not forgetting several magnificent presents in vessels of gold, silver, and brass, antique and curious, to the highest degree of excellency and perfection. David accepted both of the proposals and the presents, receiving and dismissing the ambassador, to the honour and satisfaction of both parties; but still dedicating to God, all the spoils of gold and silver, and things precious, that were taken from the enemy, as to the author of the victory. Neither was David successful only in his own personal adventures and undertakings, but God prosper'd him in all his commissions also, though executed by deputies and lieutenants; as in the case of Abishai, Joab's brother, who was sent out with an army against the Idumeans; and by God's assistance not only subdu'd them, but after eighteen thousand of them were kill'd upon the spot, he kept them in awe with garrisons, as a check upon them; charged the land with a contribution, and taxed the people by the head.

His proposals and presents are all accepted, Ver. 10, 11.

Abishai, Joab's brother, kills eighteen thousand Idumeans, and lays them under contribution.

David settles his officers, 1 kings xx. 15.

DAVID was naturally a lover of juſtice, and had no other regard in all his judgments, than to the equity and righteouſneſs of the cauſe before him. He made Joab, the ſon of Zeruiah, his general, and Jehoſaphat, the ſon of Ahilud, the keeper of his records. He choſe out of the houſe of Phinees, Abiathar, and Zadock, who were his friends, to be his prieſts, and Seraiah for ſecretary. Benaia the ſon of Jehoiada commanded the guards of his perſon, and the king's elder ſons were ſtill incorporated into that body.

David enquires after Jonathan's friends and relations, 2 Sam. ix. 1, 2.

So ſoon as ever the king had put his family-affairs in ſome ſort of order, he cait his thoughts upon his old and dear friend and aſſociate Jonathan, and upon the ſolemn league of mutual amity that had paſs'd betwixt them; for he had this virtue in perfection, with many others, that he never forgot an obligation to a friend, but look'd upon an arrear for paſs'd benefits as the moſt ſacred of all debts. Upon this conſideration, he made diligent inquiry, what ſons, friends, or relations, Jonathan had left behind him, that he might find matter for his gratitude to work upon. In purſuance of this inquiry, there was brought to him one Ziba, formerly a ſervant and a freeman of Saul's, as the moſt likely perſon to reſolve that queſtion. So the king ask'd him if he knew of any of Jonathan's family yet living, and where to find them; for he was anſwerable for an old debt there, which he would gladly repay. Ziba made anſwer, that he had a ſon yet alive, whoſe name was Mephiboſheth; who by a miſchance happen'd to be lame of one leg. For upon the news of that bloody battle, wherein his grandfather and his father were ſlain, the nurſe took him up in a fright to run away with him; and ſtumbling for haſte, let him fall out of her arms, and hurt him. Upon farther examination the king had notice that he was brought up with one Machir, in the city of Labatha *, and that there he was at preſent. Whereupon he was immediately ſent for, and preſented to David. When Mephiboſheth approach'd the royal preſence, he proſtrated himſelf at the king's feet, and did him reverence. The king bad him be of good chéer, and hope for better days; aſſuring him of all the comfort he could wiſh for from the favour of his prince. So he appointed him preſently to be put in poſſeſſion of his father's and grandfather's houſe and eſtate, and of all that belonged to them; took him home to him as his particular gueſt, and order'd that he ſhould eat every day at his own table. The young man was highly ſenſible of this exceſſive grace and bounty; and when he had made a dutiful acknowledgment of it, in ſuch manner as became him, David then called for Ziba; and telling him how he had beſtow'd upon Mephiboſheth, his father's and grandfather's eſtate, gave him in charge to look after it, and take care of the grounds, and from time to time to receive the profits, and bring them to Jeruſalem. Mephiboſheth, after this, lived in the king's houſe, ſat conſtantly at the ſame table with him, and David gave him Ziba, and fifteen ſons that he had, with twenty others belonging to him, for his ſervants. Ziba, having received his commiſſion, did his duty, and went his way; promiſing to govern himſelf in all things according to his order and inſtructions. But the ſon of Jonathan continu'd ſtill at Jeruſalem with David, and was treated in all reſpects as a child of the family; ſo great a tenderneſs had David for any thing that had a relation to Jonathan. Thus it was with Mephiboſheth, to whom was born a ſon whoſe name was Micha.

ABOUT this time dy'd Nahath, the king of the Ammonites, a friend and ally of David's; and Hanun his ſon ſucceeded him. David upon this revolution, ſent embaſſadors to him, to condole his loſs, and comfort him in his affliction, and to aſſure him of the ſame friendſhip and reſpect to himſelf that had been formerly paid to his father. The heads of the Ammonites made a malicious conſtruction of this embaſſy, which the good faith and candour of David did not deſerve at their hands. They did all they could in fine, to irritate their king, with calumnies againſt David; and to put jealouſies in his head, that the ſervants of David were not in truth embaſſadors but ſpies; who under the pretext of a compliment of ſtate, were ſent to explore the ſtrength and condition of the country; and that therefore, without giving any heed to fair words, he ſhould do well to be cautious and circumſpect betimes, before things were gone beyond recovery. Hanun was over-rul'd by this counſel; how contrary ſoever to the true reaſon of the caſe; and ſo ſent the embaſſadors back again with all the indignities of ſcorn and vile uſage imaginable. They cut off one half of their beards, and one half of their veſts, and ſo diſmiſs'd them in that dreſs, with a contumely of action, inſtead of words at length, for an anſwer. David took it ſo heinouſly to be thus treated, and to ſee his embaſſadors ſo barbarouſly affronted, contrary to the laws of nations, honour, hoſpitality, and good manners, that immediately he declar'd his reſolution publickly to right himſelf upon the Ammonites by an open war, and to call their king to an account for what he had done. The principals and allies of the Ammonites were ſo conſcious to themſelves, that their perfidy, and breach of faith, together with the ſcandalous manner of it, was wholly unpardonable; that upon the firſt news of David's determination to vindicate himſelf by arms, they found themſelves neceſſitated, in their own defence, to encounter force with force, and ſo prepar'd for a war. They ſent their embaſſadors to Syrus, the king of Meſopotamia, with a thouſand ſilver talents to bring him into the alliance; which he accepted of, and engaged alſo the king of Zoba. Theſe two kings had betwixt them about twenty thouſand foot. They likewiſe purchaſed the aſſiſtance of the king of Maacah, and of Iſhtob, who had two and twenty thouſand men in arms.

Joab overthrows Hanun and his confederates. David gives a terrible defeat to the king of Syria. The story of David and Bathsheba. Ammon ravishes Thamar, and her brother Absalom lays a plot to take away his life.

THIS preparation of the Ammonites, in conjunction with so many confederate princes, made no impression at all upon the courage of David: he knew he had a gracious God to trust to; his cause was good, and the injury he had received intolerable; wherefore he was resolved to cast himself upon God's providence, and the justice of his arms for satisfaction; so that he committed the management of the war to Joab, and sent him away with the choicest of his troops against the enemy. He marched directly towards their capital city *, and encamped before it. The enemy marched forth out of the town, and divided into two bodies; the one consisting of auxiliaries, which they drew up in the open field; the other being composed only of Ammonites, ranged themselves before the gates that looked toward the Hebrews. Joab considering this disposition of the enemy's army, disposed of his troops likewise in the same order; and at the head of the best men he had, he himself preparing to charge Syrus, and the confederate kings, with one division, gave his brother Abishai the command of the other, with orders to attack the Ammonites; having agreed upon it beforehand betwixt themselves, that in case Syrus should get the better of Joab, Abishai should come in to his relief; and Joab to second Abishai, if he should be press'd by the Ammonites. Joab hereupon dismiss'd his brother, encouraging him to behave himself valiantly, and to make good the reputation both of the cause and of the action. Joab made the onset upon Syrus, who stood very bravely at first; but so many of his men falling, the rest fled; and the Ammonites upon the very sight of their disorder, betook themselves likewise to their heels, after the example of their fellows, without staying for the coming up of Abishai, and fled as fast as they could into the town; so that Joab, after a dreadful execution done upon the enemy, returned to Jerusalem with his victorious army.

THIS rout and confusion of the Ammonites, how unequal a match soever they were found to be to the Hebrews, was not enough yet to keep them quiet for the future; but they sent to Chalama †, a king of the Syrians beyond Euphrates, and agreed with him for an auxiliary army at such a price. Shobach was his lieutenant-general over an army of eighty thousand foot, and ten thousand horse. David being given to understand the mighty strength of the Ammonites, did not find it convenient to make war any longer by his deputies; so that he himself pass'd the river Jordan with the whole army, and joining battle with the enemy, kill'd them forty thousand foot, and seven thousand horse, and came off a conqueror; Shobach himself, the general of Chalama, receiving a wound in this battle, of which he died. The people of Mesopotamia, upon the miserable event of this overthrow, sent forthwith their ambassadors, with presents and addresses to David, and deliver'd up themselves; and the action being over, and the winter drawing on, David returned again safe to Jerusalem.

The Ammonites reinforce themselves, Ver. 15.

AT the beginning of the spring following, Joab was again dispatched with a commission to prosecute the war against the Ammonites, where he laid their country waste; drove the people into Rabatha, their metropolis, and laid siege to the place. David was undoubtedly a just and a pious man, and a strict observer of the laws of his country; but yet at this time he had the misfortune to fall into a grievous sin, the occasion of which was as follows:

Joab being order'd to prosecute the war against the Ammonites, lays siege to Rabatha, 2 Sam. xi. 1.

AS he was walking for his diversion one day toward the cool of the evening upon his terrass, he had the hap to descry a woman bathing herself in her own house, who was a person of a most exquisite shape and beauty, and her name Bathsheba. He fell in love with her immediately; and under the impotence of a passionate appetite, had her brought to his bed. Soon after this she found herself with child, and desired the king to consider of some way for the concealment of it; for otherwise she must suffer death by the laws of the country. Uriah, the husband of this woman, and Joab's armour-bearer, was hereupon call'd away from the camp, and David ask'd him several questions about the state of the army; how the siege went forward, and the like. He told the king, that things went as well as he could wish. So David gave him part of his own supper, and bad him go home for the present to his wife; but finding afterwards that he had pass'd away that night in the palace, and among his guards, ask'd him, "How it came "to pass, that having been so long away from "his wife, he had not rather chose to go home, "than spend his time elsewhere, so contrary "to the practice of all other men under his "circumstances?" "Sir, replied he, I did not "think it fair and honourable to indulge my-"self in the arms of my wife, at the same "time when my general and fellow-soldiers "lie in an enemy's country upon the ground." So the king told him, "He should now stay "there one night more, and the next day he "would send him back again to the army." When the king went to supper, he caused Uriah to sup with him, and made him drink so freely, that although he became thereby almost drunk, yet he never thought of going to his wife all this while, but spent that night again in the court, as he had done the former. This highly affronted David; insomuch, that he wrote to Joab, that he was much dissatisfied with Uriah, and he would have him punish'd according to his desert; and so put him in a way how to bring it about, without giving any suspicion that it was done by his order; and the contrivance was this: David appointed Joab to command him upon the first dangerous attack, where his companions might leave him in the lurch to be certainly cut off. This letter he gave to Uriah, under his own hand and seal, to be deliver'd to Joab; who, upon the receipt, follow'd the king's direction, and put Uriah upon a desperate attack, where he knew the enemies to be strongest, with several brave men to back him, for the countenance of the design; Joab promising to second him with the whole army, upon the least breach or possibility of entrance into the town; Joab recommending it earnestly to him, to maintain the reputation he had already acquir'd with the king and the army, by acquitting himself frankly and bravely upon this occasion. Uriah, with great chearfulness and assurance, undertook the post, while Joab gave his companions private orders to withdraw, and leave him, so soon as they found themselves in any danger. The Hebrews pressing hard upon the wall, put the Ammonites in a dreadful apprehension that they would force the town; whereupon they threw open their gates, and made a desperate sally; which was as good as a signal to those with Uriah, according to their orders from Joab, to abandon their leader; which they did with one consent, upon that critical point of time, and left Uriah to be cut to pieces. He did all the execution that was possible to be done by a single man against numbers; and after several wounds receiv'd, fell like a man of honour, with his face to the enemy. Some few of his friends, who were also asham'd to fly, not being made privy to the plot, fell with him at the same time.

Uriah is cut to pieces, 2 Sam. xi. 17.

THE action being now over, Joab dispatch'd away an express forthwith to David, giving an account, that to make short work of a siege that was otherwise likely to be tedious, he had given an assault to the town, lost men in the attempt, and was at last beaten off, and forced back again to the camp. "Now, says "Joab to the messenger, if you find the king "displeased at the news you carry him, tell "him withal, that Uriah fell in the attack." David, upon the hearing of this story, was mightily unsatisfied. "What, says he, "for men with their naked bodies to think of "storming stone walls! Why did they not "rather make use of mines or engines? One "would think they might have taken the do-"mestick example of Abimelech, the son of "Gideon, for a warning, that was slain at "Thebes by a piece of a mill-stone thrown "down upon his head, by an old woman, "from the battlements. The man was other-"wise very brave; but his temerity brought "him to a shameful end; for in all these cases, "caution is as necessary as courage; and the "safest counsels are the best. All people, in "the business of war, should do well to con-"sult history and experience, what has ge-"nerally succeeded well, and what other-"wise, and to consider upon what point the "stress lies, either of the one, or of the "other, and to act accordingly." While the king was in this sort expressing his resentment and displeasure at the ill management of the action, the messenger took an occasion to tell him of the death of Uriah, as a thing by-the-by. "Well, says David, these are common "accidents; the chance of war is various, and "soldiers must content themselves to take the "best and the worst by turns. Do you tell "Joab what I say; but tell him moreover, "that for the future I would rather have him "do the business by casting up works, or by "machines, than by open force. But let him "know upon the main, that I would have the "city raz'd and levell'd with the ground, and "the inhabitants put all to the sword, with-"out sparing so much as one individual per-"son." With these instructions the messenger went presently away to Joab.

Joab writes David the news of a repulse upon an assault at Rabatha, Ver. 18.

The messenger lets fall a word by-the-by, of Uriah's being kill'd in the attempt, V. 24. David passes it over as the chance of war, but bids Joab husband his men, raze the city to the ground, and give no [illegible], V. 25.

UPON the news of Uriah's death, Bathsheba for several days mourn'd her husband; but so soon as her days of mourning were over, David took her to wife, and had by her a male child not long after. This match was so far from being acceptable and well pleasing to God, that he was highly offended at it, and gave the prophet Nathan to understand as much in a dream; blaming David exceedingly for what he had done. Now Nathan being a man of a diverting humour and address, and well considering how little regard princes commonly have in the career of their passions to the right or wrong of things, chose rather to communicate his message to David in mild terms, by way of allusion, than bluntly and abruptly to accost him by a direct and downright denunciation of the displeasure and commination of God Almighty; bringing in what he had to deliver after this manner:

Bathsheba mourns out her time for her husband, and David takes her to wife, Ver. 26, 27.

Nathan, by the allusion of a fable, brings David to a sight of his sin, 2 Sam. xii. 1--4

"THERE were two men, says he, who "lived in the same city; the one had an abun-"dance of flocks and herds of all sorts of "cattle, oxen, sheep, and the like; and was, "in fine, a very rich man; the other was "master of no more than one only lamb; "which he brought up, and fed with his own "children, and lov'd it as his daughter. The "rich man had a stranger come to his house, "whom he was bound in hospitality and in "honour to entertain; but rather than treat "him out of his own store, he sent and forced "away the poor man's only lamb for the "stranger's supper." "A villain, says the Ver. 5. "king, in a passion, to do a thing so base and "so unjust! I would have him make four-fold "satisfaction, and die for it besides." "Why "then, replied Nathan immediately, thou thy-"self art the man who deserves such punish-"ment, and out of thy own mouth hast pro-"nounced judgment upon thyself. The pro-"phet, after this, gave him an account of his "vision, and of God's high displeasure against "him; minding him of his ingratitude to that "providence that had constituted him king of "Israel, and given him the command of all "the neighbouring nations thereabouts; de-"liver'd him several times out of Saul's "hands, &c. And for him now, who had so "many lawful wives allow'd him, to take "away, and marry another man's wife, in "defiance of God and man, and to betray her "husband to the enemy, and to death, what "could he expect after all this, but to be over-"taken with a divine vengeance? the pro-"phet then predicting to him, that he should "live to see his woman ravish'd by one of his "own sons, and that son to enter into a prac-"tice upon the life of his father; and in a "word, that for this secret sin of his, he "should be brought to open shame and pu-"nishment; concluding with this presage, "that the son of his unlawful love should be "very short-liv'd." This denunciation of the prophet struck David with terror and confusion, and drew from him a penitential confession with tears, that he had sinned against God. Now David being a righteous man, and (this one thing excepted) one who before had never been

Nathan foretels the several calamities to befal David, Ver. 10, 11, 12

been guilty of the commiſſion of any unjuſt action, God was pleaſed to accept of his true repentance, and took him into his favour again, and promis'd to ſecure him in the enjoyment both of his kingdom and of his life.

WHEN Nathan had given David this proſpect of things to come, he returned to his habitation; and was no ſooner gone, but the Lord ſtruck the child that Uriah's wife bare unto David with a grievous ſickneſs, which was ſo ſenſible an affliction to the father, that he took his chamber upon it, and for ſeven days together proſtrated himſelf upon the ground in ſackcloth and mourning; nor could he be perſuaded by his ſervants to receive any ſuſtenance; beſeeching Almighty God to ſpare the life of the child, having the greateſt tenderneſs imaginable for the mother. Upon the ſeventh day the child died; but none of the family durſt ſpeak a word of it to the king; for he, they thought, that was ſo given up to ſorrow, as to deny himſelf the moſt neceſſary comforts and refreſhments of life, when the child was only ſick, would afflict himſelf with a more intenſe and ſevere abſtinence, if he ſhould know it to be dead. David obſerved ſuch a diſorder in the countenances of his family, that he took it for certain there was ſomething extraordinary in the caſe, that they durſt not acquaint him with, which he concluded could be nothing elſe but the death of the child; and upon examining one of his ſervants about it, he found it ſo to be. David, upon this, preſently got up, waſh'd himſelf, changed his cloaths, and ſo went his way directly to the tabernacle to worſhip; commanding his ſervants, after this, to ſet his ſupper upon the table. His kindred and domeſticks were all in admiration and aſtoniſhment at a change of humour ſo unexpected; for while the child was but dangerouſly ill, there was nothing but paſſion and extravagance; and now it was dead, the father came to himſelf again. This was their deſcant; but they had yet a curioſity to know what might be the true reaſon of it; wherein David was very free with them upon a decent intimation of the deſire they had to be better inform'd. "While the child was yet living, ſays he, "and not quite out of hope of recovery, I "omitted no opportunity of application to "God for its life; but when I ſaw it was "dead, it would have been a fooliſh thing to "torment myſelf any farther to no manner of "purpoſe." The prudence of this reſolution was highly commended by all that heard him. Bathſheba, after this, in her due time, according to the courſe of nature, brought David a ſon; who, by the direction of the prophet Nathan, gave him the name of Solomon.

David's child by Bathſheba is ſtruck with a deſperate ſickneſs, 2 Sam. xii. 15.

The child dies upon the ſeventh day, Ver. 18.

Bathſheba brings David a ſon, which by Nathan's directions is called Solomon, Ver. 24.

JOAB, by this time had preſs'd ſo hard upon the Ammonites, by cutting off their water, and all other proviſions from them, that they were now well nigh reduced to the laſt extremity of hunger and thirſt; for they had only one little ſpring left them, which they were fain to husband by ſhort allowances, for fear of drawing it dry, or loſing that too. Joab ſent David a particular account of the ſtate of the ſiege; deſiring the honour of his preſence there in perſon, to put the laſt hand himſelf to the deſtruction of the city, as an action worthy to be found upon the roll in the hiſtory of his other heroical exploits. David was ſo fully ſatisfy'd with the wiſdom, faith, and zeal of his general, that he put himſelf preſently at the head of his army, and marched to the aſſault of Rabatha; took it by ſtorm, and gave the pillage of it to the ſoldiers, taking only for himſelf a golden crown of the kings, of a talent weight, and a rich ſardonyx upon it; which David wore conſtantly upon his head afterward for an ornament: to ſay nothing of an infinite variety of other rich booty that was found in the city. The men were put to death by exquiſite torments, and all the reſt of the Ammonite cities which ſtood out, as this did, were ſerved after the ſame manner.

Joab cuts off the Ammonites water, and ſtreightens them for proviſions, Ver. 27.

Joab writes David the ſtate of the ſiege of Rabatha, and adviſes him to appear in perſon at the aſſault, V. 28.

All put to death by torment; and ſo the reſt of the Ammonite cities that ſtand out Ver. 31.

THE glory of this victory was follow'd ſoon after with a mortification that took off much of the reliſh of it. David had a daughter that was as yet a virgin, and incomparably the moſt agreeable, lovely beauty of the age ſhe liv'd in. Her name was Thamar, and ſhe and Abſalom had one mother. Amnon, the eldeſt ſon of David, fell deſperately in love with her; and finding, that betwixt her own modeſty, and the watch ſhe had upon her, there was no hope of ſucceeding, he pin'd away into a kind of languiſhing conſumption. Jonadab, his friend and kinſman, and a perſon withal of very good ſenſe and judgment, taking notice of this change in Amnon, and that he grew every day worſe and worſe, went to him, and ask'd him what he ail'd; and in ſhort, if he was not in love: for he had a ſuſpicion of it. Amnon, without any difficulty, own'd himſelf to have a violent paſſion for his own ſiſter; upon this the other immediately ſuggeſted to him a method how he might compaſs his end. Do but you, ſays Jonadab, counterfeit yourſelf ſick; and the firſt viſit your father gives you, make it your requeſt that he would ſend your ſiſter to you, upon an opinion, you may ſay, that her care and aſſiſtance would much contribute toward your recovery. Amnon follow'd his counſel; deſiring his father, accordingly, upon his firſt viſit, to ſend his ſiſter to him; which he did immediately; and nothing would ſerve Amnon then, but he muſt have ſome cakes of his ſiſter's making: for he could not eat any thing elſe. So ſhe took the flour, kneaded it, rais'd, and bak'd it, all in her brother's ſight; and in concluſion, offer'd him ſome to eat; which he would not ſo much as taſte of; but called out to his ſervants immediately to withdraw, and let no body come in to trouble him; for he would lay himſelf to reſt. So ſoon as the room was clear'd of the waiters, he deſir'd his ſiſter to carry the curioſities ſhe had made him, into an inner chamber there, which ſhe did; and her brother taking advantage of that privacy, laid hold of her; and by the uttermoſt importunity of a violent paſſion, preſs'd and courted her to the gratifying of his brutal luſt: the innocent virgin crying out, and exclaiming all the while to him, "for ſhame, for ſhame," not to offer at ſo impious, and ſo ſcandalous a baſeneſs, as it would be to ſacrifice the honour of himſelf, and his whole family to the outrage of a beaſtly appetite. "Let me go, ſays "ſhe, for the love of God, and keep your ex-"orbitant deſires within the compaſs of law, "honeſty and religion: or, if you cannot "maſter them, try if you can get your fa-"ther's good-will, and never think of extort-"ing a kindneſs from me by violence." there was no reasoning, she found, with an impetuous raging passion. She thought however to put him off at present; but it would not do; for in despite of all she could say or do, either to hinder, or to divert him, he gain'd his end upon her by force.

Amnon ravishes his sister, 2 Sam. xiii. 14.

No sooner had he committed the villainy, and laid the fury of his burning lust, but in the same instant, his extravagant love was degenerated into the contrary extreme, of an implacable hatred: insomuch that he urged her with reproaches and ill language, to depart his lodgings and be gone. "What? says she, "now you have debauch'd me, am I to be ex-"pos'd too? and sent away by day-light with "all this confusion and horror upon me, to "tell the world how barbarously you have "used me? nay, says she, this treatment in "cold blood is yet worse, if worse can be, "even than the accursed act itself, under the "impotency of an ungovernable passion to al-"leviate the crime." But reasoning and struggling was all in vain, for go she must; and Amnon, without any more ado, commanded his servants to turn her out of the house. Away she goes upon this into the street, with ashes on her head, and her vest (such as was then in fashion for persons of her quality) disorder'd and torn; and so thorough the city; crying out and complaining how she had been abus'd and ravish'd. Her brother Absalom had the fortune to meet her in this distraction and dress; and asking her what was the matter, she told him the whole story of her brother, and the brutal indignity that he had put upon her. Absalom told her to pacify her, that the dishonour, however, was not so great, considering it was the act of her own brother; which for the present put some respite to her clamour. After this, she lived a pretty while single in the house of her brother Absalom. Upon the carrying of this story to David, he was infinitely troubled at it; but Amnon being his eldest, and his beloved son, he was yet loth to put him to extremities. Absalom, all this while, bore him a mortal grudge, and waited only a fair opportunity for a revenge. At the end of two years after the rape of Thamar, Absalom having appointed a sheep-shearing at Belzephon *, a city in the tribe of Ephraim, invited his father and his brothers to the meeting. His father excus'd himself, upon the trouble and expence it would be to him: so that Absalom desir'd leave only for his brothers: which being obtained, he gave his domesticks this order; that upon his giving them the sign, when Amnon should be in his cups, they should fall upon him, and kill him.

*The death of Amnon frights the brothers. Absalom flies to Geshur. Joab gets leave for him to return. He goes to Hebron upon a pretended vow, and cajoles the people to declare him king. Amnon kill'd by Absalom's order, Ver. 29.

ABSALOM's people took their time, and put their master's orders in execution. This violence upon Amnon struck such a dread and confusion into the rest of the brothers, that they immediately took horse upon it, and posted away to their father, taking for granted that there was a plot upon the whole company. In this nick of time comes a forerunner to David, with news, that Absalom had put all his brothers to death. This was so terrible a surprize to David, to hear of the loss of so many of his sons, and by the hand of their own brother too, that he abandon'd himself (as well he might) to an inconsolable desparation: and without any farther enquiry into the matter, or waiting for a confirmation of the report, (though a wickedness almost incredible) he gave himself up to an insupportable anguish of thought; tearing his garments, and casting himself prostrate upon the ground, lamenting not only the murder'd, but the murderer himself. But Jonadab, the son of Shimei, David's brother, desir'd David only to ruminate upon the matter a little with temper and moderation. I cannot believe, says he, that your sons are all kill'd, because I see no colour of reason for it. But for Amnon's part, it is not unlikely, says Jonadab, that Absalom may have taken his revenge upon him for the affront he put upon his sister. While they were in discourse, they heard the trampling of horses, and the hurry of people as approaching; and what was all this, but the king's sons who had made their escape from the feast at the house of their brother?

The rest of the brothers post away to the king upon this alarm, ibid.

Jonadab advises David to patience, till he can hear further, Ver. 32, 33.

In this interim David's sons come over to their father, Ver. 35, 36.

THE greeting of the father and his sons was not without tears on both sides; the father surpriz'd at the sight of them living whom he took to be dead; the sons lamenting the loss of their brother, and the father deploring the barbarous murder of a son; so that there was subject abundantly every way for grief and lamentation in all respects. Absalom, in the mean time, retir'd to Geshur, where he was a matter of three years in the house of his mother's father, a person of eminent authority in that country.

A tender greeting on both sides, ibid.

Absalom retires to the house of his mother's father in Geshur, Ver. 37.

DAVID had by this time a great desire to recal Absalom, not to punish him, but to have him home again; for the severity of his displeasure was now well nigh over; and these charitable inclinations were dextrously enough managed to Absalom's advantage, by the friendship of Joab, who was still at David's elbow. In order to this end, he dealt with an ancient woman who was to put herself in mourning, as a person in great distress, and as an humble supplicant, to present the king with her case to this effect: "That two of her sons "in the country had had an unhappy quarrel, "which grew to that animosity, that they "fought upon it, and one of them was kill'd. "Some of his friends who was slain, demand "justice upon him that kill'd him. So she "was to beg of his majesty the life of her son, "as the only hope and stay of her old age. "She had no prospect of relief, but in his "majesty's clemency; for her son's enemies "were so malicious, that nothing less could "satisfy them than the interposition of the "king's authority." She performed her part, and the king granted her request; whereupon, with a dutiful acknowledgment of the king's grace and favour to an ancient woman, and the mother of one only child, she prayed one further instance and assurance that she might enjoy the fruit of his royal goodness. Her suit was, "That the king would, in the first "place, be pleased to pardon his own son "Absalom;

Joab does all good offices of mediation for Absalom, 2 Sam. xiv.

An invention of Joab's in Absalom's favour, Ver. 2--18.

" Abſalom; for in beginning with a compaſ" ſion to him, it would be effectually the ra" tifying of her ſon's caſe, in his own family.
" It would be very hard, ſhe ſaid, for a father " to loſe one ſon by miſadventure, and to kill
" another himſelf."

THE king preſently ſurmized that this was a contrivance and project of Joab's; and upon diſcourſing the woman, found the matter to be ſo in reality. Upon which diſcovery David call'd for Joab, and told him that he had gain'd his point, and was now at liberty to bring Abſalom back again when he thought fit; for his anger was over, and he had freely forgiven him. Joab was very glad to hear it, did his reverence to the king, and ſo haſtened away to Geſhur, and brought Abſalom back with him to Jeruſalem. The king being told of his coming, ſent him word, that matters were not as yet in ſo good a diſpoſition as that it would be proper for him to appear in his preſence; ſo that Abſalom kept himſelf out of the king's ſight, within his own walls, and with his private family. He had gone thorough a great deal of care and trouble; and his entertainment of late had been rather coarſe than delicate; and in ſhort, not ſuitable to the ſtate and curioſity of a prince of the blood. But he ſtill kept up the beauty yet, and the gracefulneſs of his perſon to the higheſt degree of human perfection. He cut his hair every eight months; in the compaſs of which time, it grew up to the weight of two hundred ſhekels; that is to ſay, to five pound weight.

Joab fetches Abſalom from Geſhur to Jeruſalem, Ver. 23.

But Abſalom not as yet admitted into the king's ſight, Ver. 24.

HE paſs'd away about two years in Jeruſalem, in this private way of living, and had children; three ſons and one daughter, who prov'd to be a miracle of a beauty. She was married afterward to Rehoboam the ſon of Solomon; and had a ſon by him whoſe name was Abia. Abſalom finding himſelf uneaſy under his preſent circumſtances, ſent to Joab to uſe his intereſt with his father towards regaining him admiſſion into the royal preſence; and, in ſhort, to the procuring him the comfort of a thorough and abſolute reconciliation. He waited a while for an anſwer; but receiving no ſatisfaction upon this meſſage, he ſent ſome of his people to a neighbouring field of Joab's, to burn his corn as it ſtood there upon the ground. Joab came to him about it, and expoſtulating the matter with him, ask'd him what he had ever done to deſerve ſuch unhandſome treatment at his hands? " Why, ſays Abſa-
" lom, I had no way of getting you to me
" but that. I wrote to you about interceding
" for me to my father, and you have done no" thing in it I perceive. Pray will you try if " you can pacify him; for at this rate, if he " goes on ſtill to be inexorable, I am in a " worſe condition at home than I was in my
" baniſhment." Joab took pity of him upon this diſcourſe, and plied the king ſo artificially and ſo luckily on his behalf, that his heart relented, and Abſalom was immediately ſent for to attend his father. He caſt himſelf at the king's feet upon his firſt entrance into the room, and begg'd pardon for all his miſdoings? whereupon David with his right hand took him up again, with the aſſurance of a ſolemn promiſe, that all old offences ſhould be for ever buried and forgotten.

ABSALOM being re-eſtabliſh'd in the good opinion and eſteem of his father, in a ſhort time furniſhed himſelf with a ſplendid equipage, with chariots and horſes; a numerous train and retinue of ſervants, and no leſs than fifty men to attend him as the guard of his body. He was the firſt man ſtill at the king's levee; not forgetting, on the other hand, to take all occaſions alſo to cajole the multitude, and to keep fair with the people. If any man had a cauſe to be heard, and came for juſtice, he would be asking him in a familiar affable way, " Friend, ſays he, what is thy name?
" what countryman? what buſineſs? can I do " thee any good?" and the like. When he found people out of humour, and malecontent for a croſs verdict, or a hard judgment, (as they pretended; " Why this it is, ſays he

" the point himſelf ſometimes, as well as an" other. Well! and ſo God ſpeed ye my
" my friends; if I had been in ſome body's " place, things ſhould never have gone at this " rate." This was his method of way-laying the affections of the people, and moulding them for his deſign; and the humour ripen'd a-pace too.

WHEN he found himſelf pretty well aſſur'd of the ſtrength and intereſt of his party, he went and addreſs'd himſelf to David in the fourth year after his reconciliation, for leave to go to Hebron to perform a vow which he had made in the time of his baniſhment; which leave he eaſily obtain'd, and took a prodigious multitude; ſome whom he invited, and others that came trooping in throngs along with him. Among the reſt was Achitophel the Gilonite, David's prime miniſter, with two hundred men of Jeruſalem, who came thither to ſacrifice, without the leaſt imagination of a conſpiracy. But to make ſhort of the matter, the plot took; and Abſalom, by the common voice of the people, was proclaimed king.

DAVID was ſo ſurpriz'd at the news of a rebellious uſurpation, ſo little expected, that he ſtood confounded, as if he had been planet-ſtruck, upon the very thought of the impudence and ingratitude of his ſon's perfidiouſneſs; a wretch that could ſo ſoon forget his own late guilt, and his father's mercy, as to revolt into a ſecond Apoſtaſy, ſo much more flagitious than the former; for he was firſt to lay violent hands upon his father's kingdom, though he himſelf knew it to be the ſpecial gift of God; and after that, to practice upon his very life too. Now David being in this ſtreight, bethought himſelf of paſſing the river Jordan into ſome place of more ſecurity; and ſo, with the advice of ſome of his intimate friends, what courſe to take in this ſeditious juncture, he reſolved to leave the care of his palace to ten of his concubines; quit Jeruſalem, and commit the iſſue to God. He accordingly departed with great multitudes of people that chearfully adher'd to him, and join'd themſelves in his train, eſpecially his own ſix hundred friends, that kept ſo cloſe to him when he was hunted up and down by Saul, from one hiding-place to another. The high-prieſts, Abiathar and Zadock, and all the Levites there, were for going with him too, and taking the ark along with them; but upon very good reaſons he prevail'd with them to ſtay, telling them that God's providence was ſufficient for his preſervation, without any necessity of the holy ark being upon the place. The last thing he said to them was, that they should make sure of some private way of intelligence to let him understand from time to time of whatever pass'd that might concern him to know; and they acquitted themselves of that commission with great faith and industry; that is to say, Ahimaaz the son of Zadock, and Jonathan the son of Abiathar. Ittai, the Gittite, had so great a zeal for his own personal duty, and the service of his master, that he forced himself along with him, though he press'd him earnestly against it.

David settles a secret correspondence with them, 2 Sam. xv. 27, 28.

As David was going barefoot up Mount Olivet, and all the people in tears round about him, there came to him a messenger with the tidings that Achitophel was gone over to the faction of Absalom, which was one of the most sensible disappointments that had as yet befallen him; wherefore David prayed to God to infatuate him, and to turn his wisdom into foolishness. He was a clear-sighted man, and of great penetration in business, and there was nothing David so much dreaded, as the policy of his advice. When he had gained the mountain's top, he look'd back upon the city, all in tears, with ejaculations, as one that was now taking his last leave of his government; and whom should he meet there, but his try'd friend and faithful subject Hushai, with his garments torn, and ashes upon his head, lamenting the transitory state and fortune of all things below the sun. David bad him be of good cheer, and bear the present situation of affairs with resignation and patience; and urged him finally with great earnestness to go back again to Jerusalem, where he might behave himself like one of Absalom's party; pry into his counsels and designs, and by thwarting Achitophel's sense of things, do his master infinitely better service, than by staying with him. Hushai yielded to his persuasions; and so taking his leave of David, returned to Jerusalem, Absalom himself coming thither not long after. David in the mean while passing forward, met with Ziba, the servant of Mephibosheth, to whom he had committed the management of the estate he had bestow'd upon the son of his dear friend Jonathan. He was driving two asses before him, and offer'd David and his men to take what they pleas'd of what he had, if there was any thing they lik'd. The question was put to Ziba upon this occasion, "What was become of his master." "He "left him at Jerusalem, he said, in hopes "that upon the present distraction of affairs, "the people, in honour to the memory of his "father Saul, might be prevail'd upon to chuse "him king." David had such an indignation for this ingratitude, that he resum'd his grant of the lands made to Mephibosheth, and bestowed them on Ziba, as the more deserving person of the two. This was an expression and a bounty that were both very acceptable to Ziba.

David was still advancing, and as he pass'd near Bahurim, there came out a kinsman of Saul's, whose name was Shimei, the son of Gera, and assaulted him with curses, and with stones; and the more David's friends took his part on the one side, the more foul and scandalous was the ribbaldry of Shimei on the other. He call'd David a blood-sucker, the cause of all their miseries, and bad him be gone out of the country, like an insolent execrable wretch as he was; giving God thanks for that retaliation upon him, by his son, for the indignities that he had formerly put upon his Lord and father. These rude and barbarous outrages provok'd the indignation of every body that heard them; and Abishai had certainly kill'd him for it, if David had not interposed, and prevented it. "Pray hold "your hand, says David, and do not add "mischief to mischief. Things are bad enough "already, and do not you make them worse. "I look upon all the clamours of this clown, "as I do upon the bawling of a mad dog, "that God had let loose upon me; and his "holy will be done. Why should you wonder at the unmannerly revilings of a scoundrel, when at the same time I am worse "treated by my own ungracious son. But "there is a merciful God above, who in the "end will deliver the innocent out of the "hands of their oppressors, and give us victory over all our enemies; wherefore in the "name, and under the protection of that God, "let us proceed forward in our journey." And so as David advanced temperately on one side of the mountain, Shimei ran railing and cursing over-against him on the other. They came at last, after a long and a wearisome march, to the bank of the river Jordan, where David muster'd and refresh'd his troops.

Absalom comes to Jerusalem, and Hushai welcomes him with a God save the king, as well as the rest, Ver. 15, 16.

Absalom and his great counsellor Achitophel, were by this time come to Jerusalem, where they were received with shouts and acclamations by a vast concourse of people, and among the rest, by David's friend Hushai, with a God save the king, and the wishes to him of a long and a happy reign. Absalom, upon this encounter, ask'd Hushai how it came to pass, that he who was look'd upon to be so eminent and faithful a servant to his father, should now desert his former master, and come over to him? Hushai answer'd him discreetly enough, "That there was no contending with "the will of God, and the consent of the "people; and so long as you have them on "your side, you may be sure of my fidelity. "It is from God that you have receiv'd your "kingdom; and if you can think me worthy "of a place in the number of those you will "vouchsafe to own, you shall find me as true "to yourself, as ever I was to your father. "No man is to account the present state of "things uneasy, so long as the government "continues in the same line, and a son of the "same family succeeds to the throne." These words of Hushai to Absalom, put an end to all jealousies.

Absalom calls a council what to do, Ver. 20.

Achitophel advises him to lie with all his father's concubines, Ver. 21.

The thing they had now before them was, to resolve what should be done next, and Achitophel was presently call'd in, to advise about it. The counsel he gave was, for Absalom to go in and lie with all his father's concubines. "For this, says he, will fix the people, and "make them so much the bolder and firmer "to the present state, when they shall see the "breach advanced beyond all possibility of "reconciliation; for as matters now stand, "people will be apt to say, why the father "and the son may come to an agreement yet "for ought we know; and if they should "chance to adjust differences in the conclu-"sion, where are we? so that it will be dan-

Abſalom, in ſhort, took Achitophel's counſel, and commanded his ſervants to erect him a tent in the palace, where he lay with his father's concubines in the ſight of the people. This was no more, in fine, than what the prophet Nathan foretold would befal David.

AFTER the execution of this counſel given by Achitophel, the next queſtion was, what they were firſt to do in proſecution of the war? His anſwer was this, " That if " they would but put him at the head of ten " thouſand * choice men, he would undertake " therewith to deſtroy David, and ſecure the " publick peace to the people, and the go- " vernment to Abſalom both in one." Abſalom was much of Achitophel's opinion; but willing however to have Huſhai's alſo, he put it to him, what he thought on't. Huſhai (that was David's true friend, and ever ſo reputed) finding the advice to be ſhrewd and dangerous, did what he could to divert Abſalom from it by giving his judgment another way, after this faſhion. " Sir, ſays he, I need not tell you " that your father is a valiant man, and that " he hath a great many brave men about him; " with whom in all encounters he hath ever " come off victorious. You know him to be " a ſoldier too, and a man of ſtratagem, as " well as of courage. He will moſt infalli- " bly have advice of our approach; and in ſome " valley, wood, or behind ſome rock per- " haps, lie ready to betray us into an ambuſh: " or ſuppoſe we ſhould attempt to engage " them, they will order the matter ſo as to " manage their retreat by little and little, till " they have drawn us into the ſnare, and Da- " vid's whole body to fall in upon us before " we know where we are. Now I ſubmit my- " ſelf to your judgment, betwixt the con- " ſternation it will cauſe on the one hand, and " the encouragement it will give on the other, " what a confuſion this way of proceeding will " create among us: and now you have heard " both opinions, you may follow either Achi- " tophel's or mine, which is moſt to your " liking." But having given you my thoughts thus far now, what we are not to do, I muſt crave leave to tell you what I think adviſable under our circumſtances to be done. " Let the " whole nation of the Hebrews be ſummon'd " to appear with all their troops at ſome cer- " tain time and place, to make war againſt " David: and when they are met, do you your- " ſelf (ſays he to Abſalom) take the command " of the whole into your own hand, without " truſting to deputies. When this is done, " David muſt either expoſe himſelf in the " plain field, or otherwiſe fly to faſtneſſes, " ſtrong holds, wall'd towns, and the like. " If he keep the plains, his forces are ſo few " and inconſiderable, compared to the many " thouſands in Iſrael, wholly devoted to your " intereſt, who will value themſelves upon an " opportunity being offer'd them to exert their " zeal in ſervice of their prince and country, " that your power and ſtrength being hereby " ſo much ſuperior to his, you are ſure of ob- " taining an eaſy conqueſt over him. Or if he " ſhall go the other way to work, of hiding " and skulking up and down, to keep upon the " defenſive, there are twenty ways, by mi- " ning, battering, ſtarving, and the like, that " will certainly reduce him." They were all ſo unanimouſly for his advice, that Abſalom himſelf gave his voice for him, even in preference to the counſel of Achitophel. But it is to be noted, that the hand of God was in all this.

Achitophel demands ten thouſand men, upon condition either to bring David's head, or forfeit his own, V. 1, 2, 3.

Huſhai carries it againſt Achitophel.

HUSHAI, upon this reſult, made all poſſible haſte to the high-prieſts Zadock and Abiathar, with an account of what had paſs'd at the council betwixt Achitophel and himſelf, and how things were carried; deſiring them to diſpatch an expreſs immediately away with it to David, with a caution, by all means to paſs the river Jordan that very night; for if his ſon ſhould either get intelligence where he was, or change his mind, he might fall in upon him before he could get over.

Huſhai communicates this immediately to the high-prieſts Zadock and Abiathar, Ver. 14.

THE high-prieſts had provided lodgings for their ſons out of the town, and a faithful maid-ſervant at hand to carry them the intelligence, which they were to tranſmit forthwith to David. Upon the receipt of this information, they made what haſte they could with it, as became dutiful and faithful ſervants. But by the time they were advanced about two furlongs † upon their way, they were diſcover'd by certain horſe-men; and Abſalom having notice of it, gave order preſently for the taking of them up. The meſſengers were quickly aware of their danger, and ſo turned out of the way towards Bahurim, a ſmall village near Jeruſalem; where they met with a woman who was ſo charitable as to conceal them, by letting them down into a well, and throwing ſome skins of beaſts over the mouth of it. This matter was no ſooner ordered, but the purſuers came up to the houſe, and examined the woman very ſtrictly, whether ſhe had ſeen any ſuch men or not. She could not deny, ſhe ſaid, that two ſuch men drank at the gate juſt now, and ſo went their way; but, ſays ſhe, if you make haſte after them, they may eaſily be overtaken. When they had ſearch'd up and down a long time after them to no manner of purpoſe, they returned to their quarters with their labour for their pains. So ſoon as the woman ſaw that all was ſafe, and the coaſt clear, ſhe drew the young men out of the well; and they proſecuted their Journey time enough to give David a ſeaſonable account what Abſalom was a doing. It was late before they got thither, but David, however, got his people over the water the ſame night.

ed his ass, and went home to Galmon, where he called his family together, and told them the advice he had given Absalom; but that he would not follow it; and that in a short time, that refusal would be his ruin; for David would certainly get the better of him, and soon after recover his kingdom. "Now it "is more honourable for me, says he, to "die with resolution like a gentleman, than "to wait sneaking till David returns, and "then to be put to a scandalous death at last "for the services I have done the son against "the father." With these words he withdrew into a private apartment in his house, and hang'd himself, in the conscience of a self-condemnation: his relations afterward taking care for his funeral.

David passes the Jordan, and is to Mahanaim, V. 24.

DAVID, being now over the river Jordan, as aforesaid, came to Mahanaim *, the fairest and the strongest city in that tract of land; where he was treated by the principal persons of the whole country, with the highest instances of generosity and good-will imaginable; partly out of humanity, with a regard to the necessities of his present condition, and partly out of a reverence to the memory of his former state. There was Siphar, a prince of Ammon: Barzillai and Machir, two principal men of Gilead, &c. These generous persons took such care of David, and his people, that they wanted neither beds, bread, wine, flesh, nor any thing else that might be necessary, either for their subsistance, or for their refreshment.

Absalom encamps with a mighty army near his father, commanded by Amasa the son of Jothar, by Abigail, Ver. 25.

ABSALOM, in the mean time, was gotten over the river with a mighty army against his father, and encamped not far from Mahanaim, a town of Gilead, having made his kinsman Amasa general, in the place of Joab: Amasa being the son of Jothar by Abigail. Now Abigail, and Zeruiah, the mother of Joab, were David's sisters.

David divides his little army of four parts into three parts, and gives the command of the first part to Joab, the second to Abishai, and the third to Ittai the Gittite, 2 Sam. xviii. 2. Josephus says David would have engaged in person, but his friends would not suffer it. But really they are given against it, ibid. & 3.

THE king took a review of his men, and found himself upon the muster to be only four thousand † strong; but yet with this handful of an army, he chose rather to act the part of an aggressor, than to lie still upon his guard till Absalom should give the attack. So that he presently constituted his officers, and divided the little body of his army into three parts: Joab had the first division; Abishai, the second; and his old friend Ittai the Gittite, the third. David would needs have gone himself in person, but his friends, for very good reasons, opposed it; for, said they, "If we should be "beaten, and you yourself in the field, the "whole cause would be lost without any hope "of resource. But otherwise, if one division "should have the ill hap to be worsted, the "rest, they told David, might repair to himself, and be impowered thereby to reinforce "themselves to make another push for it. Besides, that the king's not being upon the spot, "would possess the enemy with an apprehen-"sion, that he had another fresh army in re-"serve." This motive carry'd it, and the king was prevail'd upon to stay at Mahanaim. David then adjur'd his friends by all the ties of honour, gratitude, and conscience, to acquit themselves in their duty; and in case God should give them a victory, to spare the life of the young man; for he durst not trust himself with his own life after the death of Absalom. This was follow'd with a thousand blessings and good wishes; and so he dispatched them to the army.

WHEN Absalom saw that Joab had drawn up his division upon a plain, with a wood at his back, he dispos'd of his own troops likewise into the same form over against the other. When the two bodies came to engage, there was great bravery shew'd on both sides. The one contending for the recovery of what David had lost, and the other for the defence and maintenance of what Absalom had got; and there was nothing that David's men were not resolv'd either to do, or suffer; so they might but avenge the father upon the apostaty of a rebellious son. Absalom's men fought a good while upon a point of honour, and to avoid the infamy of being worsted by so inconsiderable a party. David's men, on the other hand, for the glory of routing so many thousands of the enemy upon such a disproportion. In the conclusion, David's veterans behav'd bravely, and like themselves; for they broke the enemy's order, and put them to a total rout, getting the chace of them over woods, mountains and craggs, which way soever they fled: some they kill'd; some they took; and more were lost in the pursuit than in the battle. Near 20000 men were reputed to be slain in that day's action. Now Absalom was so remarkable both for his beauty, and his stature, that he was every body's mark: so that for fear of being taken alive, he mounted the fleetest mule he could lay hands on, and fled away as fast as her heels could carry him. But by the celerity of her course, the force of the wind blew up his hair, so that it catch'd hold on the snagged bough of a tree; and the mule running forward from under him, left him dangling in the air, and continu'd her speed, as if she had had her rider still upon her back. One of David's soldiers saw this, and carry'd the tidings thereof to Joab, who bad him go quickly, and dispatch him, and he should have fifty shekels of silver || for his pains. No, says the soldier, I would not do such a thing to the son of my lord and master for two thousand: especially considering the charge the king gave in your hearing, not to touch the the life of the young man. Joab hereupon commanded him to conduct him to the place where he saw him hanging; which when he came to, he pierced him through the heart with

* Εις την Μαχαναιμ, Jos. in Lat. [Castra] in Heb. [Mahanaim.] This word is sometimes used appellatively, and sometimes for the proper name of a place; when appellatively, it may be translated into English [the camp;] when for the proper name of a place [CHESTER.] It derived its origin from Jacob's returning out of Mesopotamia into Canaan, as we read in Gen. xxxii 1, 2. "And Jacob went on his way, and the angels of God met him. And when "Jacob saw them, he said, This is God's host; and he called the name of that place Mahanaim." i. e. the camp, from the angels who pitched their tents by his. Afterwards a city was built here, which, from that circumstance, obtain'd the name of Mahanaim.

This being done, Joab ſounded a retreat to take his men off from the chace, and ſave the effuſion of more blood in a civil war. Abſalom had already erected a marble column, with an inſcription upon it, in a place call'd the King's Valley, ſome two furlongs* from Jeruſalem, which he call'd by the name of the Hand of Abſalom, to perpetuate his memory, as he ſaid, even if he ſhould leave no children behind him. He had three ſons, and one daughter, who was married to Rehoboam the ſon of Solomon, by whom he had Abia, his next immediate ſucceſſor; but of this we ſhall ſay more hereafter.

CHAP. X.

David's grief for Abſalom; and Joab's plain-dealing with him. Shimei pardon'd. The tribe of Judah goes out to receive David; and the reſt fall off at the inſtigation of Sheba. David ſends Amaſa after Sheba. Joab meets him, and treacherouſly kills him; and then follows Sheba, and brings his head to David himſelf. The Iſraelites puniſhed with a famine for Saul's breach of faith with the Gibeonites; and then puniſh'd again with a peſtilence for David's numbering the people.

ABSALOM being now dead, his people ſlipp'd away by ſtealth every man to his own home; Ahimaaz, the ſon of Zadock the high-prieſt, making it his ſuit to Joab, that he might be the man to carry David the firſt news of the victory, as being the work of God's power and providence. Joab gave him this anſwer, that it would not look well for him who had been always heretofore the meſſenger of good news to the king, to be now the firſt man to tell him of his ſon's death. So Joab call'd to Cuſhi, and ſent him on the errand, and that he ſhould tell the king what he himſelf had ſeen. Ahimaaz intreated Joab a ſecond time, to let him carry the tidings only of the victory, but not of the death of Abſalom. Joab upon this importunity gave him leave, and he knowing the neareſt way better than the other, got thither before him. David was at this time ſitting at the gate, in a longing expectation to know the event of the battle, when a ſcout brought him word, that he ſaw one come running that way, but he was too far off to diſcern who it was. The king looked upon it as a good omen, and the ſcout immediately upon this told the king that he diſcover'd another, which gave him ſtill more hope than before. The meſſenger being now come within diſtance, was found to be Ahimaaz, the ſon of Zadock the high-prieſt, who came firſt. "Well, ſays David, this is "the man that moſt certainly brings me good "tidings." The words were hardly paſt his lips, when Ahimaaz caſt himſelf at David's feet to do him reverence, who asked him what news from the army? To which he replied, great ſucceſs and victory. David ask'd him then, what was become of Abſalom? Ahimaaz anſwer'd him, that ſo ſoon as ever he ſaw the enemy routed, he came away immediately with the intelligence; but that he heard a mighty clamour and ſhouting all the while, upon the purſuit of Abſalom; and Joab ſent him away in ſuch haſte, that his orders were only to carry the news of the victory, without any mention of Abſalom. By this time Cuſhi was at the king's feet, with the tidings of a victory; and the king putting the ſame queſtion to him as to the other, viz. What was become of Abſalom? "May it be, "ſays Cuſhi, with all the enemies of my lord "the king as it is with Abſalom." Theſe words turned a day of joy and triumph into a day of mourning. It prov'd ſo to the king, for the loſs of Abſalom; and to the people alſo; for David withdrew himſelf upon it out of ſight, to the top of one of the higheſt turrets about the city, beating his breaſt, and tearing his hair, with cries and exclamations, "Ah "my ſon Abſalom, my ſon Abſalom, ah that "I myſelf could have but died with thee, "my ſon!" Now David was in his own nature extremely fond and tender of all his children, but his love to Abſalom was in a more intenſe degree than to any of the reſt. This diſcouraged Joab and the army from entering the town in a triumphant manner, ſince the king appeared overwhelm'd with ſorrow for the ſucceſs; ſo that they came in with doleful countenances, hanging down their heads, and looking more like men conquered, than conquerors. David, in ſhort, continued ſo long in this way of an abandon'd dejection, that Joab, without any more ado, broke in upon him in the very agony of his paſſion, to reaſon and expoſtulate the matter with him.

Cuſhi, after him, tells David both of the victory and of the death of Abſalom, Ver. 31, 32.

"SIR, ſays he, do you know what you do? "are you aware of the diſhonour you bring "yourſelf by this wilful and effeminate way "of impotent lamentations? Why, it makes "you look as if you had a hatred for your "friends, that have ſav'd your life at the ha-"zard of their own; nay, for yourſelf and "your family too; and at the ſame time, as "great a kindneſs even for thoſe of your ene-"mies, which divine juſtice hath taken away "in your favour, by the ſtroke of a moſt righ-"teous vengeance. If Abſalom had carried "the day, and ſettled himſelf in his uſurpa-"tion, who do you think, Sir, would have "bemoaned, either your fate, or ours, in ſuch "a caſe? for we ſhould moſt certainly have "been cut to pieces, every creature of us: "Nay, you yourſelf, and your children, would "have fallen the firſt victims to their cruelty; "then your enemies would have rejoic'd and "gloried in your ruin, and it would have "been death for any man to have but ſo much "as pitied us. Pray, Sir, does not your "conſcience as well as your honour check you "for this intemperate tenderneſs, for the me-"mory of ſo implacable an enemy. He was "your ſon, 'tis true, but a moſt ungracious "one; and you cannot be juſt to God's pro-"vidence, without acknowledging the bleſ-"ſing of his being taken away. Joab's blunt liberty brings David to himſelf again, 2 Sam. xix. 8. THIS bold and blunt liberty of Joab brought David in ſome meaſure to himſelf again; and to take care of his government and people; ſo that he ſhew'd himſelf at the gate in a more popular way of addreſs, and with more of ſatisfaction in his countenance. This change of humour wrought ſo effectually upon the people, that they came in multitudes from all parts to pay him their reverence.

Abſalom's people make publick acknowledgments and addreſſes to David, Ver. 9, 10. WHILE matters were in this diſpoſition, Abſalom's men that fled from the late battle, and were got home again, ſent meſſengers up and down, from place to place, to mind their friends of the infinite obligations they lay under to David upon all accounts, and particularly for the toils and hazards he had undergone in his own perſon, for the vindication of their liberty; how ungratefully they had behav'd themſelves in their revolt, &c. and what had they more to do now, than to lay themſelves at his feet; beg his pardon, and beſeech him once again to receive them into his care and protection, as formerly; eſpecially the perſon being now gone, whom they had moſt unjuſtly and injuriouſly ſet up in his ſtead. The king had addreſſes of this kind ſent him in abundance, which he ſtill communicated by letters to the high-prieſts Zadock and Abiathar, with certain hints, how they were to manage the heads of the tribe of Judah toward his reſtoration. And they inſinuated accordingly, how great a ſhame it would be for them to ſtand looking on, and let others go before them, in doing a common right to a prince ſo generous, and of their own tribe and extraction. This way of proceeding created an emulation among them, who ſhould be foremoſt. They were likewiſe to expoſtulate the matter with Amaſa, the enemy's general, how it came to paſs that he himſelf, the nephew of David by his own ſiſter, ſhould not diſpoſe the army to a ſenſe of their duty, and the reſtoring of the government to the right owner. They told Amaſa, that for what was paſt, he might be ſure of his pardon; and they doubted not but he might have the ſame command under David that he had under Abſalom.

They expoſtulate the matter with Amaſa the general, ibid.

Amaſa comes over to the intereſt of David, ibid. THE high-prieſts dealt after this manner with the principals of the tribe, and upon the aforeſaid aſſurance brought Amaſa over to David. The tribe of Judah were the firſt (and they did it eaſily too) that ſent their commiſſioners to invite the king back to the exerciſe of his government; and betwixt the influence of this example, and the credit of Amaſa, they were all to attend, and receive the king at Jeruſalem. The tribe of Judah were remarkably the forwardeſt of the whole body, and the moſt officious in their reſpects; for they went to the very bank of the river Jordan to meet him. There was Shimei the ſon of Gera for one, at the head of a thouſand Benjamites; and there was Ziba alſo, Saul's freeman, with his fifteen children, and twenty ſervants; who, together with the tribe of Judah, laid a bridge over the river, for the more commodious paſſage of David and his troops.

The tribe of Judah the way, Ver. 15.

UPON his coming to the river, the tribe of Judah were the firſt that ſaluted him; and Shimei then advancing to the bridge, threw himſelf at David's feet, begging his pardon for the indignities he had put upon him; beſeeching him to paſs it all over, and that it might never riſe in judgment againſt him when he ſhould be re-inſtated in his kingdom; deſiring moreover, that his early repentance and return to his allegiance might attone for his paſt faults. " Well, ſays Abiſhai, Joab's bro" ther, (who was then within diſtance of hear" ing and ſeeing all that paſs'd) and do you " think to come off ſo eaſily, that could have
" the face to blaſpheme the king that God
" hath ſet over you, at ſo unpardonable a " rate?" " Be quiet, you ſons of Zeruiah;
" pray be quiet, ſays David, without blowing
" the coal, and ſtirring up new broils; for I " would have you look upon this as the firſt
" day of my reign, and to take notice of what " I do now declare upon my oath. I do freely forgive all the world, and I do promiſe
" that no perſon ſhall ſuffer for any thing done
" againſt me, or againſt any body elſe for my
" ſake, of what kind or quality ſoever; ſo
" that you may ſet your heart at reſt, Shimei,
" your life is in no danger." Upon which aſſurance he made his reverence, and went his way.

Shimei begs David's pardon, Ver. 18, 19, 20.

Shimei pardon'd, V. 23.

AFTER him came Mephiboſheth, Saul's grandſon, in as forlorn and uncouth an appearance as one could well imagine; for upon the king's being forced away from his palace, this good man, reckoning the king's calamity as his own, bound himſelf by a vow, never to cut his hair, or change his cloaths, till it might pleaſe God to reſtore him. Ziba took this opportunity of traducing his maſter to the king; for upon David's asking him how he came to leave him when he was under perſecution, he laid the fault upon Ziba, for not obeying his orders; but on the contrary, treating him like a ſlave, notwithſtanding the expreſs charge he had given him to have all neceſſaries in readineſs for his journey. " But
" Sir, ſays he, if I had the uſe of my legs,
" as other people have, this ſhould not have " hinder'd me neither. Nay, Sir, ſays he,
" and which is more, he has not only diſap-
" pointed me in the exerciſe of my duty, but " I perceive he has done me ſpiteful offices, and " aſperſed my character to yourſelf alſo; but " Sir, you are ſo juſt, and ſo great a lover of " God, and of truth, that I am ſure your
" generoſity and your wiſdom will never en" tertain a calumny to my prejudice. Our " family have had the experience of your piety,
" modeſty, and goodneſs, to a degree never
" to be forgotten, in paſſing over and pardon-
" ing the innumerable hazards and perſecutions
" that you were expoſed unto in the days, and
" by the contrivance of my grandfather;
" when all our lives were forfeited, and in " your power, and at mercy: but then after " all this gracious tenderneſs, your ſuperad-
" ding the honour of taking me to your table
" as a friend, and as a gueſt, and a perſon
" likewiſe ſo obnoxious, in regard of my re" lations, nothing could be either greater, or
" more obliging." David heard all this, without either animadverting upon Mephiboſheth, or putting Ziba's credit to the teſt; but he told him, that having given the whole eſtate Barzillai always faithful to the king, 2 Sam. xix. 32.

KING David in the time of the war had been much beholden for ſeveral good offices to Barzillai, the Gileadite; a great man to all good and honourable purpoſes; and this Barzillai would needs bring the king onward of his way to the river Jordan. The king preſs'd him with great earneſtneſs to go thorough with him to Jeruſalem, promiſing that he would be as good as a father to him, and that he ſhould want nothing that might be a relief and a refreſhment to his old age. But he excus'd himſelf, that he ſhould be more at eaſe in a private way of life, than in the ſplendor and luxury of a palace. "He was now eighty "years of age, he ſaid, and paſt the reliſh of "court-pleaſures; having no other buſineſs in "the world than to prepare for death, and "to give orders for his funeral; wherefore "he begg'd his majeſty's leave to retire home "again, where he might more conveniently "govern himſelf after his own faſhion. His "taſte was now gone, as to the ſatisfaction "of delicious meat and drink; and ſo for "the delights of ſinging, dancing, revels, "harmonious conſorts of inſtruments, or "voices, and the like. His hearing was "deaded and loſt, he ſaid, and he had no "longer any ſenſe of theſe entertainments."

The king, in fine, was prevail'd upon at length to part with him; but upon condition, ſays he, that your ſon * Achimanus ſhall go along with me, and take his part in the beſt offices I can do him. Barzillai, with all dutiful acknowledgments, left his ſon with the king; and taking his leave with the moſt paſſionate wiſhes of a long and proſperous reign to him, he returned to his own home.

David had half the nation with him at Gilgal, and the whole tribe of Judah, Ver. 40.

WHEN David came to Gilgal, he had one half of the whole nation with him, and the tribe of Judah intire. There came to him ſeveral of the prime men of the country, accompanied with a vaſt multitude of people, and charg'd the tribe of Judah with taking too much upon them in going to the king, without conſulting their brethren; whereas they ought unanimouſly to have gone together. The heads of the tribe of Judah deſired the reſt not to take any thing amiſs in their going before; for they look'd upon it as a duty incumbent on them for kindred ſake, which made them the more earneſt and officious upon that conſideration. They did not propoſe any advantage to themſelves, they ſaid, by being ſo forward; neither had they given any cauſe of offence by their earlineſs, to thoſe that came after them. The heads of the other tribes were not at all pleas'd with this way of reaſoning. "Pray how come you, they cry'd, "to engroſs the king to yourſelves, as if he "were not our king as well as yours? For "he is by God's providence indifferently the "governor of us all; ſo that if we are eleven "parts of the whole, and you but one, and "conſequently valuable in compariſon accord-

Sheba, a man of a violent ſpirit, 2 Sam. xx. 1.

While the great men were in hot debate about this affair, up ſtood Sheba the ſon of Bichri, a Benjamite, (a man of a factious and turbulent ſpirit,) and call'd out with a loud voice in the middle of the crowd, "What do they "talk to us for of a part in David? or what "have we to do with the ſon of Jeſſe?" So he cauſed the trumpet to be ſounded, with a proclamation for the people to depart to their tents, and thereupon a war was denounced againſt David. The multitude fell off into the party and intereſt of Sheba, ſaving only the tribe of Judah, who ſtood by the king, and conducted him to Jeruſalem. The firſt thing he did there, was to clear his palace of his concubines, which his ſon Abſalom had proſtituted in the ſight of the people; but he had them provided for elſewhere, with all fairneſs of reſpect, as before; though he himſelf had never more to do with them. He made Amaſa his general, in the place of Joab, giving him orders to draw what troops he could get together out of the tribe of Judah, and bring them to him in three days, that he might be ready to march out with them againſt the ſon of Bichri. Amaſa went about his buſineſs; but finding he could not gather together an army ſo ſoon as he expected, and out ſtaying his time, David, upon the third day diſcours'd the matter to Joab †. "This bu-"ſineſs of Sheba, ſays he, is a thing not to "be trifled with; wherefore do you imme-"diately take what forces you have at hand, "with the ſix hundred veterans, and ſo with-"out any delay, take your brother Abiſhai "along with you, and march directly away "after the ſon of Bichri; fight him where-"ſoever you find him, before he draws his "party into a body; and take care to prevent "him from putting himſelf in poſſeſſion of "fortified cities and ſtrong holds; for if he "once does that, he may perhaps coſt us more "trouble to ſubdue him, than Abſalom did."

Joab, in the ſame inſtant, poſted forward with his brother, and the troops that were aſſigned him to ſearch for Sheba. At his coming to Gibeon, a village ſome forty furlongs || from Jeruſalem, he met Amaſa upon his march in the head of a gallant army. Amaſa advancing toward him to embrace him, Joab, with a breaſt-plate upon his body, and his ſword girt to him, going to meet him, induſtriouſly dropp'd his ſword out of the ſcabbard, and preſently catch'd it up again, with one hand, while he took Amaſa by the beard with the other, as if it had been to have kiſs'd him; but ſheathed it in his guts, ſo that he died upon the place. Now what was the provocation all this while to commit ſo impious and execrable a barbarity upon ſo worthy a youth, nay and his kinſman too; but a malicious envy of his preferment, and a jealouſy of his being too great in the king's favour. It was much upon the ſame ground that he had already murder'd Abner; and much after the ſame treacherous manner that he did it too. 'Tis true, that in the former caſe he Joab advances to find out Sheba; proclaims Amasa an ill man, inviting all that lov'd the king to follow Joab and Abishai, Ver. 11, 12.

UPON the death of Amasa, Joab prosecuted his march to look out Sheba; leaving only one man with the general's body, with order to make proclamation thorough the army, that he was an ill man, and but serv'd according to his desert, desiring all those that were for the king to follow Joab, and his brother Abishai.* While the body lay expos'd in the way, there were multitudes gather'd together, as is usual in such cases, gazing upon it with astonishment; so that he who had it in charge, got it out of the way to a village, where he lodg'd it in a house, and threw a coat over it; and so soon as the surprize was removed, the soldiers march'd forward after their commanders. Joab had by this time pursued Sheba almost quite thorough the land of Israel; and getting intelligence at last, that he had sheltered himself in a strong town call'd Abel-Maacha †, Joab order'd the place to be presently besieg'd, and a trench cast up about it; and at the same time to have it ply'd with mines and batteries; being resolv'd to destroy it, even for the affront of shutting their gates against him.

Amasa's body remov'd out of the way, Ver. 13.

Sheba is gotten into Abel-Maachah, Joab order's it to be besieged, Ver. 14.

WHILE these preparations were a-foot for the gaining of the town, a good and a prudent woman, out of a zeal for the service of her country in that extremity, mounted the wall, and call'd out to Joab from the battlements, to speak a word with him out of the hearing of the soldiers. Joab did as she desired, and the discourse she made him was to this purpose: "Whereas God, says she, has "given us kings and governours to protect us "against our enemies, and to maintain and "preserve us in peace and unity one with an-"other, here you are come, without any injury, or provocation, to ruin one of the most "eminent cities in the whole land of Israel." Joab at this express'd his utter abhorence of so foul a deed; and said, he hoped God would always keep him in a better mind; adding, that he was so far from having the least thought of committing any unnecessary violence on this famous city, or of doing harm to any one person in it, that if the people would but deliver up Sheba, that rebellious son of Bichri, to justice, he would in the same moment draw off his army. Upon this promise and declaration, the woman call'd out to Joab, only to have a little patience, and Sheba's head should be thrown down to him over the wall. She went back upon this, to the citizens, to reason the matter with them. "Are you then resol-"ved, says she, like a company of wicked "men, and for the sake of a wicked wretch, "and a meer stranger to you, to sacrifice your "habitations, your wives, and your children, "and all in so wicked a manner too? what "has Sheba done for you, to balance the ob-"ligations you have to David? or, setting "aside all other arguments, are you able, do "you think, to defend your city against this "army." The reason of the thing was so plain and evident, that they cut off Sheba's head by consent, for a composition, and cast it over the wall: whereupon the siege was forthwith rais'd; and the people returning to Jerusalem, David declared Joab general of all his troops. Benaiah had the command given him of all the guards of the body, and the six hundred veterans. Adoram was the treasurer. Sabathes and Achilaus were the recorders; Susa the secretary; Zadock and Abiathar continuing in the priesthood.

SOME time after this, there was a famine in the land, and David earnestly besought God to reveal unto him in mercy, both the provoking cause of that grievous judgment, and how it might be remov'd. Answer was returned by the prophets, that the blood of the Gibeonites, which Saul had most perfidiously caused to be shed, cry'd to heaven for vengeance; as an action not only contrary to the oath and promise of Joshua, and ratify'd also by the elders, but against conscience and common justice: wherefore, said they, let the king give such satisfaction to the Gibeonites as they shall require for the loss of their slaughter'd citizens, and the Israelites may expect that God will be gracious to them, in a deliverance from their present calamity. When David came to understand this from the prophets themselves, he sent to the Gibeonites, and ask'd them what satisfaction would content them. So they demanded that seven of Saul's sons, or of his race, might be deliver'd up to justice. The king order'd to have seven of them found out, and put into the hands of the Gibeonites, to do with them as they pleased: but still excepting Mephibosheth out of the number, for the sake of Jonathan his father. The Gibeonites accepted of this as a composition, and punish'd them as they thought fit themselves: in which instant God sent them rain, and so kindly a continuance of it, that the earth in due time recovered its fertility, and brought forth fruits in their season, fresh and flourishing, as formerly.

IT was not long after this that David marched out with his army against the Philistines; fought, and routed them; but following the chace too eagerly, and too far, Achmon the son of Araph, one of the race of the giants, (whose armour was a coat of mail, a launce weighing three hundred shekels ‡, and his sword by his side) seeing David alone, and quite spent, turned short upon him, and struck him down, and had certainly slain him, if Abishai, Joab's brother, had not in that precise moment come to his relief; bestriding David, and not only protecting the king, but killing his enemy. The whole army was so sensible of the danger the king's life was in, and of the providence of his deliverance, that the commanders bound him by an oath never to hazard his royal person any more in a battle; for being naturally brave and forward, he laid himself too open to the common chances of war; and if he should miscarry, it would be an irreparable loss to the nation, to be de-

The Philiſtines rally and draw together again to Gaza, 2 Sam. xxi. 18. It came to a ſecond battle, and Sobach got great reputation in it, ibid.

THIS battle had not been long over, before the Philiſtines rally'd again, and came to a rendezvous at Gaza. David having notice of it, diſpatch'd away an army immediately againſt them. In this expedition, Sobach the Hittite (one of the braveſt men in the whole body) got himſelf great reputation by cutting off ſeveral of the race of the giants, and men of a prodigious bulk and ſtrength too, with his own hand. He had in ſhort the honour of a great ſhare in that day's ſucceſs. The Philiſtines, after this, brought yet another army into the field, and the king ſent out his troops to encounter them. Nephan, David's kinſman did wonders, for he ſlew, hand to hand, in a ſingle combat, one of the boldeſt men the Philiſtines had in their party: the reſt turned their backs upon it, and loſt great numbers in that action. But the Philiſtines in a ſhort time recruited yet once again, after all their loſs, and encamped at a certain town not far from the borders of the Hebrews. The Philiſtines had in their camp a man ſix cubits * high; ſix fingers on a hand, and ſix toes on each foot, and one that valu'd himſelf upon his deſcent from the ſtock of the giants. Jonathan, the ſon of Shimei, had the honour to kill this gigantick man in a ſingle combat, and at the head of his troops, which contributed very much to the gaining of the day; beſide the glorious character he acquir'd by it, of a valiant man. This was the laſt battle the Iſraelites had with the Philiſtines; for from that time forward, they never had the courage to make head againſt them any more.

DAVID having now made his way through all the toils and dangers of war, into the quiet of a profound peace, gave himſelf wholly up to the compoſing of divine hymns and pſalms, to the glory of God, in variety of meaſures, as trimeters, pentameters, and the like. Theſe airs he order'd to be ſung by the Levites upon the ſabbaths and other feſtivals, in company with muſical inſtruments provided for that purpoſe. As they had an inſtrument with ten ſtrings, to be touch'd with a quill; the pſaltery with twelve ſtrings, to be play'd upon with the fingers; and large cymbals of braſs. But this is enough as to the general underſtanding of the nature of theſe inſtruments. The king had about him men of honour and valour in abundance; but for worthies of the firſt rate, he reckon'd only eight and thirty † who had made themſelves ſignal for their exploits; and men of ſuch force and reſolution, as if they had been made for great enterprizes, and the carrying of the world before them. Of theſe eight and thirty, I ſhall only name five, as a meaſure to judge of the reſt by.

David being now at peace, compoſes hymns, &c. for God's holy worſhip, 2 Sam. xxii.

King David had about him thirty eight worthies, 2 Sam. xxiii.

Five of them were as follows.

1. Iſſem, V. 8.

THE firſt was ‡ Iſſem, the ſon of Achem, who broke ſeveral times into the body of the enemy, and kill'd nine hundred of them upon one encounter, with his own hand.

2. Eleazar, Ver. 9, 10.

AFTER him comes Eleazar, the ſon of Dodo, who was with the king in Araſam. It was his fortune to be in a battle, where the Iſraelites finding themſelves mightily over-power'd with numbers, gave way and fled, leaving him alone in his own perſon to make good his ground; which he did ſo effectually, that he gave a ſtand to the whole army, killing and wounding great numbers of them; ſo that his ſword was in a manner glew'd to his right-hand with the blood. The example of this bravery put courage into the fugitives, and made them rally, and charge the enemy's troops with ſuch fury, that they recovered the day, and crown'd it with a wonderful, and a moſt illuſtrious victory; Eleazar killing them all this while, and the common ſoldiers ſtripping them.

3. Sebas, Ver. 11, 12.

THE third was  Sebas, the ſon of Ilus, who had the place called the Jaw, upon another engagement with the Philiſtines, finding the Iſraelites ſhrinking and giving way, oppoſed his ſingle body to the whole force of the enemy; did great execution upon them; broke their order; put them to flight, and gave them chace, with a great overthrow. In theſe three inſtances we read the bravery of theſe three heroical adventurers, in the plain field, and in the face of an enemy.

AT another time, when the king was at Jeruſalem, and the Philiſtines encamped before it, in the great valley that ſtretches out as far as Bethlem, a matter of twenty *† furlongs from the town, David went up to a high tower to ask counſel and direction of God, about the government and event of the war; and ſpeaking among his friends of the delicious water that was in his country, and eſpecially of the well at Bethlem that was next the gate, "What would I give, ſays he, for a draught "of that water!" Theſe three men overhearing him, went their way immediately, broke through the camp of the Philiſtines, and fetch'd of the water from the well itſelf, and came back with it the ſame way they went: the Barbarians ſtanding amazed all the while at the hardineſs of the undertaking, and not daring, though ſo few of them, to give them any interruption in their return. Upon their preſenting of this water to the king, he gave God thanks for the ſafety of them that brought it; but it would not become him, he ſaid, to drink it, for it was the price of blood; and ſo he poured it upon the ground as an offering to the Lord.

4. Abiſhai, Ver. 18.

IN the fourth place may be reckon'd Abiſhai, the brother of Joab, that in one day ſlew *‡ ſix hundred of the enemy.

5. Benaiah, Ver. 20, 21.

THE fifth and the laſt of theſe worthy champions ſhall be Benaiah, a man of a ſacerdotal family, who fought, upon a challenge, with two brothers, men of eminent fame for feats of arms among the Moabites, and kill'd them both. He fought again with an Egyptian, of a monſtrous force and ſize; and cloſing with him, though himſelf naked, and his adverſary arm'd at all points, he forced his

He did another thing too, that for the ſtoutneſs and boldneſs of it, may be accounted equal, if not ſuperior, to all the reſt. There was a lion dropp'd into a pitfall; the ſnow drove into the whole, and cover'd the mouth of it; ſo that the beaſt finding no way to get out again, ſet up a roaring. It was Benaiah's hap to paſs by that way, within hearing of this outcry. He went to the place, and ſo into the pit, and with a ſtaff ſtagger'd and kill'd the lion. Theſe were five great men; and the other three and thirty not inferior to them.

2 Sam. xxiv.

It enter'd now into David's heart to take an account how many thouſand men he could muſter out of the people of Iſrael, forgetting the old precept of Moſes, that ſo oft as there ſhould be occaſion to number the people, there ſhould be an oblation of half a ſhekel * by the head to the Lord; but he ſent to Joab, however, to take the account. He excus'd himſelf upon it, as a thing that was needleſs; but David would not be ſaid nay, and therefore poſitively commanded him to go about it, and let it be the firſt thing he did. Joab, upon this, ſummoned the ſcribes and the heads of the tribes to adviſe with all, and ſo went through the whole land of the Iſraelites to make up this computation. After nine months and twenty days, Joab returned to Jeruſalem, and told the king upon the whole matter, that beſide the tribes of Benjamin, and of Levi, which he had not as yet taken an account of, he found the number of the reſt of the Iſraelites to amount to nine hundred thouſand men, who were able to bear arms. In the tribe of Judah alone he reckon'd up four hundred thouſand.

David commands Joab poſitively to number the people, Ver. 2, 3, 4.

Joab computes them to be nine hundred thouſand men, beſides the tribes of Benjamin and Levi, Ver. 9.

David, while this was in hand, repented himſelf of what he had done, and was told by the prophet alſo, that God was highly offended at him; whereupon he betook himſelf to a true repentance, begging pardon of Almighty God, with prayers and ſupplications, and obtained it. Preſently after this God ſent the prophet Gad to him, with an offer of three things to his choice; that is to ſay, either a ſeven years famine, or to fly three months before an enemy, or a three days peſtilence; and to demand a preſent reſolution from him, which of the three he would take. David found himſelf in a great ſtreight which to chuſe. If the famine, ſays he to himſelf, it would look as if I had more care of myſelf than of my people; for my ſtorehouſes are much better provided with corn than theirs. If to lie at the mercy of an enemy, it looks the ſame way ſtill; for I have ſtrong holds and caſtles to repair to for my own ſafety. But for the third, it is a calamity that threatens governors in common with their ſubjects. As he was turning his thoughts upon this deliberation, the prophet preſs'd him to an immediate anſwer; to which he made this return, "That "he would rather fall into the hands of God "than of man; and therefore ſubmitting himſelf to God's pleaſure and goodneſs, he choſe "the peſtilence." The prophet had no ſooner received and reported David's anſwer, but the Iſraelites were preſently ſeized with a moſt unaccountable diſtemper, that was ſtill attended with certain death, and accompanied with accidents that baffled all the doctors, either to find a remedy or a reaſon. But they died, in fine, in prodigious numbers, and no body knew how. Some went off with gripes and torments that diſpatch'd them in a trice; ſome with incurable faintneſſes and languors, in deſpite of the phyſicians; others with vertigo's, dimneſs of ſight, ſuffocations, &c. Some again expir'd, themſelves, before they could thoroughly perform the office of burial for their dead friends. The mortality, in ſhort, was ſo great, that betwixt break of day and dinner-time, there were ſwept away by this peſtilence ſeventy thouſand perſons. The deſtroying angel was now going to Jeruſalem upon the ſame commiſſion; but the king putting on ſackcloth, and humbly ſupplicating God with prayers and tears, to remove this dreadful judgment; in the middle of his ejaculations he lifted up his eyes, and diſcover'd an angel, with a drawn ſword, moving toward Jeruſalem. Upon this apparition he broke out into freſh and more paſſionate exclamations. "Lord, ſays he, puniſh the ſhepherd; but "alas! what have theſe ſheep done? Pour "down thy wrath rather upon me and my "family; but ſpare the innocent people, I "beſeech thee."

David's prayers were heard, and God immediately put a ſtop to the peſtilence; ordering the king, by the mouth of the prophet Gad, to go up without delay to the threſhing-floor of Araunah, and there to erect an altar, and offer ſacrifice upon it. David went away to the place according to his direction, where he found Araunah threſhing his corn, who no ſooner ſaw David and his ſons coming towards him, but he ran out with infinite reverence to receive them. Now this Araunah was a Jebuſite, and ſo particular a friend of David's, that he protected and ſecured him from all damage upon the very taking of the city, as has been before obſerv'd.

The king was exceedingly pleas'd with the candor and greatneſs of this good man's mind; but told him, that it muſt be a purchaſe, not a gift; for it would not be fair to offer a ſacrifice that ſhould coſt him nothing. So Araunah remitted himſelf to David, who gave him fifty † ſhekels for the floor; offer'd ſacrifices and burnt-

That David gave Araunah more than fifty ſhekels of ſilver, is reaſonable to ſuppoſe, ſince fifty ſhekels of ſilver, (admitting a ſhekel to be worth two ſhillings and ſeven pence in our money, which is the higheſt valuation any writer has put upon it) would amount to no more than ſix pounds, nine ſhillings, and two pence; a very burnt-offerings, and peace-offerings likewiſe upon it. After this ſolemnity, David was reinſtated in God's grace and favour. This was the place that Abraham brought his ſon Iſaac to, when he ſhould have been offer'd up himſelf for a ſacrifice, if a ram had not been preſented in his ſtead, when the knife was ready for the execution. But we have ſpoken of this in another place.

David calls the place the People's altar, and reſolves to build a temple there, 1 Chron. xxii. 1.

WHEN David found that his prayers were granted, and his ſacrifice accepted, he reſolved to call the whole place by the name of the People's Altar, or the Iſraelites Altar, and to build a temple there; which purpoſe of his was afterward ratified by God himſelf, who ſoon after ſent his prophet to him with a prediction, that his ſucceſſor ſhould there build a temple. David employ'd people upon this, to take an account how many ſtrangers he had in his dominions, which were reckon'd to amount to about one hundred and eighty thouſand perſons. Out of theſe he choſe eighty thouſand to work in ſtone; the reſt to be employ'd in carrying all ſorts of materials; out of which he appointed thirty five thouſand to overſee the workmen. There was gotten together a mighty maſs of iron and braſs, a prodigious quantity of cedar, which he had from Tyre and Sidon; the largeſt and the faireſt trees that were to be got. David would be telling his familiar friends all this while, that theſe materials were only to lie ready for uſe, when his ſon ſhould have occaſion for them, which would ſave time and trouble, and expedite the work; but that as yet his ſon was too young and unexperienc'd to manage ſuch a province.

David provides artificers, labourers, and materials toward this magnificent ſtructure, Ver. 2, 3, 4.

"would have done it myſelf, ſays he, but "being frequently in war, and conſequently "a man of blood, I was forbidden by an ex-"preſs command from Heaven, and the work "reſerved by providence for my youngeſt "ſon;" who, according to the prediction, was to be call'd Solomon, who ſhould be a prince of peace; of whom it was foretold, that God would take him with a paternal affection into his own care, and that the whole people of Iſrael ſhould be happy under his adminiſtration; and enjoy not only a peace (the greateſt of all temporal bleſſings) with foreigners, but live free from any civil or inteſtine diviſions among themſelves. "Now, ſays "David, ſince you were deſign'd to be a king, "even before you were born, do your endea-"vour to behave yourſelf as a man otherwiſe "worthy of that providence; govern your-"ſelf according to the meaſures of piety, "juſtice, and true fortitude; pay a reverence "to the precepts, laws, and traditions of "Moſes; obſerve them religiouſly yourſelf, "and do not ſuffer any violation of them in "others. As for the temple that God hath "appointed to be built in your reign, be ſure "to attend it as you ought to do, and let "not the difficulty of the work diſcourage "you; for it ſhall be my care to have all "the materials in readineſs for you to begin "withal, upon your firſt entrance into the go-"vernment. AFTER this he recommended it to the princes of the people to aſſiſt his ſon in this fabrick; and without being ſolicitous upon any other account, to attend the buſineſs of religion in the firſt place; for that alone would be ſufficient to ſecure the peace and welfare of the commonwealth, which are the never-failing rewards of righteouſneſs and juſtice. He appointed alſo, that upon the finiſhing of the temple, the ark ſhould be placed in it, with all the holy veſſels and utenſils there-

David charges Solomon to build the temple ſo ſoon as ever he comes to the crown, Ver. 6--13.

THIS was the ſituation of affairs, when David called his ſon Solomon to him, and gave him in ſpecial charge, that ſo ſoon as ever he came to the throne, he ſhould immediately enter upon the building of a temple, for the honour and worſhip of God. "I very inconſiderable ſum for a prince of David's riches, and no ways equivalent to the value of oxen for burnt-offerings, threſhing inſtruments for wood, and the wheat for the meat offering, beſide that large tract of ground on which the temple ſtood. On the other hand, ſix hundred ſhekels of gold, according to Calmet's tables, weighed eleven pounds, four ounces, ſeventeen penny weights, and twelve grains Troy weight, and in value amounted to five hundred and forty ſeven pounds, ten ſhillings, a ſum that ſeems much better proportion'd to the value of the purchaſe; we therefore adhere to the latter account as trueſt. This variation in Scripture, as alſo ſeveral others that we meet with, cannot any other ways be accounted for, than by imputing them to the errors of the Hebrew ſcribes, in tranſcribing the copies of the Bible, whereby the ſacred text has ſuffer'd corruption in ſome hundreds of places; or reconciled, otherwiſe than by a faithful reſtoration of the true readings; the adjuſting of which would be a work highly becoming the labours of the moſt learned men in Europe, and well worthy the proſecution, ſince the famous M. Le Clerc, and ſome others have undertook to lead the way.

* An Hebrew talent, according to Dom. Calmet's tables, weighed an hundred and fourteen pounds, fifteen penny weights Troy; and its value in gold was five thouſand four hundred and ſeventy five pounds Engliſh money. Ten thouſand talents therefore muſt weigh one million, an hundred and forty thouſand, ſix hundred, and twenty five pounds, and amount in value to fifty four millions, ſeven hundred and fifty thouſand pounds. Its value in ſilver, according to the aforeſaid author, was worth three hundred and forty two pounds, three ſhillings, and nine pence Engliſh money; an hundred thouſand therefore muſt weigh eleven millions, four hundred and ſix thouſand, and two hundred pound Troy, and amount to thirty four millions, two hundred and ſixty eight thouſand, and ſeven hundred pounds; but in 1 Chron. xxii. 14. from whence this is taken, 'tis juſt the reverſe, viz. a thouſand talents of ſilver, and an hundred thouſand talents of gold, which would amount to five hundred and forty ſeven millions, and five hundred thouſand pounds, a ſum ſo incredibly great, as may juſtly render the reading of the place ſuſpicious, Theſe counſels and exhortations of David were addreſs'd indifferently, both to his ſon and to the princes.

David is now cold, and worn out with age, 1 Kings i. 1.

DAVID was now but ſeventy years of age, and yet ſo worn out and ſpent with the infirmities of old age, and his blood ſo chill'd, that all the coverings and blankets they could throw over him would not procure him any heat; ſo that a council of phyſicians was called upon it, who unanimouſly agreed, that the beſt thing in the world for a man under theſe decays, was a fair young bed-fellow; for the warmth being gentle and kindly, would relieve nature without force. They found out upon this, in the city, a very beautiful woman that came up to the nicety of the preſcription, and put her to bed to him. Her name was Abiſhag, and her buſineſs only to lie by him, embrace, and comfort him; which ſhe might ſafely and innocently do, the king being now paſt the temptations of all irregular diſpoſitions. But of this virgin we ſhall have occaſion to ſpeak further hereafter.

Abiſhag is the perſon to ſupply the office, V. 3.

David's fourth ſon Adonijah,

DAVID had a fourth ſon, whoſe name was Adonijah; born to him by Haggith, and the next after Abſalom, as to his beauty, ſtature, and the gracefulneſs of his perſon; nay, and in his ambition too, he was not much unlike him. This Adonijah, Abſalom being dead, lays claim to the government, as the next in ſucceſſion; ſetting all his friends at work, by intereſt and popularity, to aſſiſt him toward the gaining of his point. He furniſhes himſelf with a pompous equipage of chariots, horſes, guards, and the like; while the good man his father innocently lets him go on, without the leaſt check or caution; nay, or ſo much as asking him the queſtion, what all this ſplendor and parade tended to. His chief accomplices were Joab the general, and the high-prieſt Abiathar; but Zadock the high-prieſt, and the prophet Nathan, Benaiah the captain of the guards, Shimei the king's friend, and the generality of the ſoldiery, were in a different intereſt, and oppoſed his meaſures.

Adonijah makes a mighty entertainment, Ver. 9.

ADONIJAH prepared a mighty treat in the Suburbs of Jeruſalem near the fountain in the king's gardens. To this entertainment he invited all his brothers, ſave only Solomon; and there was Joab alſo, and Abiathar; and the chiefs of the tribe of Judah: but for Zadock, Nathan, and Benaiah, and others of that intereſt, there was not a man of them invited. The prophet Nathan took notice of this to Bathſheba, the mother of Solomon. "Look ye, ſays "he, here's Adonijah ſetting himſelf up for "king, and David knows nothing of what's "done: wherefore let it be your care, as "well for your ſon's ſake, as for your own, "to look after this affair. Go you to David, "ſays the prophet, and when you have him "alone, mind him of his oath, that Solomon "ſhould reign after him; and yet here's Ado-"nijah, you may tell him, as good as upon "the throne already. While you are diſcourſ-"ing this matter with the king, I may come "into the chamber to you, and ſecond your "information." Bathſheba follow'd the prophets advice, and went in to the king, where ſhe made her reverence; and after leave given her to deliver ſomewhat ſhe had to ſay, ſhe gave David an account of the affair in the very words the prophet had put into her mouth; "Telling him the circumſtances of Adonijah's "entertainment; whom he invited, and whom "he left out: adding withal, that the people "were in a ſuſpence what to do till he ſhould "declare his ſucceſſor, and that her own life "and her ſon's were both at ſtake upon the iſ-"ſue." While this diſcourſe was a-foot, the ſervants brought David word, that the prophet Nathan was at the door to wait upon him. He was immediately call'd in, and upon the very inſtant of entering the preſence, he asked David, in ſome confuſion, "whether or no he "had that day transferred his government to "Adonijah, and declared him his ſucceſſor; "for he has made, ſays he, a very ſplendid "feaſt, invited ſuch and ſuch perſons to it; "omitted ſuch and ſuch others; and now are "they eating, drinking, and making merry, "with healths and acclamations to the honour "of their new king Adonijah: but for myſelf, "Zadock the high-prieſt, and Benaiah the "captain of the guards, we are all ſtrangers "to the matter. Now it would be well, ſaid "he, to let the world underſtand whether this "be done with your privity and approbation, "or not." Bathſheba withdrew when the prophet came in, and was now by the king's order call'd for back again. She was accordingly brought to David, and he ſpoke to her after this manner: "Well, ſays he to Bath-"ſheba, the thing that I have ſworn formerly, "I do now ſwear over again, in the preſence "of the great God: Your ſon Solomon ſhall "reign after me, and ſit upon my throne; "and you ſhall ſee it done this very day." Upon which declaration and aſſurance, ſhe ſubmiſſively took her leave, wiſhing the king a long life.

DAVID, upon this reſolution, ſent for Zadock and Benaiah, and bad them take the prophet Nathan, and the royal guards along with them; mount Solomon upon the king's mule, and carry him out of the city to the fountain that is called Gihon, there to anoint him with holy oil, and proclaim him king. This office being aſſigned to the high-prieſt and the prophet, command was further given, that they ſhould conduct him through the heart of the city with trumpets ſounding before him, and multitudes of troops following with ſhouts and rejoicings, crying, [Long live king Solomon] to the end, that the whole nation might take notice of it, that his father had declared him his ſucceſſor. David, for a concluſion, gave Solomon in charge to be ſure to govern, not only the tribe of Judah, but the whole nation of the Hebrews, according to the ſtricteſt rules and meaſures of piety and juſtice.

And ſo to conduct him with ſhouts, and trumpets through the city.

BENAIAH, after this, with an affectionate ejaculation for God's bleſſing upon Solomon, and the whole proceeding, went inſtantly away with the reſt of the company, according to their order, to execute the office aſſign'd them. They mounted Solomon upon the king's mule; conducted him out of the city to the fountain; anointed him with holy oil, and then brought him back again, attended with acclamations, and the unanimous wiſhes of a long and happy reign. They brought him afterward to the palace, and placed him upon his father's throne.

They place Solomon on his father's throne, with joy and acclamations, Ver. 39, 40.

This

This ſolemnity being over, the people gave up themſelves to jollity and feaſting, muſick, dancing, and all other chearful diverſions, to ſuch a degree of tranſport and rejoicings, that heaven and earth rang of it. The clamour of this extravagant joy coming to the ears of Adonijah and his gueſts, did not a little ſurprize them; Joab himſelf declaring that the noiſe he heard of ſhouts and trumpets did not at all pleaſe him. In a word, it gave ſuch a damp to their jollity, and diſreliſh to their dainties, that none of them had any appetite to enjoy what was before them. While they were in this muſing melancholy poſture, Jonathan, the ſon of Abiathar the high-prieſt, come running to them in great haſte, whom Adonijah was very glad to ſee, upon a miſtaken opinion that he brought good news with him. So Jonathan gave them the whole relation of the king's orders, and the proceeding concerning Solomon; which they had no ſooner heard, but every man ſlink'd away from the banquet to his own home. Only Adonijah being conſcious to himſelf of an indignity too great to be forgiven, fled for ſanctuary to the horns of the altar, and there begg'd for pardon. When Solomon came to underſtand how it was with Adonijah, and that he inſiſted upon ſome ſecurity to be given him for an indemnity and oblivion, with as much prudence as clemency, he granted him a pardon for what was paſt; but with a precaution, to have a care how he behav'd himſelf for the future; for if he ſhould ever be found in any ſuch practice again for the time to come, his deſtruction ſhould lie at his own door. So Solomon order'd him to be brought to him from his place of refuge, and when he had paid his duty and reverence to the new king, he bad him go to his own houſe again in peace, and to behave himſelf for the time to come like a good man, which it was highly his own intereſt to do.

It was David's intention to have Solomon declared and recognized the king of the whole nation of Iſrael; in order to which end, he ſummon'd all the princes to Jeruſalem, together with the prieſts and Levites; and he found upon the roll thirty eight thouſand men among them, that were above thirty years of age; out of which number there were twenty four thouſand to attend the building of the temple; judges and their clerks ſix thouſand; four thouſand porters belonging to the houſe of God, and as many ſingers and muſicians, or players upon inſtruments; of which we have ſaid ſomewhat already. Theſe he divided into families, and upon ſeparating the prieſts from the reſt of the tribe, he found four and twenty of them; that is to ſay, ſixteen deſcended from Eleazar, and eight from Ithamar; appointing every family to officiate eight days, or from ſabbath to ſabbath, and ſo to do duty one after another. The lots of the whole were all caſt in the preſence of David, and of the high-prieſts Zadock and Abiathar, together with the heads of the tribes. The lot that came out firſt being enter'd upon the roll, [the firſt family] and ſo the ſecond, and the third, &c. to the four and twentieth, in order as it happen'd, which way of diſtribution continues in uſe to this day. He divided the tribe of Levi alſo in twenty four parts, to ſucceed one after another, according to the chance of the lot, in the ſame manner with the prieſts. But the preference was ſtill given to the poſterity of Moſes; to whom was committed the truſt and cuſtody of the holy treaſure, and the bounties and donations of princes and royal benefactors. He likewiſe order'd the whole tribe of Levi, and the prieſts, to attend the ſervice of God, day and night in their turns, according to the primitive preſcription and inſtitution of Moſes.

The tribe of Levi is divided alſo into twenty four parts, to ſucceed in order, as the prieſts, Ver. 20, &c.

In the next place he made a diſtribution of the whole army into twelve diviſions, with their commanders in chief, tribunes, centurions, and their ſubordinates; every diviſion to conſiſt of twenty four thouſand * men, and each of thoſe diviſions to do a month's duty in their reſpective courſes, upon the guard of Solomon's palace, together with their tribunes and centurions; every part to have its diſtinct officer or judge; and he to be a perſon of a try'd integrity and juſtice. He appointed alſo overſeers of the king's income, vineyards, lands, husbandry, flocks, and herds, &c. whom it would be needleſs to name in this place. When David had order'd matters as above, he call'd a general aſſembly of the Hebrew magiſtrates, the princes of the tribes, the officers of the army, and the managers of the revenue; and then raiſing himſelf upon an eminence, ſpoke to the people from his throne to the following effect:

David delivers to Solomon a draught and model of the temple, with directions for utenſils, &c. 1 Chron. xxviii. 11, &c.

UPON the finiſhing of this diſcourſe and charge, David gave his ſon, in the ſight of all his people, a draught of the form and model of the temple, from top to bottom; the foundation and the ſuperſtructure; the height and breadth of the fabrick; the private cells, their number, and dimenſions; what veſſels of gold and ſilver were to be provided, with directions for their preciſe weight. THIS ſpeech of David's was entertained with great cheerfulneſs, both by princes, prieſts and Levites, who were all zealous for the forwarding of the work, every one in his proportion. They offer'd, among them, to bring in † five thouſand talents of gold, a hundred ‖ thouſand of ſilver, ten thouſand ſhekels, and a maſs of iron not to be imagin'd. They that had precious ſtones, brought them into the treaſury, where they were depoſited in the cuſtody of one Jalus, of the race of Moſes. The people were infinitely pleas'd upon the whole matter, and David above all the reſt, to ſee ſuch an unanimous and univerſal agreement and willingneſs, both in princes, prieſts, and people, towards carrying on of the work; for

He called then upon the people to join with him in their thanks to Almighty God for all his mercies, who fell upon their faces and worſhipped; and coming after this to David, made their acknowledgments for all the benefits and advantages they had enjoy'd under his reign. The day following was a great day of ſacrifices; a thouſand calves, a thouſand rams, and a thouſand lambs, for a burnt-offering; and afterward, a great many thouſand victims more for peace-offerings. It was a day, in fine, dedicated to feaſting and jollity, both by king and people. Solomon was now a ſecond time anointed, declared, and owned by the people, for their lawful king; and Zadock, by the voice of the whole multitude, deſigned for their high-prieſt. Solomon was now conducted to the palace, and placed upon his father's throne, from which day forward, the people paid him their true allegiance.

DAVID was now ſinking apace, under the double weight of age and ſickneſs; and finding himſelf near his end, he called for his ſon Solomon to give him his counſel and his bleſſing, and ſo to take his laſt leave of him. " Son, ſays he, I am now going to my fathers;

So ſoon as David had finiſh'd this diſcourſe to his ſon about his government, the requiting of his friends, and the puniſhing of his enemies, he gave up the ghoſt, in the ſeventieth year of his age, after he had reign'd ſeven years and ſix months over the tribe of Judah at Hebron, and thirty three years more over all Iſrael, at Jeruſalem. He was a man of wonderful goodneſs, and endued with all the royal excellencies that might qualify a prince for the diſcharge of ſo great a truſt. He was valiant, no man more; and himſelf perſonally in the head of all dangers, for the protection and defence of his people. He did more with his ſoldiers by his example, than by any imperiouſneſs of command. He was a judicious prince in the choice of his councils; of a ſingular preſence of mind, to make the beſt of what he had before him, and of as ſharp a foreſight for the improving of all advantages, and the obviating of difficulties to come. To all this, he was temperate and ſober, affable to all, tender toward people in diſtreſs, righteous and humane; which are all princely virtues. He was a prince, in ſhort, that never made an ill uſe of his power, ſaving only in the caſe of the wife of Uriah. He left a treaſure to his ſucceſſor greater than ever any other prince whatſoever left before him: and he was bury'd at Jeruſalem, with a ſolemnity of royal pomp and magnificence that was glorious to the higheſt degree: and over and above the ſplendour of the ceremony, his ſon Solomon depoſited in his monument an ineſtimable treaſure, of which we may form ſome tolerable Idea, from that which I have farther to ſay.

David the beſt of princes, and of men.

David an unexceptionable ruler, ſave only in the matter of Uriah.

He dy'd rich, and was buried at Jeruſalem, ibid.

Solomon depoſited a mighty treaſure in David's monument.

A MATTER of thirteen hundred years after this revolution, Hyrcanus the high-prieſt was beſieged in Jeruſalem, by Antiochus, ſirnamed the pious, and the ſon of Demetrius. They came to a treaty, and Antiochus offer'd for a certain ſum of money, to raiſe the ſiege, and draw off his army. Hyrcanus had no way to raiſe it, but by the opening of David's monument, and thence he took three thouſand talents; out of which he paid Antiochus the Sum † agreed upon for a compoſition, and ſo ſet the town at liberty, as we have ſhew'd elſewhere. It was king Herod's fortune, many years after this, to diſcover another cell of hidden treaſure, which he took away, to a prodigious value, but neither of them were come yet to the ſecret repoſitory where the king's aſhes lay; that privacy being ſo artificially contriv'd, and ſo far under ground, that there was hardly any coming at it; but here's as much ſaid already as needs upon this point.

Antiochus beſieged Jeruſalem.

Hyrcanus compounds to raiſe the ſiege for three hundred talents.

King Herod found another maſs of hidden treaſure long after.

† In Book I. Chap. ii. of the wars of the Jews, Joſephus ſays the ſum agreed on was three hundred talents, which in weight amounts to nineteen thouſand nine hundred and ſixty pounds, eleven ounces, five penny weights; but does not tell us whether of gold or ſilver. If of the former, as is more probable, the ſum in value was equivalent to nine hundred fifty eight thouſand one hundred twenty five pounds. If of ſilver, to fifty nine thouſand eight hundred eighty two pounds ſixteen ſhillings and five pence. But learned men, not without reaſon, believe the whole ſtory to be no more than a fiction of the Rabbins, and blame Joſephus for his credulity in giving in to it.

From the Year of the World 2931 to 3048.

CHAP. I.

Solomon comes to the throne with an univerſal joy; only Adonijah tampers underhand with Bathſheba. Solomon cauſes Adonijah, Joab, and Shimei to be put to death; and depoſes Abiathar from the high-prieſthood.

WE have treated in the laſt foregoing book, of the life and character of David, his piety, and his converſation; the great ſervices, and the many good offices he render'd to his country; the terrible wars and combats that he underwent, with the hiſtory of his victories and ſucceſſes; and we have brought him to his end at laſt, full of years and honour, to ſleep with his fathers. Solomon, his ſon and ſucceſſor, came young to the government; but by the over-ruling will and appointment of God, however, and not without the ſolemn and declaratory conſent and approbation alſo of his father. When he was once advanced to the throne, the people came all running in to him, as is uſual upon ſuch changes, with congratulatory acclamations and multiplied wiſhes of long life and a happy reign.

Solomon enters upon the government with univerſal joy, 1 Kings ii. 12.

ONLY Adonijah, who had formerly made an attempt upon the government in the life-time of his father, applied himſelf in an artful way of addreſs to Bathſheba, the king's mother. She received him with great courteſy, and with large aſſurances of her aſſiſtance, if there were any thing in her power that ſhe could ſerve him in. Upon this encouragement he came preſently to his point; "Great princeſs, ſays he, I ſhall not need to tell you, that if I were diſpoſed to be troubleſome upon this turn of government, the right of priority, and the good-will of the people would be on my ſide; but, ſays he, ſince it has pleaſed God to devolve it upon your ſon Solomon, I am the king's moſt humble ſervant, and ſhall very well content myſelf within the bounds of my preſent condition. I have only one thing to beg of you, which is, that you will be pleas'd to uſe your intereſt with your ſon, on my behalf, that I may be permitted, with his good leave, to take Abiſhag to wife. She lay by my father David's ſide only to keep him warm in his extreme decay of heat, and undoubtedly he left her as good a virgin as he found her." Bathſheba promis'd him the uttermoſt of what ſhe could do in the matter, and encourag'd him to hope well of the iſſue; for Solomon, ſhe doubted not, would moſt readily agree to gratify the joint requeſt of his brother and his mother, in a greater matter than this appear'd to be. This was a word of comfort to Adonijah from Bathſheba, who went directly to her ſon, to confer with him upon the matter. Solomon roſe up to meet his mother; and taking her in his arms, conducted her to his bed-chamber, where he placed her on his right-hand upon a chair of ſtate next to his own. Bathſheba was no ſooner ſeated, but ſhe enter'd preſently upon her buſineſs. "Son, Adonijah makes an intereſt with Bathſheba, for his own ends, Ver. 15--17.

And under the appearance of a ſeeming reſignation, ib.

He begs Bathſheba's good word to her ſon, for leave to marry Abiſhag, ibid.

Bathſheba promiſes him her intereſt, Ver. 18.

Bathsheba moves Solomon to give Abishag to Adonijah, 1 Kings ii. 20, 21.

" Son, says she, I have an humble suit to you, " and it would trouble me not a little, if you " should refuse it." Pray what is it? says Solomon, not without some uneasiness at such a preface, as if there were any thing for her to ask, which a dutiful child could deny to his own mother. So Solomon entreated her to go on, and to depend upon his readiness to comply with her in any thing he could do. " Well, son, says Bathsheba, I make it my " request then, that you will give Abishag in " marriage to your brother Adonijah." The king started up at that proposal in a surprize, and dismiss'd his mother. " No, no, says " Solomon, Adonijah has more ambitious de- " signs in his head than the marrying of Abi- " shag. Why does he not speak plain rather, " and put in his claim to the kingdom, as elder " brother; which he might every jot as ho- " nestly do, and with one and the same trou- " ble. First, he desires Abishag in marriage; " and then he has fortify'd himself with great " friends and interest to back his pretensions: " As Joab, the general for one; Abiathar " the high-priest, for another, and the like." Solomon at this rate deliberating and computing upon the present state of things, sent Benaiah, the captain of the guards, with a commission forthwith to kill his brother; and then calling for Abiathar, the high-priest, he told him, that though he had deserv'd to die, yet in regard of the services he had done his father, and of the part he bore in bringing back the ark, his punishment should be thus: " Get " you gone, says he, immediately from this " place, and let my eyes never see you more. " Betake yourself to your own home; fix your " habitation in the country, and there conti- " nue to the day of your death. You have " been false to me in joining with Adonijah, " and for that fault, this is your sentence. " You have made yourself unworthy of the " honour of the priesthood, and from this time " forward you shall exercise the function no " more."

Solomon orders Adonijah to be put to death, Ver. 25.

THIS was the cause of translating the sacerdotal dignity from the house of Ithamar (as God had foretold to Eli, the grandfather of Abiathar) into the family of Phinees, to Zadock. During the continuance of the Pontificate in the house of Ithamar, reckoning from Eli, the first that executed that office, there were of the family of Phinees, that led private lives, Boccias, the son of Joseph; Jonathan, of Boccias; Marcoth, of Jonathan; Arapha, of Marcoth; Architob, of Arapha; and Zadock, the son of Architob, who was the first high-priest that was created under David.

The sacerdotal dignity translated from the house of Ithamar, to that of Phinees.

The line of Zadock.

WHEN Joab heard of the death of Adonijah, being conscious to himself of having cultivated his friendship, and studied his interest more than the king's, he took up a very reasonable apprehension that his own turn would be next, and so fled for sanctuary to the altar; not doubting but that the veneration the king had for God, and for holy things, would be a protection to him. When Solomon came to understand that Joab had taken sanctuary, he sent Benaiah to cite him to a court of justice to answer for what he had done; but Joab refused to quit the altar, declaring, " That if " he must perish, he would rather die there " than in another place." Benaiah carry'd this answer of Joab to the king; who presently order'd him to cut off his head where he was, as a just punishment upon him for the two detestable murthers of Abner and Amasa, against all the measures of honour, humanity and justice; but the king gave it in charge to Benaiah, to see his body bury'd, for a memorial to posterity of so execrable a wickedness, and likewise to acquit both himself and his father, of any rigour in the death of Joab. Benaiah, upon the execution of this commission, was made general in Joab's place; and upon the deposing of Abiathar the high-priest, the king assigned Zadock to succeed him.

SOLOMON, at the same time, appointed Shimei to build himself a house at Jerusalem, and not to stir out of it, or pass the river Kedron *, upon the peril of his life: neither was this menace sufficient, without an oath, over and above, to perform what he had promised. Shimei seem'd very well satisfied with the conditions, and gave his oath for the observance of them. Hereupon he quitted his own country, and came and dwelt at Jerusalem. About three years after this, it happen'd that two of Shimei's servants ran away from him; and the master hearing that they were at Gath, took a journey thither, in order to fetch them back again. Upon his return with his servants, the king it seems got notice of it, and took the double contempt so heinously, first of the command, and then of the oath, that he call'd Shimei to a severe account for the misdemeanour. " Didst not thou swear to me, says So- " lomon, that thou wouldst never stir out of " this city into any other, to the day of thy " death? and like a false wretch as thou art, " thou hast now broken that sacred oath, and " for that perjury thou shalt die. Take this " for thy instruction too, that divine ven- " geance, sooner or later, finds out the de- " linquent; and that forbearance is so far from " an acquittal, that it inflames the reckoning. " The hand of God is in this judgment upon " thee, not only for thy late perjury, but for " thy sins of ancient date; I mean thy ribaldry " and insolences against my father, in the " depth of his distresses. Think of it, says " Solomon, for God is just." And so Benaiah put Shimei to death by the king's order.

CHAP. II.

Solomon marries the daughter of the king of Egypt, and repairs the walls of Jerusalem. He's endu'd with the gift of wisdom. The names of his great officers. He builds a temple, places the ark in it, erects a stately palace, fortifies Jerusalem, subdues the Canaanites. His prodigious wealth. The love of women brings him to idolatry. Adad stirs up a sedition against him. Jeroboam foretold that ten tribes of the twelve shall fall under his allegiance.

SOLOMON had by this time all his enemies under subjection; his throne establish'd, the minds of the people settled, and his government consequently made easy to him. In this interval of a profound peace, both at home and abroad, he took to wife the daughter of the king of Egypt; fell to work upon rebuilding the walls of Jerusalem, which he made much larger and stronger than they were before; and so apply'd himself to the office of his publick adminiſtration. He was very young, 'tis true, but want of years was never any hindrance or excuſe to him in the doing of juſtice, or in the execution of the laws, or in the paying of a religious reverence to the authority and doctrine of his dying father's precepts; for in one word, ſuch was the pregnancy, even of his early youth, that he ruled and managed every thing with a judgment that might have become the gravity of a moſt conſummated experience.

Solomon pays reverence to the precepts of his dying father, 1 Kings iii. 3.

Now finding himſelf in this ſtate of quiet and freedom, he thought he could not do better than to addreſs himſelf to God by prayer and ſacrifice, in acknowledgment of theſe mercies; and upon that motion he went to Hebron *, where he offer'd upon Moſes's brazen altar, long ſince erected there, a thouſand victims for a burnt-offering. This piety and zeal was ſo acceptable to God, that the very night following he appear'd unto him in a dream; and to ſhew him that the ſervices of his heart and good-will ſhould not go unrewarded, he bad him ask what he would, and it ſhould be granted him. Solomon pitch'd upon the greateſt and the moſt valuable thing he could think of, and that which he concluded would be moſt agreeable to the approbation of the giver, and at the ſame time moſt advantageous to the receiver. It was not ſilver, nor gold, nor any of thoſe vulgar ſatisfactions, that young men, and the miſtaken part of the world commonly ſet their hearts upon, that he choſe as the only things worth asking: this, I ſay, was not Solomon's wiſh; but, "Lord, ſays "he, grant me a right apprehenſion of mat-"ters, and a ſound judgment, that may en-"able me to govern this people according to "truth and juſtice." This choice of Solomon's was ſo acceptable to God, that he not only promis'd him what he deſir'd, but riches and glory over and above; and in the firſt place, ſuch a degree of underſtanding, and of a practical wiſdom, as no man, either publick or private, could ever pretend to before him; with a farther promiſe, that upon condition of his continuing juſt to the world, obedient in all things to God, and treading in the ſteps, and imitating the eminent virtues of his father, the government ſhould remain in his family for many ages. Upon theſe words Solomon awak'd, aroſe out of his bed immediately, worſhipp'd, and gave thanks, and ſo returned to Jeruſalem, where he ſacrificed to God before the tabernacle, and feaſted all his people.

About this time there was a difficult caſe brought before him, which I ſhall give the reader a particular account of, partly for the nicety of it, and partly for the uſe it may be of to others, in exciting the like induſtry of ſearch and ſcrutiny, upon the like occaſion. There came to the king two common mercenary proſtitutes for juſtice. The plantiff told her tale firſt, and it was to this effect: "This "woman, ſays ſhe, and I liv'd both in a lodg-"ing, and it was our fortune to be deliver'd "each of us of a male child on the ſame day "and hour. Within a matter of three days, "this woman having overlaid her own child, "and ſmother'd it, took mine ſoftly out of "my arms as I was aſleep, and laid her's in "the place of it. Early the next morning, "when I was thinking to ſuckle my own in-"fant, the child was not to be found, but a "dead one laid in the place; for I know my "own child by moſt infallible marks. I have "preſs'd her for my child; but ſhe keeps it "from me, and bears me down that it is her "child ſtill, and I have no witneſs to prove "the contrary. Now Sir, ſays the woman, "I humbly beſeech your majeſty to ſee right "done betwixt us." "Well, ſays the king "to the other woman, and what have you "now to ſay for yourſelf?" "She laid no "ſuch child there, ſhe ſaid, but the living "child was her own, and ſo ſtood upon her "juſtification." People were all in the dark what judgment to make of it, for want of competent proofs, till Solomon bethought himſelf of this expedient. He order'd the two children, one living, and the other dead, to be brought, and one of his guards to take his ſword, and cut them both in halves, juſt in the middle, and ſo divide them betwixt the two pretended mothers, half of the one, and half of the other, to either of them. This was look'd upon to be a kind of a childiſh ſentence at firſt; but one of the women crying out earneſtly, and begging that her companion might rather have the child, and paſs for the mother of it, provided only that the life of it might be ſpar'd, and ſhe herſelf have the comfort of ſeeing it yet amongſt the living. This was all ſhe had to ask, ſhe ſaid: The other woman all this while quietly ſubmitting to the judgment, and not without ſome ſeeming ſatisfaction at the calamity of her neighbour; a cruel, certainly, and a hard-hearted pleaſure! The king, in fine, adjudg'd the child to the right woman, upon the evidence of her tenderneſs and natural affection; highly condemning the wickedneſs of the other, that after ſhe had kill'd her own child, did what ſhe could to deſtroy that of her friend's too. This was ſo ſingular an inſtance of the king's wiſdom, ſagacity, and conduct, that from that day forward, the people honour'd and obey'd him, as a prince that acted by the guidance and direction of a divine impulſe.

He had his governors and great officers in all his provinces. There was Uri, the ſon of Hur, in the tribe of Ephraim, including Bethlehem. The ſon of Aminadab, ſon-in-law to Solomon, had the command of Dora, and the ſea coaſt. The great plain was under Baana, the ſon of Achil, and ſo as far as to the river of Jordan. The ſon of Geber had the government of the Gileadites and the Gaulonites, as far as Mount Libanus; within which command there were ſixty large and well fortified cities. Achinadab, that married Baſima, another of Solomon's daughters, had the government of all Galilee up to Sidon. Under Baanah was the government of the ſea coaſt about Aſher. Jehoſaphat commanded the mountains Itabyr and Carmel, and all the Lower Galilee, to the farther ſide of Jordan. The whole country of the Benjamites was under the government of † Subes; and the land beyond Jordan was under Tabar. Theſe were Solomon's governors, and he had one lieutenant-general to ſuperintend them all.

fear of any diſtractions by war or tumult, they gave themſelves up to husbandry and improvements, and in a ſhort time advanc'd their fortunes and poſſeſſions (the tribe of Judah eſpecially) to a miracle. The king had likewiſe other officers, beſide thoſe beforementioned, over the Syrians, and other barbarous nations, between Egypt and Euphrates, to whom he committed the care of his receipts, thoſe people being his tributaries. The daily proportion of proviſions that theſe people furniſh'd every day for the king's own table and entertainment, was thirty chomers * of fine flower, threeſcore chomers of meal, ten fat oxen, twenty oxen out of the paſtures, and a hundred fat lambs, beſide deer, birds, fiſhes, and other contingent curioſities of the chace. He had ſo prodigious a number of chariots, that there were forty thouſand ſtalls provided for the horſes that belonged to them, over and above twelve thouſand horſemen that were of his guards; the one half being quarter'd in Jeruſalem, near his perſon, and the other half diſtributed into out-villages near the city; and the ſame officer that was commiſſary for the expence of the king's table, was appointed alſo to provide neceſſaries for the king's houſe, which way ſoever he mov'd.

THE wiſdom, in fine, and knowledge of Solomon, being a divine infuſion, was ſo far beyond the philoſophy and underſtanding of the antients, that the Egyptians themſelves, though reputed the wiſeſt of men, fell infinitely ſhort of him; and ſo did the great men of his age among the Hebrews, how highly ſoever celebrated and eſteemed; as for example, there was Athan, and Heman, and Calcol, and Dodan, the ſons of Hemahon. This wonderful prince compos'd a thouſand and five books of odes and poems, and three thouſand books of parables and ſimilies. He wrote the hiſtory of plants, from the cedar to the hyſſop; and ſo of cattle and beaſts of the earth, waterfowl and the birds of the air; for he underſtood the nature of all theſe creatures; ſtudied and philoſophiz'd upon it, and upon their reſpective proprieties and diſpoſitions. And he did not only know and underſtand (by a gift from above,) but likewiſe improve his knowledge and underſtanding of theſe things, for the help and benefit of mankind, even to the confuſion of the devils themſelves; for he compos'd charms and incantations for the cure of diſeaſes, and left behind him forms of conjuration, in writing, ſo effectual againſt evil ſpirits, that they fly before them, without ever daring to return; which way of remedy is much in requeſt with our people to this day. "I ſaw one † Eleazar, a countryman of mine, diſpoſſeſſing of people in the "preſence of Veſpaſian, and his ſons, officers "and ſoldiers, and his method was this: he "applied a ring to the noſtrils of the perſon "poſſeſs'd, with a piece of a certain root con"vey'd under the ſeal of it, being a ſecret of So"lomon's. The demoniack did but ſmell to it, "and the devil was drawn out by the noſe. "The ſpirit threw the man down, but Elea"zar adjur'd it never to trouble him any more;

This being done, no body "doubted of the admirable knowledge and "wiſdom of Solomon." UPON the death of David, and the ſucceſſion of Solomon to the throne, Hiram, the king of Tyre, who ever had a great affection for the father, ſent a gratulatory embaſſy to the ſon, upon the news of his acceſſion to the government, expreſſing great joy to ſee it continued in the family. Upon the return of theſe ambaſſadors, Solomon laid hold of the occaſion, and wrote a letter to Hiram in theſe words:

Solomon orders Hiram a yearly preſent of wheat, oil, &c. 1 Kings v. 11. and 2 Chron. ii—16.

UPON the receipt of Hiram's letter, Solomon was wonderfully pleaſed with the frankneſs and humanity of the proceeding; ſo that in return for his goodneſs and reſpect, he order'd him a yearly preſent of two thouſand chomers of wheat *, and likewiſe of two thouſand veſſels of oil, and as many of wine, of ſeventy two quarts a-piece. This was the firſt earneſt of a friendſhip betwixt theſe two kings; and it continued to increaſe to the laſt, every day firmer and ſtronger.

The king provides workmen; aſſigns their number, task, &c. 1 Kings v. 15, &c.

THE king order'd his people to provide him thirty thouſand workmen, which he diſpoſed of in ſuch eaſy ways and methods of diſtribution, that their labour ſhould not be grievous to them. The number of them was thrice ten thouſand, and their poſt was to do duty for one month, by ten thouſand at a time, in cutting down wood upon Mount Libanus, and to be reliev'd at the month's end by the ſecond ten thouſand, and the ſecond, after another month, by the third; ſo that they had two month's liberty to be at their own homes; and ſo thus in a circle, every fourth month, each ten thouſand to take their turn over again. Their inſpector-general, or ſuperintendent, was Adoniram. Beſide theſe, there were ſeventy thouſand foreigners, formerly deſign'd by David, for the carrying of ſtones and other materials; eighty thouſand ſtone-cutters and maſons, and three thouſand and three hundred overſeers of the work. Their order was to make uſe of the largeſt ſtones they could get for the foundation, and to have them ſquar'd, and ready wrought upon the mountains where they grew, and thence to be carried whole to Jeruſalem; in which injunction Hiram's men were concern'd as well as any of the reſt.

The time when Solomon began the building of the temple, 1 Kings vi. 1.

SOLOMON was now in the fourth year of his reign, when he began this mighty work; and of that year, the ſecond month, which the Macedonians call Artemiſius, and the Hebrews Jar; five hundred ninety two † years from the Iſraelites coming out of Egypt; a thouſand and twenty years from Abraham's coming out of Meſopotamia into the land of Canaan; fourteen hundred and forty from the deluge; and from the creation of the world, three thouſand one hundred and two. It was alſo in the eleventh year of Hiram, the king of Tyre; and two hundred and forty years after the building of that city.

The foundation of it, 2 Chron. iii.

THE foundation was laid prodigiouſly deep; and the ſtones not only of the largeſt ſize, but hard and firm enough to endure all weathers, and proof againſt the worm; beſide, that they were ſo morteſſed one into another, and wedg'd into the rock, that the ſtrength and curioſity of the baſis was not leſs admirable than the bulk and ornament of the intended ſuperſtructure, and the one every way anſwerable to the beauty and magnificence of the other. The walls were all of a white ſtone from the ground to the cieling. The height of the building was ſixty cubits ||, the length as much, and the breadth twenty; over which there was another ſtage of the ſame dimenſions; ſo that the whole height of the building, from bottom to top, was a hundred and  twenty cubits, and it look'd toward the eaſt. The porch, or court next to the entrance, was twenty cubits in length, to anſwer the temple; ten *† in breadth, and a *‡ hundred and twenty cubits in height. There was built round about it, and againſt the outward walls, like ſo many buttreſſes to ſupport it, thirty cells, or little houſes, in the form of galleries, opening one into another. The length and breadth of theſe cells was five and twenty cubits each, and the height twenty; and there were two other floors over this, of the ſame make and proportions; amounting altogether to the juſt height of the lower part of the fabrick, which we have been ſpeaking of; for theſe cells or galleries went no higher than the top of the firſt ſtory. They were all cieled with cedar, and every partition had its covering apart, independant one of another; but they were all coupled and faſten'd together, by long and large beams, in ſuch a faſhion, that they look'd but like one piece, and as if the very walls were the ſtronger for them. Under theſe beams were ſeveral curious varieties of carving, fret-work, gilding, &c. the walls all wainſcoted with cedar, and ſo illuſtrated with works in gold, that the dazzling ſplendor made every thing about it look glorious. The whole frame, in fine, was rais'd upon ſtones, poliſh'd to the higheſt degree of perfection, and so artificially put together, that there was no joint to be discerned, nor the least sign of a hammer, or of any working tool that had ever come upon it; all things being so adjusted and accommodated, one piece to another beforehand, that upon the whole matter it look'd liker the work of providence and nature, than the product of art or human invention.

A contrivance for passages of communication.

Now in regard that the second story had not a large door to it at the east end of it, as the lower had, but only some small doors to go in at, from the sides above, Solomon contriv'd a pair of winding stairs to be cut through the thickness of the wall, for a passage to the upper part. The inside of the temple was all lin'd with cedar; and the cramping of the timbers together with strong irons, was a great strength and security to the building. The king caused it to be laid in two divisions; that is to say, the inner part, or holy of holies, of twenty cubits square, which was inaccessible; and the other of forty cubits *, which was assigned to the use and service of the priest. In the partition wall, betwixt the inner and the outward part of the temple, he built large cedar doors, which were richly gilt, and delicately carved, beside choice curiosities of fancy and history, embroider'd upon a hanging veil before it, of rich silks and fine linnen, interwoven with beautiful flowers; some purple, some scarlet, and the colours all in perfection.

Two golden cherubims in the holy place, 2 Chron. iii. 10--13.

SOLOMON caused also to be made two cherubims of massy gold, which he dedicated to God in the holy place, both of a size; being each of them five cubits † high, and two wings, each of them of five cubits in length; which being stretched out, one touched the south side, and the other the north; and with their other two wings, they met one another, over-spreading the holy ark in the middle. It is not for any man to describe, or so much as to imagine a description of these cherubims. And then the very floor of the temple was overlaid with beaten gold, the doors very large, and proportion'd to the height of the walls, twenty cubits broad, and still gold upon gold. To speak all in a word, it was gold all over, and nothing wanting, either within or without, that might contribute to the glory and magnificence of the work. There was a curious curtain, or hanging, put up at this gate, as at the other, but none at the entrance into the porch.

Solomon sends for one Hiram from Tyre, a famous architect and worker in metals, 1 Kings vii. 13.

SOLOMON had heard of a famous man in Tyre for working in gold, silver, and other metals, whose name was Hiram. He was an eminent architect, over and above. His mother was of the tribe of Naphthali; and his father, by extraction, an Israelite. He sent for this man to Tyre, and employ'd him in his business; and whersoever Solomon had any thing to do that was difficult or curious, it was perform'd by Hiram. He cast him two brazen hollow pillars of four fingers thick in the metal, ‡ eighteen cubits high, and || twelve in circumference; two chapiters of brass on the tops of the two pillars, five cubits each.

Several curiosities of Hiram's making.

These were cover'd with a kind of brass network; and below them were flowers or lilly-work of the same contrivance, with two rows of pomegranates hanging down, a hundred in each row. These two pillars he placed in the entrance of the porch; one on the right-hand, which he called Jachin; and the other on the left, which he called Boaz.

The figure of the brazen sea, 2 Chron. iv. 2--5.

HE made a vessel also of molten brass, somewhat after the figure of a globe, cut off in the middle, which for the largeness of it he called his sea. It was made goblet-fashion; the diameter ten cubits from side to side, four fingers thick, with a twisted pillar of one cubit over, under the middle of it for a supporter. Around this pillar were placed the figures of twelve bulls, or oxen; facing, by three and three, the four principal quarters of east, west, north, and south. They stood in a position lower behind than before, which was both an easing to the weight, and kept it firm and steddy. This sea, or vessel, held three thousand baths, reckoning every bath at about ten English pottles.

Ten bases of brass for as many lavers, Ver. 6.

HIRAM made also ten bases of brass of an oblong square, and all of the same form and dimensions; that is to say, five cubits in length each of them, four in breadth, and six in height. The several pieces were cast apart, and then put together after this manner: there were four pillars, or undersetters, one to the corner of every base, which were so incorporated with the rest of the work, that they served not only to uphold the weight, but to keep the sides tight one to another. Upon the squares were the figures of a lion, a bull, an eagle, &c. and the like images also upon the pillars, and upon the plates of the borders. The whole work was mounted upon four wheels, a cubit and a half over, all of cast-work; nave, spokes, and every thing belonging to it; and it was a wonderful thing to see how true and accurately every inch of it was wrought. The angles were made good with embossed work of shoulders, hands, paws of lions, talons of eagles; with rests or ledges of rail upon them to receive the laver; but so artificially fitted to the figures of those creatures, as they were there represented upon the pannels, together with branches of palm-trees intermixed upon the same piece, that every thing look'd as natural as if it had been to the life.

Ten brazen lavers for ten bases, ibid.

THIS was the structure of the ten bases; and to these bases he made ten lavers of the same metal, and of a roundish conchous form, each containing forty baths; the height *† four cubits, and the diameter as much. These ten lavers were set upon as many bases, which in their language they called Mechenoth. They were all placed in the temple; five of them on the left-hand, at the north side; and the other five at the south side, on the right, looking toward the east. In the same place stood likewise the brazen sea. They were all fill'd with water; the sea for the use of the priests to wash their hands and feet with, upon entering the sanctuary, before they went up to

THERE was nothing wanting, in fine, of induſtry, magnificence, or expence toward the advancing of this glorious work, that might either expreſs the zeal of the founder himſelf for the honour of God, or ſtir up the like affections in others. When the preparatory part was over, the church ſtuff was depoſited in the holy treaſury, and ſet apart for religious uſes. The temple itſelf was fenced with an enclo-ſure of three foot in height, [in Hebrew Giſon,] to keep out the laity from entering into a place where only the prieſts were to be admitted. Beyond this partition was another ſquare court or building, with large portico's or galleries about it, and four ſtately gates, that open'd eaſt, weſt, north, and ſouth; the doors all plated and inlaid with gold. This place was common to all people, provided they came thither with that purity of preparation and legal qualification which the law required.

THE erecting of this outward building was ſo ſtupendous an undertaking, that no tongue can expreſs the difficulties of raiſing it; and the man would have much ado to believe his own very eyes that ſaw it; ſuch hollows, ſuch depths to be fill'd up, as a body could hardly have look'd upon, or but ſo much as fancied, without turning his brain; † four hundred cubits to be brought up to a level with the top of the mountain, only to make the work regular, and the ground even. This port was encompaſs'd again with a kind of double cloiſter, and two rows of pillars to ſupport it, every pillar being cut whole out of the rock. The doors were all ſilver-work; the roof fret-work, and the wainſcotting all of cedar.

THIS admirable ſtructure was but ſeven years in hand, and it is hard to ſay, conſidering the magnitude, the curioſity, the expence, and the ornament on the one hand, and the diſpatch of it on the other, which was the more wonderful of the two; for it was effectually the buſineſs of many ages drawn into the compaſs of a very few years.

This wonderful ſtructure was but ſeven years a building.

THIS mighty undertaking being now brought to perfection, Solomon wrote to all the elders of Iſrael, and the heads of the tribes, to ſummon the people up to Jeruſalem to ſee the temple, and to aſſiſt in tranſporting thither the ark of the covenant. The reſolution was duly notified, and in the ſeventh month, which we call Thuri, and the Macedonians Hyperberetæus, with much ado they got together. In this month was the feaſt of tabernacles, which among the Hebrews was accounted the moſt ſacred and ſolemn of their feſtivals; ſo the prieſts took up the ark, and Moſes's tabernacle, with the holy veſſels belonging to the altar, and carried them all into the temple; the king, and the whole congregation, with the Levites, marching before them, with their ſacrifices and oblations, ſprinkling the ground, as they paſs'd, with their blood, and perfuming the air with the fragrancy of incenſe and ſweet odours, to ſuch a degree, that people were ſenſible of it at a diſtance, and reflected upon the delicacy of the breath they drew, as no leſs than a celeſtial influence; inferring from that agreeable alteration, that God himſelf had deſcended from Heaven to conſecrate the temple that was newly built, and dedicated to himſelf, and therein to take up his abode; for though the whole congregation came ſinging and dancing all the way to the temple, they went on freſh and cheerfully to their journey's end. This was the manner of their tranſporting the ark.

After the placing of the ark, a cloud deſcends, Ver. 15.

THE ark being now diſpos'd of into its proper place, with all decency and reverence, and the prieſts withdrawn, there deſcended a cloud, which ſo fill'd and darken'd the place, that they could hardly ſee one another through it; not like an heavy winter's cloud, big with foul weather, but only ſuch a temperate breathing diffuſion, as by the benignity and ſerenity of its appearance was look'd upon to be rather a token of God's ſpecial approbation and acceptance of the work they were upon, and of his coming down to dwell among them in that temple as in his own houſe, than the effect of any natural cauſe.

In token of God's approbation.

WHILE the people's heads were taken up with theſe thoughts, Solomon ſtood up, and with a grace and majeſty becoming the dignity of the ſubject and occaſion, addreſſed himſelf in a ſhort prayer to Almighty God in words to this effect: "Lord, ſays he, thou that inhabiteſt eternity, and haſt raiſed out of nothing the mighty fabrick of this univerſe; the heavens, the air, the earth, and the ſea; thou that filleſt the whole, and every thing that is in it, and art thyſelf unbounded and incomprehenſible, look down graciouſly upon thy ſervants that have preſumed to erect a temple here to the honour of thy great name. Lord, hear our prayers, and receive our ſacrifices; thou that art every where, vouchſafe alſo to be with us; thou that ſeeſt and heareſt all things, look down from thy throne in Heaven, and give ear to our ſupplications in this place; thou that never faileſt to aſſiſt thoſe that call upon thee night and day, and love and ſerve thee as they ought to do, have mercy upon us."

Solomon's prayer for a bleſſing upon the work, 2 Chron. vi. 14, &c.

UPON the finiſhing of this prayer, Solomon made a diſcourſe to the people upon the ſubject of God's power and providence; telling them what wonderful things had been revealed to his father David in dreams and viſions; ſome already paſt, and others as yet to come, concerning himſelf, his name, his ſucceſſion to the throne, his building of the temple, the eſtabliſhment of the family, and the well-being and proſperity of the nation. "Now, ſays Solomon, a great part of theſe predictions being already verified, you are to thank God, not only for the comforts you enjoy, but for the good things alſo that are further promiſed, and to look upon the former only as the earneſt of greater bleſſings."

Solomon's diſcourſe to the people, upon God's power and providence, Ver. 1--13.

AFTER the ſpeaking of theſe words, the king turn'd his eye again toward the temple, and with his hand advanced. "Lord, ſays he, what are the moſt glorious works of man, in balance even with the ſmalleſt of thy benefits and mercies? or what can we that have nothing to give, pretend to do for thee that wanteſt nothing, when the very leaſt of thy bounties are above and beyond all requital? We can only render thee praiſe, acknowledgment, and thankſgiving; and that indeed is a prerogative faculty that thou haſt vouchſafed to mankind above all other creatures; ſo that this I am not only allow'd, but obliged to do, in the name of myſelf, my family, and the whole people of Iſrael, for all thy multiplied favours and infinite goodneſs towards us. Now having no other way of expreſſing our duty and affections, than by the means of bare empty words, that are only ſo much air drawn in and breath'd out again, be pleaſed to accept of our humble gratitude in that human capacity; firſt, for thy gracious goodneſs to my father, in raiſing him from a ſhepherd's crook to an imperial ſcepter; and in the ſecond place, for making good to thy ſervant Solomon all thy promiſes and predictions in his favour. Lord, continue thy bounties to us, as to thy choſen people; preſerve, proſper, and perpetuate the government to our family, by a conſtant train of ſucceſſions from generation to generation, according to thy promiſes to my father, living and dying. Lord, grant us all this; and to all mine, the virtues and the graces that may make them acceptable in thy ſight. I do further moſt humbly beſeech thee, to let thy holy ſpirit deſcend upon this temple, in the bleſſing of thy peculiar preſence. Heaven and earth I know are too little for thy majeſty and glory; and much more the workmanſhip of mens hands, in a fabrick of wood and ſtone; and yet I cannot but preſume to implore thy providence and protection over it. Lord, preſerve it from the power and rage of enemies, and be pleaſed to take care of it, as of thy own property and poſſeſſion; and if at any time hereafter thou ſhalt be mov'd in thy juſt diſpleaſure to puniſh this people for their tranſgreſſions, with famine, peſtilence, or any other judgment whatſoever anſwerable to the degree of the wickedneſs, Lord, be pleaſed upon their humble ſupplications to thee in thine own houſe, with prayers and tears, for mercy and forgiveneſs, to accept of their true repentance, and to remove thy judgment. This I beſeech thee, not for the Hebrews alone, but for the relief indifferently of all people whatſoever, that ſhall offer up their petitions to thee in this thy holy place. By this means it will appear to the whole world, that this is thy houſe, and we thy people; and that the Hebrews are not ſo inhuman, as to envy ſtrangers the common diſpenſations of the author and fountain of all our happineſs."

WITH theſe words Solomon caſt himſelf upon the ground, and after a little pauſe in that act and poſture of adoration, he roſe and offered ſacrifices in abundance; having the ſatisfaction alſo of an aſſurance, by a token effectually from God, that his oblations were accepted; for there fell a flaſh of fire from above, that ſhot through the air directly down to the altar, and conſum'd the offerings. He implores the continuance of God's mercy and goodneſs, and his peculiar preſence in his holy temple, ibid.

WITH theſe words Solomon caſt himſelf upon the ground, and after a little pauſe in that act and poſture of adoration, he roſe and offered ſacrifices in abundance; having the ſatisfaction alſo of an aſſurance, by a token effectually from God, that his oblations were accepted; for there fell a flaſh of fire from above, that ſhot through the air directly down to the altar, and conſum'd the offerings. This prodigy being ſeen by the whole multitude, they they all look'd upon it as a certain ſign of God's owning both the worſhip and the temple, which put them into ſuch an extaſy of joy, that they all fell down together, and unanimouſly join'd in the adoration. Solomon continued his praiſes and thankſgivings, perſuading and encouraging the multitude to do the like, in the contemplation of ſo clear an evidence of God's ſpecial favour toward them. The king charged the people to be inſtant with God in prayer, for the continuance of his goodneſs and graces to them, that they might live in holineſs and righteouſneſs, without any ſpot or blemiſh, and walk in the ſteps, and according to the divine traditions of Moſes, to their lives end: this being the ſure and the only way to render the Hebrews the happieſt people of all mortals. He minded them alſo, that their felicity was no way to be ſecured and augmented, but by the means by which it was acquir'd, as being not only the effect, but the reward of piety and juſtice. He told them further, that it was much eaſier to get what they wanted, than to keep what they had got, and bad them have a care, not to forfeit by any miſdemeanor what they had gain'd by their virtue.

Solomon diſmiſſes the aſſembly, 2 Chron. vii. 10.

THE king made an end of ſpeaking here, and diſcharg'd the aſſembly, having firſt offered up in ſacrifices for himſelf and his people, twelve thouſand calves, and a hundred and twenty thouſand lambs. This was the firſt blood that was ſpilt in the temple; and the Iſraelites, with their wives and children, were all feaſted at it. There was celebrated at the ſame time before the temple, beſide this ſolemnity, the feaſt of tabernacles, which laſted fourteen days at the king's expence, with great jollity, magnificence, and ſplendor.

The feaſt of tabernacles, and the dedication of the temple happen'd together, 1 Kings viii. 65.

THE noiſe and pomp of things was now over, and all imaginable right done to the honour and piety of the occaſion; ſo that every man was now returning to his own habitation, but not without infinite acknowledgments of the king's wiſdom, care, and bounty in all reſpects, and prayers for the long life of Solomon, and the long continuance of the people under the bleſſing of his government. They went back, in fine, ſinging, rejoicing, and giving glory to God, with all things ſo much to their hearts content, that betwixt joy and good company, the time paſs'd away cheerfully and eaſily, without any ſenſe of tediouſneſs or trouble in the journey.

The ceremony being now over, the people returned to their own homes, V. 66.

THE ark being now brought into, and depoſited in the temple, the beauty and magnificence of that glorious ſtructure, with all due ceremony and ſolemnity expoſed, the congregation diſperſed, and returned home again. God appeared now a ſecond time to Solomon in his ſleep, and a voice told him, "That "God had accepted his ſacrifices, and heard "his prayers; that he would preſerve his tem"ple, and make it the houſe of his dwelling; "that is to ſay, ſo long as he himſelf, and "his poſterity and people ſhould continue to "walk before him, as David his father did, "in pureneſs of heart; promiſing him, upon "that condition, to advance him to the high"eſt degree of earthly bliſs; to perpetuate the "throne of Iſrael to his family; ſo that there

To which queſtion, their "own guilty conſciences ſhall make this an"ſwer: we have forſaken our God, we have "abandon'd the religion of our forefathers, "and of our country; and all this is juſtly "befallen us for our ſins." This was the ſubſtance of Solomon's dream, or viſion, as we find it tranſmitted to us in holy writ.

Solomon erects a royal palace, which was thirteen years a finiſhing, 1 Kings vii.

AFTER the finiſhing of this temple; which, as we have ſaid already, was ſeven years in hand, Solomon enter'd upon the building of a royal palace for himſelf, which was full thirteen years more a perfecting. He was not ſo ſolicitous and intent upon the latter, as the former, which in truth was great and artificial to a miracle; and without God's peculiar bleſſing and aſſiſtance, could not have been completed in that compaſs of years. Solomon's court indeed was in appearance much inferior to the majeſty of his temple, not only for want of time to provide his materials, but the one was deſigned only for the honour and convenience of a temporal prince, and the other dedicated to the king of kings; ſo that the work was the longer a doing. It was, however, ſufficient to anſwer the end it was deſign'd for, being a work that redounded much to the glory both of prince and people. But it will be worth the while to ſay ſomewhat more particularly of the model and diſpoſition of this majeſtical fabrick, for the reader's better underſtanding of the whole, as well as for his curioſity and ſatisfaction.

The deſcription of the royal palace, with the offices and apartments, ibid.

THERE was erected, upon ſeveral rows of pillars, a fair ſpacious pile of building, in the nature and after the manner of a common hall for the hearing of cauſes. It was a * hundred cubits in length, † fifty in breadth, and ‡ thirty in depth; nor could it well be leſs, to receive the vaſt multitudes that came thronging thither from all parts for juſtice. It was ſupported by ſixteen ſquare columns, cover'd with Corinthian work, in cedar, and fortified with double doors curiouſly wrought, that

* An hundred cubits amounted to upwards of an hundred and eighty two feet; that is, ſixty yards and two feet.
† Fifty cubits amounted to upwards of ninety one feet; that is, to thirty yards and one foot.
‡ Thirty cubits amounted to upwards of fifty four feet; that is, eighteen yards.

ſerved both for the ſecurity and the ornament of the place. In the middle of this court, or hall, was another edifice of thirty cubits ſquare, and under-ſet with ſtrong pillars, in which quarter was a throne of ſtate, where the king himſelf uſed to ſit perſonally in judgment. Next adjoining to this royal court of juſtice, was the queen's houſe, and other apartments thereabouts, for diverſion and retreat, after the fatigue of cares and buſineſs, all fitted up with cedar, and raiſed upon huge ſtones of * ten cubits ſquare, which were partly plain, and in part overlaid with the moſt precious marble, after the faſhion of the moſt magnificent of palaces or temples. The rooms were hung with three depths of rich hangings, and beautified with images, in ſculpture of trees, plants, branches, leaves, &c. and all ſo miraculouſly wrought, that they appear'd to the eye to be all in motion. As to the remainder of the ſpace up to the cieling, it was all ſet out with delicate parti-colour'd figures, upon a ground of white; and then beſide all theſe, there was a great variety of other chambers too, for retirement or delight; long and large galleries; vaſt rooms of ſtate, and others for feaſting and entertainment, ſet out as rich as rich could be, with coſtly furniture and gildings; beſide, that all the ſervices for the king's table were of pure gold. But it would be an endleſs work to give a particular ſurvey of this mighty maſs of buildings; ſo many courts and other contrivances; ſuch an infinite diverſity of chambers and offices, great and ſmall; ſome under ground, others above, as vaults, turrets, and the like. In a word, the whole houſe was in a manner made up from top to bottom of white marble, cedar, gold, and ſilver, with precious ſtones here and there intermingled upon the walls, or cielings, after the manner of the adorning of the temple.

Solomon's throne, 1 Kings vii.

There was alſo erected a very fair, large, ivory throne, with delicate carved work and engraving upon it, after the faſhion of a tribunal. There were ſix ſteps that led up to it; the figure of a lion at each end of every ſtep, and two lions more above; that is to ſay, one on either hand of the ſtate. As the king reſted upon his throne, there were arms put forth, as in a readineſs to take care of him, and to receive him; and the figure of a bullock placed in a proper poſture under him for his ſupport; the whole piece being cover'd all over with gold.

2 Chron. viii. 1.

THESE two magnificent ſtructures were twenty years a finiſhing; and it was a huge maſs of gold, and a greater of ſilver, beſide a mighty proviſion of cedar and fir, that Hiram the king of Tyre contributed to the perfecting of the work; and Solomon was not behind hand with him neither in his acknowledgments and preſents; for he ſent him every year great quantities of corn, wine, and oil, as a ſupply that Hiram, being an iſlander, ſtood moſt in need of, as has been obſerv'd heretofore. He beſtow'd upon him, moreover, twenty cities upon the borders of Galilee, not far from Tyre, which upon view and conſideration (not being much to his liking) he fairly declin'd the acceptance of, with a reſpectful excuſe to Solomon, that he had no need of thoſe cities. From this refuſal, that part of the country was called † Chabalon, which with the Phœnicians is as much as to ſay, It does not pleaſe me.

Many good offices betwixt Solomon and Hiram.

HIRAM had ſo great a veneration for the wiſdom of Solomon, that whenever he found himſelf at a nonplus for the underſtanding of any difficulty, or myſterious queſtion, he applied himſelf to this wiſe prince for the ſolution of it, who never fail'd of anſwering him to his ſatisfaction, according to the true reaſon and nature of the matter in hand. The hiſtorian Menander, that turn'd the Tyrian annals out of the Phœnician tongue into Greek, makes mention of theſe two princes as follows: "Hiram, ſays he, the ſon of Abibale, ſucceeded his father in the kingdom of Tyre. He liv'd three and fifty years, and reigned four and thirty. He annex'd a piece of forced ground, called the great field, to the iſland, and dedicated a golden pillar to Jupiter in his temple. He cut down materials alſo in abundance upon Mount Libanus, for the covering of holy places; and pulling down ancient temples, he built new ones to Hercules and Aſtarte. He erected a ſtatue for Hercules in the month of Peritius; and then in an expedition againſt the Eyceans, for not paying the duty of a tribute, as they ought to have done, he overcame them, and returned home again. In his days there was one Abdemonus, a young man that took upon him to give Solomon, the king of Jeruſalem, a reſolution upon all dark and myſterious queſtions that ſhould be put to him."

Hiram applies himſelf to Solomon for the ſolution of all difficult caſes.

Menander makes mention of theſe two princes.

And Dius ſpeaks of Hiram too.

Dius writes alſo to this effect: "Abibale being now dead, Hiram his ſon ſucceeded him, who by filling up void places on the eaſt quarter of the town, enlarged the borders, and brought the temple of Olympian Jupiter, that before ſtood apart, and at a diſtance, into the compaſs of the city; enriching and adorning it with golden offerings to a very great value; after which, he order'd the cutting down of cedars upon Mount Libanus for the uſe of holy places." He tells farther, "That Solomon, the king of Jeruſalem, often ſent problems and riddles to Hiram, upon the forfeiture of a great ſum of money, if he failed of expounding them. Thoſe difficult caſes were afterward not only unriddled by Abdemonus a Tyrian, but new propoſitions ſtarted by him, which Solomon himſelf not being able to reſolve, was obliged to refund the greateſt part of the money." Thus far goes Dius.

Solomon repairs, fortifies, and enlarges the walls.

THE walls of Jeruſalem were not at this time in a condition either for the defence or reputation of ſo famous a city, ſo that Solomon repair'd and enlarg'd them, with the addition of ſuch towers and other fortifications, as he found requiſite for the ſecuring of the place. He built ſeveral cities alſo of conſiderable note, as Aſor, Magedon, and Gazara, in the land of the Philiſtines, which Pharaoh the king of Egypt had formerly taken by aſſault; and razing it to the ground, put every creature in it to the ſword, giving it afterward to his daughter upon the match with Solomon. This city the king rebuilt, for the ſtrength of its ſituation, and the uſe it might be of to the government, as well in war as peace. He built likewiſe, not far from thence, Betachora and Baleth, beside other places of pleasure, in respect of the temperature of the climate, the delicacy of the fruits, and the conveniencies of excellent air and water. He possess'd himself after this, of the entrance into the desart that lies toward Syria, where he built a very fair city, two days journey from the Upper Syria, one from Euphrates, and six from Babylon. Now the reason of erecting a city here at such a distance from the habitable parts of Syria was this; that it might serve for a watering place (there being several springs and fountains in it) to those that travell'd through that desart. This town being built, wall'd, and strongly fortified, was called Thadamora, which name it bears among the Syrians to this day. The Greeks call it Palmyra; and let this suffice for the history of Solomon thus far.

All the kings of Egypt, from Memphis, to the days of Solomon, were called Pharaohs.

Now in regard that I find many people inquisitive how it comes to pass, that the kings of Egypt, from Minæus the first founder of Memphis itself, which was long before our father Abraham, to the days of Solomon, being upward of thirteen hundred years, should be all called by the name of Pharoah; and from what original they took their denomination, I shall give this plain and short account of it for their satisfaction. Pharaoh, in the Egyptian language, signifies as much as king. My opinion is, that they were brought up by other names; and that upon coming to the exercise of a publick character, they exchang'd the distinction of the family for the common name of power. It was the same thing with the kings of Alexandria, who were educated by one name, and govern'd by another; being all call'd Ptolemies, from the first of their kings; and so it is with the Roman emperors too, who in case of such an elevation, drop their private and hereditary names, and are all called Cesars, with a respect to the character of a sovereign power. This was it, perhaps, that made Herodotus of Halicarnassus, in his account of the successors to Minæus the first king of Memphis, to reckon up three hundred thirty kings, referring to the number without mentioning their names, Pharaoh being one common name to them all. Now upon the coming of a woman afterwards to the government, he speaketh of her by the particular name of Nicaulis, the appellation of Pharoah being only proper to the other sex. Neither do I find in the whole history of our nation, that after Pharoah, the father-in-law of Solomon, there was ever any other king of Egypt known by that name. I am also well assured, that this Nicaulis was the queen of Egypt and Ethiopia, that came afterward to Solomon: but of this more hereafter. I have been the larger upon these particulars, to shew the harmony betwixt our memorials and those of the Egyptians.

Pharaoh, in the Egyptian tongue, signifies king, and so the name denotes office, as with the Ptolemies and Cesars.

There were some stubborn Canaanites that refus'd allegiance to the Israelites.

THERE was still a stubborn remainder of the Canaanites, betwixt Mount Libanus, and the city Amathe, who for some time disputed their allegiance to the kings of Israel, till Solomon at last made them his tributaries, upon condition of furnishing him yearly with such a certain number of slaves, as was agreed upon to be employ'd upon tilling the land and other sorts of drudgery; for the Hebrews were not upon any work that was coarse and servile, neither would it have been reasonable, when God had subdued so many nations to his power, for the conquerors to descend to do the business of their captives. As to the Israelites, their genius lay more toward arms, chariots, horses, exploits of war, and military exercises. The Canaanites in the mean time were held to their labour, and six hundred officers of the king's put over them, to appoint them their tasks, and keep them to their work.

Solomon at length makes them tributaries, upon condition of furnishing so many slaves, 2 Chron. viii. 7, 8.

THE king built a fleet of ships also in Ezon-Geber, an Egyptian bay upon the Red Sea. The port is now call'd Berenice, not far from the city of Elan, which in those days was reckon'd to be under the jurisdiction of the Hebrews. In the building, fitting, and rigging out of this navy, Solomon was highly obliged to king Hiram for his generous assistance; for he sent him as many expert pilots, and skilful mariners, as he had occasion for, that serv'd the king's officers for guides to the land of Ophir, since called India, or the Golden Land, where having got together * four hundred talents of gold, they returned with it to the king.

Solomon builds a fleet of ships. Hiram assists him to rigg them and man them, 1 Kings ix. 26, &c.

THE fame of Solomon's virtue and wisdom was so advantageously represented, upon this occasion, to Nicaulis the queen of Egypt and Ethiopia, that being a princess of extraordinary understanding herself, and a person every way accomplished, the very glory of the character gave her a longing impatience to hear and see the king himself; for, says she to herself, what signifies all this hearsay, without experimental proof? Illustrious rumours speak but the sense or affection of the reporter; and after all, their splendid pretensions fall short, perhaps, and come to nothing in the conclusion. When she had been debating the point for some time in her own thoughts, she came at last to a resolution, in contempt of all the risques and difficulties of a long and tedious journey, to make him an honourable visit, for the satisfaction even of her curiosity, as well as of her inclination and judgment; and to enjoy the fruit and comfort of that wisdom she had heard such wonders of. In this determination she set forward toward Jerusalem, with a train and equipage suitable to her royal dignity, taking along with her a number of camels, laden with gold; a great variety of rich perfumes, and precious stones. Upon her arrival the king receiv'd her with all possible honour, courtesy, and respect; and with so much ease and clearness solved all the difficulties she propos'd, that it put her into an amazement to find his excellencies, in truth and effect, so much beyond what she had heard of them in fame and report. She stood in great admiration at the majesty and curiosity of his palace, the order and disposition of the building, and at the king's incomparable prudence upon the main, through the whole contrivance and conduct; but she was mov'd at nothing more than at the master-piece of that fabrick call'd the Grove of Libanon; the magnificent, and the regular course of his entertainments; the discipline and œconomy of the family, and the doing every thing with so peculiar a grace. She was likewise infinitely pleased with the sight of the daily sacrifices, and to behold with what application, care, and veneration, the priests and Levites perform'd their part in the worship. The constant course and practice of this orderly reverence ran in her head day and night, and her heart was so set upon it, that the more she consider'd it, the more she found it to be still her wonder and delight; nor did she make any difficulty of owning as much to the king himself.

" are forced to suspend our assent for want of " knowing what to believe, especially where

" ness; that is to say, the internal advantages " of the mind in a superlative degree of know" ledge and understanding, and the glory of " your outward state, the rumour has been so " far from partial, that it falls short even of " a common justice; for though common fame
" said as much to your honour as could be put " in words, I have yet the happiness at this " present time to see much more than I heard.
" Blessed are the Hebrews; blessed the friends " and people of Solomon, that stand ever be" fore him, and hear his wisdom; and blessed
" be God for his goodness to this land and " nation, in placing them under the govern" ment of so excellent a prince."

HAVING proceeded thus far, this generous princess did not stop here at words and professions, but, as a farther instance of the high respect she had for the king, she made him a present of twenty talents * of gold, aromatical spices, rich perfumes, and precious stones, to a prodigious value. They speak also of a root of balsam that she brought with her, which (according to a tradition we have) was the first plant of the kind that ever came into Judea, where it hath propagated so wonderfully ever since. Neither was Solomon wanting, on the other hand, in a suitable return of whatever he thought might be to the queen's liking and satisfaction; for he denied her nothing, and was much readier to give, than she to ask, even to the preventing of her askings. After this reciprocal interchange of presents given and taken, the queen went back again into her own country.

Soon after this interview, the queen returns, Ver. 13.

The arrival of Solomon's return-ships from Ophir.

ABOUT this time Solomon's fleet returned from Ophir, (otherwise called the land of gold) with stones for jewels, and pine-wood in abundance; the latter was made use of partly for pillars and supporters to the king's temple and palace, and partly for musical instruments, as harps, cymbals, psalteries, and the like, for the Levites to glorify God upon in company with their voices. It is to be noted, that for size and beauty, Solomon had never seen any of this sort of wood comparable to it before. This was none of the wood that passes commonly upon the world for pine, in the way of trade, betwixt buyer and seller: this has somewhat of the grain of a fig-tree, only a little whiter, and more glossy. I thought it not amiss to advertise the reader of a common mistake, especially being a question that falls so naturally upon this occasion into Solomon's story.

THIS plate-fleet brought the king † six hundred sixty six talents of gold, over and above the merchants adventure, and what the governors and kings of Arabia sent him for presents. Of this gold he caused to be cast two hundred targets, weighing ‡ six hundred shekels of gold each; and these were all hung up in the great hall of the grove of Libanon. His drinking cups were all of beaten gold too, garnish'd with precious stones, and wrought with all the curiosity imaginable; and in short, the rest of his utensils were of the same metal. There was no trading with money in this case; for the king had his ships in the sea of Tarsus that merchandised with foreign nations; and in exchange for commodities of his own, brought him back gold and silver, great quantities of ivory, blacks, apes, &c. Going and coming, they reckon'd upon this expedition as a three years voyage.

The cargo of this plate-fleet, besides the merchants adventures and presents sent him, 2 Chron. ix. 13, 14.

His vast returns of gold and silver cost him nothing more than commodity for commodity.

THE reputation of Solomon's greatness and wisdom was by this time spread far and near, insomuch that several great kings, for their own satisfaction sake, were inflam'd with a longing desire to see him, and laid hold of all occasions, by their munificence, and other good offices, to shew the desire they had to serve him. They sent him gold and silver plate, purple robes, spices and perfumes of all sorts, horses, chariots, and mules for burden, such as for strength and beauty they thought might be most acceptable to the king; so that he had now an addition of four hundred chariots to what he had before; that is to say, a thousand chariots, and  twenty thousand horses, that for beauty and speed were beyond all others; and for the better grace of the spectacle, they had the flower of the youth to ride and manage them. They were all proper goodly persons, in  purple vests; their hair dishelved and flowing, to the great advantage of their motion, and such an intermixture of golden threads with their locks, that the sun playing upon them, irradiated their heads with a kind of glory. This was the guard, which with their arms and quivers, attended the king's chariot (himself mounted in it, cloathed in white) to a house of pleasure he had at Ethan, not far from the city, which for the delicate gardens, walks, and fountains, and the fruitfulness of the place, he took great delight in.

Divers great princes present him with gold, silver, purple robes, spices, horses, chariots, &c. Ver. 23, 24.

not to fall under his care. He provided for the very paving of the highways that led to his palace at Jerusalem, partly for the convenience of comers and goers, and partly for the honour of his own magnificence. He kept not many chariots about his person, but quarter'd them here and there by certain numbers in the adjacent towns; and these places were called his chariot-towns. Silver was as plentiful in Jerusalem as stones; and cedars, which had never been seen in Judea before, were now as common as mulberry-trees. He gave commission also to his Egyptian merchants to buy him a provision of chariots with two horses, at the price of six hundred silver drachmas * a-piece; and these were to be sent away to the kings of Syria, and beyond Euphrates.

1 Kings x. 27.

Never a more glorious, wise, and powerful prince.

Now as it is beyond dispute, that this king was hitherto the most glorious, pious, the most incomparably wise, and powerful prince that ever sat upon that throne; so is it no less certain, that he made the latter part of his life a scandal to the former, by departing from the precepts of Moses, and the laws and religion of his forefathers, and blasting so hopeful a beginning with so foul an end. The raging impotency of his lust after women, transported him beyond all bounds, and the women of his own country would not serve his turn neither; for he took indifferently women of all nations, Sidonians, Tyrians, Ammonites, Idumeans, &c. quite contrary to the institution of Moses, which forbid the Hebrews any intercourse of marriage with strangers, wisely foreseeing that strange women would inveigle men over to strange gods too. And this was the true reason of the precaution against such marriages; for the violation of one law is but a step toward the breaking of another; and the taking of a prohibited wife does naturally lead to the embracing of a prohibited religion. But Solomon's sensual appetite was deaf to all counsels of sobriety and reason. He had no fewer than seven hundred wives that were princesses, (the daughter of the king of Egypt for one,) and three hundred concubines; and the passion he had for the charms of their conversation carried him into compliances with them in the impiety of their practices and opinions, as the most effectual earnest he could give them of his unchangeable tenderness and affection. * As he grew more advanc'd in years, he felt the decay of age in his mind, as well as in his body, and still as he became more and more careless and remiss in the exercise of the true worship, he was the more easily prevail'd upon to join with these strange women in a false one; not that this was the first breach of the law that he was guilty of; for he had transgress'd the rule, in the very figures of his bulls under his brazen sea, and in the lions afterward that were set as a guard upon his throne; which was all directly against a positive institution. He had at the same time in his own family the most glorious president for honour and virtue, that was any where to be found, in the example of his blessed father, whose piety and practice was so expressly recommended to his imitation, that God inculcated the charge over and over to him in his sleep; and upon the pain of his uttermost displeasure, to be sure to tread in his father's steps. This he neglected to do, and came, in the conclusion, to an ignominious end.

The latter part of his life blasted the former, 1 Kings xi. 1--13.

His lust made him mad upon women, ibid.

Strange women brought him to strange practices and opinions, ib.

As he grew careless of the true religion, he was more apt to embrace a false one, ibid.

His bulls under the brazen sea, was a breach also of the law.

THE word of the Lord came after this to Solomon, by the mouth of a prophet, telling him, "That his wickedness was no secret, "and he should not pass long unpunish'd; but "in regard of a promise from Heaven, to his "father, that he should have no other suc- "cessor, the prophet told him that his govern- "ment should not be taken from him while "he was living; and that after his death, his "son should suffer for the iniquities of his fa- "ther; not that there should be an universal "defection, but that ten tribes only should "revolt, and the other two continue in their "allegiance to the son of Solomon for his "grandfather's sake, and for the sake of the "temple at Jerusalem, which God had made "choice of for the place of his habitation." These words wounded Solomon to the very soul, to see himself cast down in a moment from the highest pitch of all sublunary comforts and temporal glory, into the very depth of the contrary extreme.

God foretold Solomon by the mouth of a prophet, that after his death his son should be punish'd for the father's sake, by a revolt of ten tribes, ib.

SOME short time after this denouncing message by the prophet, God stirred up a bitter enemy against Solomon, whose name was Adad, an Idumean by birth, and a branch of the royal family; the ground of his animosity being as follows: When the Hebrews over-ran the country of Idumea, under the command of Joab, who at that time was David's general; Joab having subdued the people, put to the sword all the males he could find in the province that were able to bear arms, and this execution continued for six months. This same Adad, who in those days was but a child, made his escape to Pharaoh, the king of Egypt, who not only received him with great humanity, but very generously gave him houses, lands, and revenues for his entertainment, and took such an affection further for him, upon his growing up into the world, that he married him to his own wife's sister, whose name was Taphines, who bore him a son that was train'd up with the children of Pharaoh. In process of time news was brought into Egypt, that David and Joab were both dead; and Adad upon these tidings desir'd Pharaoh's leave to return into his own country. The king, not well pleased with his request, ask'd him what he wanted, or what he meant by that earnestness to leave the best friend he had in the world? for he press'd it over and over, but could not as yet prevail.

Adad a spiteful enemy to Solomon, Ver. 14.

When Joab over-ran Idumea, he put all the males to death that were able to bear arms, Ver. 16.

Adad, then a child, fled to Pharaoh, who protected him, and married him to Taphines, Ver. 18, 19.

Upon David's and Joab's death, Adad desir'd leave to go back, Ver. 21.

SOLOMON being now in a declining condition, and the measure of his iniquity well high full and ripe for judgment, God put it into Pharaoh's heart, whom he had hitherto restrain'd, to let Adad return; so that he came forthwith into Idumea, with a design to stir up the people to a rebellion against Solomon. But finding the garrisons so strong, and the country in such a posture, that there was no possibility of success by a surprize, he took new measures, and went from thence into Syria, where he join'd interests with one Rezon, a fugitive from his master Adadazer, the king of Zobah, and a famous captain of a body of banditti, that made spoil and ravage up and down at pleaſure. Adad ſtruck a league with this man; and with his aſſiſtance maſter'd that part of Syria, where he got himſelf to be declared king, and made ſo many inroads upon the land of the Iſraelites, that all things were in a confuſion with blood and pillage, even while Solomon himſelf was yet living.

NOR were theſe affronts and indignities from a ſtranger all that the king ſuffered; for a more dangerous conſpiracy was form'd againſt him at the ſame time, in his own kingdom, by Jeroboam, the ſon of Nebat; a man of a turbulent and ambitious ſpirit, and one who was poſſeſs'd with a notion that he had long ſince receiv'd from an old prophecy, of a ſtrange part that he was to play in the overturning of the government. Jeroboam being left by his father very young, and under the tuition of his mother, Solomon took notice of him as he grew up towards man's eſtate, for a youth of promiſing parts, and made him overſeer of his works, being at that time repairing and rebuilding the walls of Jeruſalem. He acquitted himſelf ſo well in that commiſſion, that Solomon gave him the military command of the tribe of Joſeph, as a conſideration for his induſtry and ſervice. As he was one day travelling out of Jeruſalem about his buſineſs, the prophet Ahijah, the Shilonite, met him upon the way; and after the formality of a ſalute, took him aſide, out of all ſight and hearing, and there laid hold of the garment he had on, and rent it into twelve pieces, bidding him take ten of them to himſelf; for it was God's will and order that it ſhould be ſo; "For he reſolved, ſaid the prophet, "to tear the government from Solomon; and "for his promiſe ſake, to give the two con- "tiguous tribes to the ſon of Solomon, and "the other ten to you, as a juſt puniſhment "for giving up himſelf to ſtrange women, and "to ſtrange gods; wherefore ſince you ſee "the ground of his rejection, let Solomon's "miſerable caſe be a warning to you, not to "do the ſame things yourſelf that ruin'd him. "Be juſt to all men; obſerve and protect the "laws; imitate David's virtues of piety and "religion, and you may promiſe yourſelf the "comfort and enjoyment of David's re- "ward."

Solomon finding Jeroboam a promiſing youth, prefers him, Ver. 28.

The prophet Ahijah's diſcourſe to him about the diviſion of the kingdom, and his reigning over ten tribes, Ver. 29--39.

JEROBOAM was not a little elevated with theſe words of the prophet; and being naturally of a very haughty and aſpiring ſpirit, every little thing that gratify'd his ambition made him reſtleſs and unquiet. The prophetical prediction would not out of his head, and the firſt thing he did, after he came to the army, was to tamper with the people againſt their ſovereign, and to ſet up for himſelf. But Solomon all this while was no ſtranger to the malice and practice of his deſigns; and there was a train laid to ſurprize him, and diſpatch him; but the plot was diſcover'd, and Jeroboam eſcaped to Shiſhak, the king of Egypt, where he waited the death of Solomon, for a fair opportunity to revive his pretenſion.

The death of Solomon. Rehoboam diſcontents the people. Ten tribes fall off, and declare for Jeroboam, who ſeduces them to Idolatry. He officiates as high-prieſt. The prophet Jadon reproves him. Jeroboam and Rehoboam do both forſake God.

SOLOMON, in fine, liv'd to a great age. He * reign'd eighty years, died at ninety four, and was buried at Jeruſalem; the wiſeſt and the richeſt prince that ever was heard of; and in all other reſpects the happieſt, ſaving only the ſin of his ungovernable paſſion for women, and of thoſe dotages that he was led into, in his declining ſtate, by their arts; of which miſdemeanors, and the miſchiefs that afterwards accrued to the Hebrews, I ſhall ſay more hereafter.

Solomon's reign, life, death, and burial, Ver. 42, 43.

SOLOMON being now dead, and Rehoboam his ſon (by Naama an Ammonitiſh woman) ſucceeding in courſe to the throne, ſome of the grandees ſent immediately into Egypt, to inform Jeroboam how matters ſtood, and to recal him. He came preſently, upon notice, to Sichem; and Rehoboam came thither alſo, propoſing to himſelf the calling of an aſſembly, and ſo to enter upon the government by the common declaration and conſent of the people. Upon this occaſion divers of the princes and leading men, together with Jeroboam himſelf, went to Rehoboam, and made him a diſcourſe, by the way of advice and reſpect, how his father had laid too heavy burthens upon his ſubjects, and that they were in hopes they ſhould find him eaſier; for it was his own intereſt and ſecurity ſo to be, and rather to make himſelf belov'd than fear'd. They recommended this humbly to his thought, and Rehoboam took three days time to conſider of it. The delay of his anſwer gave them ſome jealouſy what would be the reſult, eſpecially in a caſe (as they underſtood it) ſo eaſy, and ſo neceſſary to be reſolv'd immediately, and ſo well becoming the years and circumſtances of a young prince to appear courteous and obliging in. But they were not, however, quite out of hope yet, ſince he had not given them an abſolute and peremptory repulſe; but, till he had conſidered of it, only for a ſhort time ſuſpended his anſwer.

Some great men, with Jeroboam, adviſe Rehoboam not to bear ſo hard upon his people as his father did.

He takes three days time to conſider of it, Ver. 5.

WHILE this was a doing, Rehoboam adviſes with his father's friends and counſellors what anſwer to return them, who being both well affected to the publick, and well ſeen in the humour and diſpoſition of the common people, adviſed him by all means to treat them with courteſy and condeſcenſion; for he would gain much more upon them by a popular freedom, they told him, than by ſtanding ſtiff upon his points, in the formalities of majeſty and ſtate; there being no ſuch charm upon the hearts of the people, as graciouſneſs and humility in the prince. Nothing could have been ſaid more to the purpoſe in general, or more eſpecially to his purpoſe in particular, having a kingdom in his eye. But his under-

* The account Joſephus here gives us of Solomon's age and reign is moſt certainly falſe, as having the addition of forty years, not warranted by any authority of Scripture, which tells us that he came to the crown very young, and that he reigned in Jeruſalem over all Iſrael but forty years. See 1 Kings xi. 42. and 2 Chron. ix. 30.

standing was taken away by a judicial infatuation, to such a degree, that he rejected their counsel, call'd a cabal to him of his own humour and years, told them what had pass'd, and demanded their opinion upon the whole affair. They took the point into debate, and whether for want of experience and foresight, or that God had blinded them, they came all to this agreement upon the question. Rehoboam was to tell them, "That since they

If they thought themselves ill used "formerly, they must expect to have him use "greater severity towards them now; and "that if his father had chastised them with "whips, he himself was resolved to chastise "them with scorpions." The king was so delighted with the mistaken majesty and dignity of this proud affronting answer, that upon the third day, when the people were gather'd together in the greatest anxiety imaginable, betwixt hope and fear of the doom they were to receive, some fancying one thing, some another, the king appear'd, and passing over the opinion of his father's counsellors, gave the people for answer, the very syllables that the young men had put in his mouth, the providence of God having so order'd it, that the prophecy of the prophet Ahijah might be fulfilled. These words were so many blows to them, and no less terrible in the hearing, than the dreadful things they threaten'd would have been in the execution; insomuch, that they all cried out in a rage, as with one voice, "What

The people presently broke out into so outrageous an uproar, that they stoned Adoram to death, Ver. 18.

"have we to do with the house of David? "let him take to himself the temple that his "father built." And the uproar look'd like a prologue to a general revolt. The sedition was so outrageous, that Adoram, one of the king's officers in the treasury, being sent out to pacify them by laying the blame upon the intemperance of some hot-headed young men, the people ston'd him to death, without so much as hearing him. Rehoboam look'd upon the malice of this violence to be level'd at himself rather than against his officer; and he was much in the right; so that he presently mounted his chariot in a fright, and in a hurry posted away to Jerusalem, to get out of the reach of the mutineers. The tribes of Judah and Benjamin, all as one man, stuck to him, and proclaim'd him for their king; but all the rest of the people went over to Jeroboam, and from that day forward would have nothing to do with the house of David. Rehoboam had so great an indignation at the thought of this revolt, that he summon'd a full convention of the two tribes that stood firm to their allegiance, and drew out one hundred and eighty thousand soldiers upon the muster, proposing to himself, with this body of men, to reduce the other ten tribes to their duty by force. While he was preparing for this enterprize, he was admonished by a prophet from God not to engage himself in a civil war, especially where the desertion was in some measure the work of a divine direction.

The other tribes go over to Jeroboam, 1 Kings xii. 20.

Rehoboam musters an hundred and eighty thousand men out of the two tribes, 2 Chron. xi. 1.

God admonishes Rehoboam not to engage in a civil war, Ver. 2, 4.

We shall now in the first place give some account of the actions of Jeroboam, the king of the Israelites, and proceed from thence to the history of Rehoboam, and the two tribes, according to the order of the narration.

Jeroboam builds him two palaces, 1 Kings xii. 25.

Jeroboam built himself a palace at Sichem, which he made his place of residence; and for variety sake, he built another at Penuel. This was a little before the feast of tabernacles, which was the thing that put these thoughts into his head. "If, says he, I shall now suf-

Now for prevention sake, he bethought himself of this expedient: He caused to be made two golden calves, and indicting an assembly of the ten tribes under his command, he made a discourse to them to this purpose:

Jeroboam's plausible way of seducing the multi-tude.

"I NEED not tell you, my countrymen, "that God is every where, and not confin'd "to any certain place; but wherever we are, "he hears our prayers, and accepts our wor-"ship, in one place as well as in another; "and therefore I am not at all of opinion for "your going up to Jerusalem at this time, to "a people that hate you. 'Tis a long tedious "journey, and all this only for the sake of re-"ligion. He that built that temple was but "a man, as every one here is; and the golden "calves that I have provided for you, the "one in Bethel, the other in Dan, are conse-"crated as well as that temple, and brought "so much nearer you, on purpose for the "convenience of your worship, where you "may pay your duty to God in such manner "as best pleases him. As for priests and Le-"vites, I shall make such a provision for you, "that you shall have no want, either of the "tribe of Levi, or of the race of Aaron. "Let him that has a mind to enter into the "sacerdotal function, initiate himself into the "priesthood by the sacrifice of a calf and a "ram, according to the institution of Aaron, "who was the first of that order, and only so "qualified." This was Jeroboam's way of seducing the multitude into an Apostasy from the laws of their God, and of their country; and he himself, consequently, the capital cause and author of all those calamities that afterwards befel the Hebrews; as foreign wars, routs, captivity, and the like; of which hereafter in their due time and place.

Jeroboam sets up a worship at Bethel, Ver. 29, &c.

THE festival of the seventh month was now drawing on, and Jeroboam took up a resolution to worship the same way at Bethel that the two tribes did at Jerusalem. There was an altar erected before the golden calf: he himself personated the high-priest, and went up with his own priests after the manner of the temple-worship. But as he was preparing to put fire to the offering in the sight of all the people, there came a prophet from Jerusalem in that very point of time, whose name was Jadon. He was sent by God, and being advanc'd into the middle of the crowd, he address'd himself in the king's hearing to the altar, in words to this purpose: "Altar, al"tar,

He does the high-priest's part himself, 1 Kings xiii. 1.

Jadon's prophecy addreſs'd to the altar, foretelling the end of falſe prophets and ſeducers, 1 Kings xiii. 2.

" tar, ſays he, thus ſaith the Lord, there ſhall " ariſe one out of the houſe of Judah, whoſe " name ſhall be Joſiah; who upon thee ſhall " put to death the falſe prophets, ſeducers, " and impoſtors of thoſe times, and upon thee " ſhall burn their bones; and to the end that " no creature may doubt the truth of this " prediction, the authority of it ſhall be now " confirmed by a prodigy. The altar ſhall " fall to pieces, and the fat of the ſacrifices " upon it ſhall be ſpilt upon the ground."

Jadon's authority confirm'd by miracles, Ver. 5.

The king was ſo inflam'd upon theſe words of the prophet, that he lifted up his hand againſt him, and commanded aloud that ſome body ſhould lay hold of him; but his arm was immediately ſo benumb'd and blaſted, that it was like a dead limb, and he could not draw it back again. The altar fell to pieces, as was preſag'd, and the fat of the ſacrifices was thrown upon the ground, as the prophet had foretold. The king, finding by what ſpirit the man ſpoke, and that he was no counterfeit, beſought him to pray to God on his behalf for the reſtoring of his wither'd arm; which being done, and the miracle wrought, Jeroboam thankfully acknowledg'd the benefit of the cure, and earneſtly preſs'd the prophet to ſtay dinner with him, who excuſed himſelf upon an injunction that God had laid upon him, not ſo much as to taſte either bread or wine in that city, nor to return the ſame way he came. This reſerve and ſobriety of the prophet made the king give more heed to what he ſaid, than otherwiſe he ſhould have done; ſo that he grew very uneaſy upon it in his forebodings concerning himſelf.

A falſe prophet that was Jeroboam's favourite, hearing what Jadon had done, and that he was return'd, follows him immediately to overtake him, Ver. 13, 14.

THERE was in that town a certain falſe prophet, that was much in Jeroboam's good graces; not for the truth, (for he was a downright impoſtor,) but for the uttering of ſuch prophecies as he knew were pleaſing to his maſter, and ſubſervient to his intereſt. This man was old and crazy; and as he lay at this inſtant dozing upon his bed, his ſons brought him news of a famous prophet that was come from Jeruſalem, and what wonders he had done; with the ſtory of Jeroboam's wither'd arm, and the recovery of it at the prophet's interceſſion to God for him, and how he was now gone back again, and which way he went. The fame of this ſtranger created ſuch a jealouſy in the old man's head, for fear leſt he ſhould be ſupplanted in his maſter's favour, that he preſently order'd his ſons to ſaddle his aſs, which was immediately done, and the man mounted, and poſted away with all imaginable expedition to ſeek after the ſtrange prophet. He follow'd him ſtep by ſtep, till he came up to him at length as he was reſting himſelf under the ſhadow of a large ſpreading oak. After the formality of the firſt ſalute, the falſe prophet fell to expoſtulating with the other, why he would not be ſo kind as to call at his houſe, and do him the honour to take a collation with him. The ſtranger told him it could not be; for God had poſitively forbidden him either to eat or drink in that city. Nay, ſays the other, I can abſolve you in this point myſelf; for I am a prophet as well as you, and we are both ſervants to the ſame God; and it is by that God's expreſs command that I am come hither now to invite you to dinner with me. Jadon gave credit to this falſe wretch, accepted of his invitation, and ſo went along with him. While they were yet at dinner, and in the freedom of table-diſcourſe, God appeared to Jadon, and told him that he would not only puniſh him for his diſobedience, but the very manner of his puniſhment; which was, that he ſhould be torn to pieces upon the way by a lion, and that his body ſhould not be buried in the ſepulchre of his forefathers. It fell out accordingly, and perhaps God order'd it ſo, for the hardening of Jeroboam's heart, into a diſbelief of Jadon, upon ſo remarkable a miſcarriage; for in his way back to Jeruſalem, a lion tore him off from his aſs, and kill'd him; the aſs untouch'd and ſtanding ſtill, the lion couching by the carcaſs, like a guard to both. The relation of this diſaſter being brought to the falſe prophet, by ſome travellers that paſs'd that way, he appointed his ſons to fetch the body into the city, which being done, he gave it a magnificent burial, charging his ſons, whenever he died, to ſee his own body laid in the ſame monument;

Jadon goes with him, and God foretels him that a lion ſhall meet him by the way, and tear him to pieces, which fell out accordingly, Ver. 20--24.

The falſe prophet ſends his ſons for the body, and gives it a magnificent burial, Ver. 29--31.

" For, ſaid he, whatever this good man has " ſpoken concerning the city, the altar, the " prieſts, and the falſe prophets, it is all true. " Now when I am dead, ſays he, and my " bones depoſited with his, I am ſafe; for " who ſhall know his bones from mine?"

The falſe prophet goes to Jeroboam, who tells him of the miracles Jadon had wrought.

So ſoon as Jadon's funeral rites were well over, and the ſons competently inſtructed, away goes their wicked father to Jeroboam; who finding him exceedingly diſturb'd, ask'd him what he meant to trouble his head at that rate, for the words of a mad man? Well but, ſays the king, what do you think of the prodigy of the altar, and the miraculous loſs and recovery of my arm? (telling him both the ſtories at length.) The man, ſays he, is certainly a man of God, and a true prophet, he could never do all this elſe. The other in the mean time did, in ſhort, all he could to diſguiſe the truth with plauſible gloſſes and diſtinctions. As to the buſineſs of your hand, ſays he, 'tis very probable you had overwrought yourſelf, with carrying ſacrifices to the altar. The very wearineſs made it numb at firſt, perhaps; but after a little reſt, you ſee, it came to itſelf again. And ſo for the altar, it was new built; and not being thoroughly ſettled, it ſunk under the weight of an inſupportable burden of ſacrifices that were laid upon it. And what was your holy man's end at laſt? Why he was kill'd by a lion; and here's not the leaſt ſign or token of a prophet all this while, that I can find, either in word, life, or death. The king was ſo poiſon'd and corrupted with the vanity and mockery of theſe looſe inſinuations, that from thence forward he had no longer any thought of God or goodneſs; but on the contrary, abandon'd himſelf wholly to the love, ſtudy, and practice of all manner of wickedneſs; and to ſuch a degree too, that he did effectually bid defiance to all that was ſacred, either in Heaven, or earth; making it his buſineſs to find out new ſins, and in the event to outdo himſelf. But I ſhall paſs now to Rehoboam, according to the order of the relation.

The impoſtor ſhuffles them off, and ridicules them.

Jeroboam ſo abandon'd, that he never thought of God after, Ver. 33.

REHOBOAM, being king all this while of the two tribes beforemention'd, built and fortified ſeveral ſtrong and fair cities, as Bethlehem, Etan, Tekoa, Bethzar, Shoco, Adullam, Ipa, Mareſha, Ziph, Adoraim, Lachiſh, Azekah, Zorah, Ajalon, and Hebron, all in the tribe of of Judah, beſide other towns, no leſs conſiderable, in the lot of Benjamin, which he provided with good garriſons and governors, and with corn, oil, and other neceſſaries in abundance, for their maintenance and defence; beſide many thouſands of ſhields and lances. While Rehoboam continued at Jeruſalem, there came up from all parts, great numbers of prieſts and Levites, and ſo many of the laity too, as made any conſcience of their ways, to worſhip there, quitting their countries to attend the duties of their religion. They were all ſick of Jeroboam's tyranny, and to ſee themſelves forc'd to the worſhipping of his calves, to the diſhonour of the true God. The diſcontent, in fine, was ſo great, that in three years time the power and intereſt of Rehoboam was mightily increas'd. This king's firſt wife was his kinſwoman, by whom he had three children, and he afterwards married Maacah, the daughter of Thamar, who was the daughter of Abſalom, by whom he had Abiah, and ſhe was a-kin to him too. He had ſeveral wives beſide, and children by them, but none ſo dear to him as Maacah. He had eighteen wives legitimate, and thirty concubines, by whom he had eight and twenty ſons, and ſixty daughters. But Abiah the ſon of Maacah was the perſon he deſign'd for his ſucceſſor, committing his treaſure and ſtrong holds all to his truſt. But it fell out to be with Rehoboam, as it fares commonly with other mortals; proſperity puffed him up, and in time ruin'd him; for the greater he grew in the world, the more liberty he took to be wicked; and he did not only contemn God and his holy commandments himſelf, but made his people as wicked too, out of a kind of reverence to his example. It is but according to the nature of human affairs, for ſubjects to be deprav'd by the exemplary ill manners of their ſuperiors; for the virtue, or the iniquity of the governor is, generally ſpeaking, ſome ſort of rule for the people to walk by; and it has the reputation of a kind of political virtue, to imitate the very vices of rulers. Not to do as they do, is tacitly to condemn their doings; as it happen'd under Rehoboam, where the people were wicked and licentious, for fear of diſpleaſing the king.

These cities he garriſons and ſupplies with all manner of proviſions, 2 Chron. xi. 11, 12.

CHAP. IV.

Shiſhak king of Egypt lays ſiege to Jeruſalem. King Rehoboam meanly gives it up, and the temple is pillaged. Rehoboam dies, and Abias his ſon ſucceeds him. Jeroboam is foretold by the prophet Achias, of the utter ruin of himſelf and his whole family.

GOD avenged himſelf upon Rehoboam by the hand of Shiſhak the king of Egypt, not by Seſoſtris, as Herodotus miſtakes the matter. This ſame Shiſhak, in the fifth year of Rehoboam's reign, marched againſt him with a vaſt army. They reckon'd twelve hundred chariots, ſixty thouſand horſe, and four hundred thouſand foot; the ſoldiers being moſt of them Africans and Ethiopians. With this army Shiſhak broke in upon the Hebrews, and took into his protection ſeveral of their ſtrong towns, that render'd on their own accord. In all which places he left garriſons, and marched afterwards directly up to Jeruſalem, where Rehoboam and his people were block'd up in the town. The king in this ſtreight betook himſelf to prayers and ſupplications for victory over his enemies, but could not prevail for an anſwer to his ſatisfaction; and thereupon Sameas the prophet told him, for his greater terror, that God threaten'd to forſake all thoſe that forſake him firſt; which frighted them all into an acknowledgment of their wickedneſs, and of God's juſt judgment upon them for their apoſtaſy and diſobedience. Being now brought to the uttermoſt extremity of deſpair, the prophet told the king once again, that God was pleaſed ſo far to accept of their humiliation and repentance, that they ſhould not be utterly deſtroy'd and cut off, but only deliver'd up in ſubjection and ſlavery to the Egyptians, that they may learn upon experience, whether it be better to ſerve God or man. In this panick dread Rehoboam deliver'd up Jeruſalem to Shiſhak, upon certain conditions, but without any regard to faith, or honour, he broke his articles, pillag'd the temple, took away all the plate and treaſure, as well God's as the king's; gold and ſilver to an ineſtimable value, without leaving ſo much as one grain behind him. He carried away the golden ſhields and bucklers that Solomon had cauſed to be made, with the golden quivers that David took from the king of Sophena, and dedicated to the adorning of the temple. After which Shiſhak went back again with a prodigious booty. * Herodotus of Halicarnaſſaus takes notice of this expedition, only miſtaking the name, where he ſpeaks of the king of Egypt's march thorough ſeveral other countries, and of ſubduing the Paleſtine-Syria without ſtriking a ſtroke. Now this can only be underſtood of the conqueſt of our country by the Egyptians; for he tells of ſeveral pillars erected and left there, with the images of men cut upon them, with the privy parts of women, as an emblamatical way of ſtigmatizing the men for giving up their country without a blow. Now this Rehoboam was undoubtedly our king that gave up all for the asking. He ſays likewiſe, that the Ethiopians took up the cuſtom of circumciſing from the Egyptians. Now it is agreed on all hands, that the Philiſtines, and the Paleſtine-Syrians had it from thence; and it is as clear, that there are no other people in Paleſtine-Syria circumciſed but ourſelves. But of this every man has the freedom of his own thought.

The king in his diſtreſs has recourſe to prayers for victory. The prophet tells him, as he had forſaken God, God would forſake him, Ver. 6.

Rehoboam delivers up Jeruſalem to Shiſhak, and Shiſhak breaks his articles, and carries away pillage to an ineſtimable value, Ver. 9.

Herodotus Halicarnaſſaus makes mention of this expedition.

AFTER the departure of Shiſhak into Egypt, Rehoboam repair'd the loſs of the golden ſhields and bucklers, with the ſame number of braſs, and committed the care of them to his proper officers and guards; and ſo he led his life in a private quiet way, without any conſiderable adventure, or undertaking, his fear being a continual check upon him, in regard of the continual feuds betwixt Jeroboam and himſelf. He liv'd ſeven and fifty years; ſeventeen of them in a ſtation of ſovereign power. He was a man, weak and arrogant, and loſt himſelf, his government, and his reputation, by refuſing wiſe counſel, when it was given him.

him. He was buried at Jeruſalem among the kings. His ſon * Abias ſucceeded him, in the eighteenth year of Jeroboam's reign over the ten tribes.

Jeroboam was a worker of iniquity, ſetting up altars in the high places, and making prieſts of the ſcum of the people, 1 Kings xiii. 33.

AND now we have ſpoken of the end of this king, it remains in the next place that we ſhew what became of Jeroboam. He was a worker of iniquity out of all bounds and meaſure. He was every day ſetting up and multiplying altars in the high places, and appointing prieſts to officiate out of the dregs of the people; which indignities and affronts, God, in his righteous judgment, avenged upon himſelf and his family. It happen'd at that time, that † Obimes, his ſon, fell ſick, and he bad his wife put herſelf into the diſguiſe of a private perſon, and go to ‡ Achias the prophet, being a man fill'd with the ſpirit of prediction, and the perſon who told him formerly, that he himſelf ſhould come to be king. "Go you, "ſays he, to this prophet, and ask him if the "boy ſhall recover or no." She dreſs'd herſelf according to her husband's order, and ſo went to Shilo, where Achias at that time liv'd. As ſhe was upon the way toward the houſe, a voice from Heaven ſpoke to the prophet, (who was now dim-ſighted with age,) and inform'd him that the wife of Jeroboam was then coming to him; told him likewiſe her buſineſs, what queſtions ſhe would ask him, and what he ſhould anſwer. Upon her coming to the door in the dreſs of an ordinary gueſt, the prophet call'd to her by the name of Jeroboam's wife. "Come in, ſays he, and never "diſguiſe yourſelf for the matter; for he that "told me who you are, and put the words in "my mouth that I am to ſay to you, is not "to be impos'd upon. Go therefore to your "husband from me, and tell him, that thus "ſaith the Lord God; As it was I that rais'd "thee out of a low condition to the dignity "of a throne; and cutting off the family of "David from the kingdom, gave it to thee; "ſo, on the other hand, in return for all "theſe bounties and benefits, thou haſt now "moſt ungratefully caſt off him that exalted "thee, and ſet up gods of thine own fancy, "and of the founders making, in preference "to the creator of Heaven and earth, and in "contempt of my majeſty and power; where-"fore I will now forthwith expunge thee "and thy family out of the roll of mankind, "give your carcaſſes to the dogs, and to the "fowls of the air, and ſet up another king "over my people that ſhall not leave one li-"ving man of the houſe of Jeroboam upon "the face of the earth; and the very multi-"tude ſhall not eſcape the ſtroke of divine "juſtice neither; for they ſhall be extermi-"nated out of the good land they were poſſeſ-"ſed of, and driven away, and diſperſed beyond "Euphrates, for being wicked after their "king's example, in adoring his gods, to the "contempt of me and my commandments. "Make haſte therefore to your husband, and "tell him as I have told you; and for what "concerns your child, you ſhall find it dead "when you come back; for the very moment "you enter the city he ſhall breath his laſt. "He ſhall be lamented, and buried with the "ſolemnity of a publick mourning, as the only "perſon of Jeroboam's family that had any "thing of good in him." The woman haſten'd away in a fright, upon what ſhe had heard; and miſerably bewailing the loſs of her ſon all the way ſhe paſs'd, went ſtraight to her husband; and the more haſte ſhe made, the ſooner the child died; for being come to her journey's end, ſhe found the child dead, as the prophet foretold her, and ſo gave her husband an account at length of the diſmal ſtory ſhe had in charge from the prophet.

The prophet foretels the diſmal calamities that are to befal Jeroboam and his people, and the death of the child, 1 Kings xii. 7--16.

Abias the king of Judah gets a victory over Jeroboam king of Iſrael. Abias dies, and leaves Aſa his ſucceſſor. The death of Jeroboam. Nadab his ſon ſucceeds him. Baaſha kills Nadab, and extirpates the whole race of Jeroboam.

Jeroboam draws out an army againſt Abias, 2 Chron. xiii. 3.

JEROBOAM, in defiance of all theſe judgments, made great levies ſtill, and marched out with an army againſt Abias the ſon of Rehoboam, who was then king of the two tribes in the right of his father; making little doubt of his ſucceſs againſt a prince of ſo little experience, either in government or arms. But Abias was ſo far from being terrified at this preparation, that beyond all expectation from a perſon of his years, he preſently drew together an army out of the two tribes, and advanced with it toward Jeroboam, in a certain place they called the || Mount Samaron; and there encamping himſelf, he made ready for a battle. He had in his army four hundred thouſand men, and Jeroboam double the number. As the two armies were both drawn up, and ready to engage, Abias advanced to a little eminence upon a riſing ground, and from thence held up his hand to obtain a ſilence and an attention to what he had to ſay; which was preſently allow'd him, and the ſum of his diſcourſe was this:

Abias advances with an army to Mount Samaron, and prepares for a battle, Ver. 3, 4.

Abias addreſſes himſelf in a ſpeech to the Hebrews, Ver. 4--12.

In this interim Jeroboam sends a detachment to fall upon the king's rear, Ver. 13. WHILE Abias was upon his harangue, Jeroboam privately sent a detachment to attack the king's rear, who came upon them so unexpectedly, that his people were not a little startled at the surprize, till he himself encouraged them, and bad them cast themselves upon God; for the cause, he told them, was his, who was not to be over-reach'd by stratagem or policy. These words of the king dissipated their fears, and inspired them with courage and resolution; whereupon, having first invok'd the assistance of God Almighty, the priests sounded the charge; at which, with a mighty shout, they attack'd the enemy, and push'd them so vigorously, that with the help of God, they put them to a total, absolute rout, and made such a slaughter, as cannot be parallel'd in any history, either Grecian or Barbarian. There were five hundred thousand men slain upon the place; a victory never to be forgotten: their strongest towns taken and plunder'd; Bethel, and Ithen, with their dependencies. After this blow, Jeroboam was so broken, that he was never able to make any farther attempt so long as Abias was living, who died not long after in the third year of his reign, and was buried at Jerusalem, in the sepulchre of his ancestors. He left two and twenty sons behind him, and sixteen daughters, which he had all by fourteen women. Asa his son succeeded him, whose mother's name was Maacha; and under his government the Israelites enjoy'd a ten years peace.

Abias dies, and his son Asa succeeds to the government, 2 Chron. xiv. 1.

THIS is all that we find written of Abias; and after him died Jeroboam, the king of the ten tribes, in the second year of the reign of Asa, and the two and twentieth of his own. His son Nadab succeeded him, and liv'd in a kind of competition for prophaneness and impiety, with the character of his father, and reigned only two years; in which time he led out an army against Gabathon, a city of the Philistines, being possess'd with an opinion that he might take it by a siege; but in the mean time he was cut off by the treachery of a familiar friend, whose name was Baasha, the son of Machel, who seiz'd upon the government, and destroy'd the whole family; which made good the words of the prophet, " That the " dogs should eat him of Jeroboam's stock
" that died in the city, and that the fowls of
" the air should eat him that died in the field."
This was the end of Jeroboam and his family; and the judgment was just upon them for their impious apostasy.

CHAP. VI.

Asa the king of Judea was an excellent person. He gave a very great overthrow to Zaræus the king of Ethiopia. The king of Damascus joins against Baasha the king of Israel, who is murder'd by Creon; and Elah, his son and successor, assassinated by Zimri.

ASA, the king of Jerusalem, was a man so conscientiously strict, both in his religion, and in his morals, that he led a life, in word, thought, and deed, in a most scrupulous conformity to the laws of God and nature. He rectified all that he found amiss in his government, purg'd his dominions from all extravagant lusts and foreign abominations. He had a select body of men armed with lances and shields, to the number of three hundred thousand of the tribe of Judah; and of the tribe of Benjamin he had two hundred and * fifty thousand with bows and bucklers. In the tenth year of his reign, † Zaræus, a king of Ethiopia, marched against him with an army of nine hundred thousand foot, one hundred thousand horse, and three hundred chariots. When he was advanc'd as far as Marcsa, a city in the dependency of Judah, Asa went out to meet him, and rang'd his army not far from the city, in a certain valley called Saphatha. Upon the sight of so prodigious a multitude of men, Asa called out to God for his assistance, and that he would vouchsafe to prosper his arms, and give him victory over so formidable an enemy; for it was wholly in a dependence upon his divine goodness that he had now undertaken this enterprize; concluding with an ejaculation, that he wholly resign'd himself to his blessed pleasure, whose power was more than sufficient to supply the want either of strength or number. Upon this prayer of Asa's, God was pleased to encourage him with a token and assurance of victory.

pursuit, he took and rifled Gerar itself, and likewise the enemy's camp, with a vast booty in gold, camels, flocks, and herds. Upon gaining this mighty victory, through the goodness of divine providence, the king returned with his army to Jerusalem, laden with the spoil. As they were upon the way, not far from the place, the prophet Azariah call'd to them to make a stand, and then told them as follows: "God hath been pleased, says he, "to bless you with this glorious victory, in "consideration of your justice, your piety, "and your obedience to his will and com- "mandments; and if you go on as you have "begun, you may expect the same providen- "tial advantages and successes in all your af- "fairs for the time to come. But if ever you "depart from the precepts of your religion, "you will find in all respects the clear con- "trary; and that the time will come, where- "in there shall not be a true prophet among "you, nor a priest answerable to the dignity "of his function. Your cities shall be laid "level with the ground; your nation scat- "ter'd like vagabonds over the earth, with- "out any seat or habitation that they can call "their own; wherefore, says he, let me ad- "vise you while you have time, to apply your- "selves to the study and practice of virtue; "and finally, to join with thanksgiving in the "acknowledgment and enjoyment of the bless- "sings of God's favour." These words of the prophet were a great rejoicing to the hearts, both of king and people, who thereupon made it their express business, publick and private, one and all, to keep their religion sacred and inviolate, in the observance of the laws; in order to which end, the king had his commissioners every where up and down through his dominions, to attend that care and duty.

A discourse upon the blessings of obedience, and the danger of faultering in matters of religion, ibid.

THIS was the posture of Asa's affairs, the king of the two tribes. I shall now return to Baasha, the king of the Israelites; who, when he had kill'd Nadab, the son of Jeroboam, seiz'd the kingdom to his own use. This prince reign'd four years, and his palace was in Tarshish; a man, that for all sorts of lewdness and impiety, went beyond either Jeroboam or his son; a tyrannical oppressor of his people, and of a stubborn and contumacious spirit toward God himself; insomuch, that the word of the Lord came to * Gimon the prophet, commanding him to tell Baasha, "That God "had fully determin'd to root out him and his "family from off the earth, as he had done "Jeroboam before him, for his ingratitude to "that power and goodness that raised him to "the throne, and for his tyranny and impiety "in the exercise of his government, without "any regard to righteousness or justice; two "virtues that are, above all others, the most "acceptable to God, and profitable to the "people; telling him farther, that since he "thought fit to make Jeroboam his example "for all manner of iniquity, it was but rea- "sonable to have him as exemplary in his mi- "sery and punishment." Baasha, after all these frightful denouncings, obstinately stood his ground, as if it had been a point of honour to affront his maker; and as if the prophet had rather promised him a reward for his wickedness, that threaten'd him with the stroke of so dreadful a vengeance; so that he went on still, heaping sins upon sins, and strove every day to be worse than other, without any care or thought how to avert the judgment, and reconcile himself to God; nay, without the least motion or disposition toward amendment or repentance. In the conclusion, he march'd with an army to Ramath, a place of some note, and a matter of some † forty furlongs from Jerusalem. He took it, and fortified it, with an intent to make it the seat of the war, as a commodious station for the advantage of making inroads into the dominions of Asa. Now Asa was not without some apprehension of the tendency of his design; and computing with himself how great a danger the neighbourhood of so powerful an army might bring upon his country, he sent ambassadors presently to the king of Damascus, with money and presents, inviting him over to his alliance, out of a respect to the former friendship that had been betwixt those two families. This king very willingly receiv'd the money and presents; broke off with Baasha, and enter'd into a league with Asa; sending an army some short time after, into the territory of Baasha; fell upon his towns and strong holds in that hurry; burning some, and rifling others, as Achion, Dan, and Abelmaen. Upon the news of this incursion, the king of the Israelites quitted Ramath, and went back to look to himself nearer home; but Asa erected two strong towns there out of the materials that Baasha left behind him; calling the one Gaba, and the other Maspha. This was the last of Baasha's military adventures; for he was cut off by Creon, and buried in the city of Arsanes, his son Elah succeeding him; he himself being afterwards treacherously slain by Zimri, the master of one division of his horse, in the second year of his reign, as he was drinking with Osa, the steward of his house; a troop of horse breaking in upon him, in the absence of his guards and officers, who were then abroad at the siege of Gabathon, a city of the Philistines.

and immediately goes away to Tirzah, and takes it by ſtorm. Zimri finding the city without a guard, withdraws himſelf into a private apartment in the palace; ſets fire to it, and burns himſelf and the houſe together: this was in the ſeventh day of his reign. All things were now in a confuſion, and the people immediately divided into two factions; the one was for Thaman, and the other for Omri; but the latter carried it; for Thaman was ſlain, and Omri had the whole government to himſelf. This was in the thirtieth year of the reign of Aſa; and Omri govern'd twelve years, ſix at Tirzah, and the reſt at Mareon, which the Greeks call Samaria. He gave it the name of Samareon, from Samar, the man's name that ſold the mountain whereupon it was built. He differ'd little from the former kings, but in the degree of being ſtill worſe; for they all made it their buſineſs to alienate the people's hearts from the love and ſervice of God, by the repeated practices of daily wickedneſs; wherefore God in his wrath made uſe of them ſucceſſively for the deſtruction of one another, till, in the end, the whole race was extinct. This prince died at Samaria, and Ahab his ſon reigned in his ſtead. In the courſe of this reſolution we are given to underſtand how the wiſdom and providence of God interpoſes in human affairs, in ſhowering down bleſſings upon the righteous, and in the utter extirpation of the wicked; for the kings of the Iſraelites were in a ſhort time cut off, with their whole families, by the hands of one another; only Aſa the king of Jeruſalem, and of the two tribes, liv'd happily, and in the favour of God, to a great age, in conſideration of his piety and juſtice; and after a reign of one and forty years, departed this life with comfort. A woman of an impetuous, enterprizing temper.

Jezabel has priests for her idol worship.

AHAB, the king of the Iſraelites, fix'd his reſidence at Samaria, where he ruled two and twenty years without any innovation in the government, ſaving only where he made things worſe than he found them. He was a faithful imitator of the worſt of his predeceſſors in the worſt of things, and moſt particularly of Jeroboam; not only in the worſhipping of his golden calves, but in the multiplying and ſuperadding of other heinous offences. He took to wife * Jezabel, the daughter of † Ithobal, then king of Tyre and Sidon, who drew him over to the idolatry of worſhipping her country gods. She was a woman of a raſh enterprizing temper; and of ſo impetuous and ungovernable a ſpirit, that ſhe had the confidence to erect a ‡ temple to Bel, the God of the Tyrians; to plant groves for ſuperſtition, of all ſorts of trees, and to appoint her prieſts and falſe prophets expreſly for that idolatrous ſervice. Now theſe were a ſort of people that the king was well enough pleas'd to have about him, being a man violently bent upon any daring or malicious wickedneſs, beyond all the kings his predeceſſors. There came to Ahab, about that time, a certain prophet, who was a Tiſhbite, and born in the city of Gilead. His meſſage was to tell the king, that from the time of his going away, there ſhould not be one drop of rain, or ſo much as the leaſt ſign of a dew in that province, till he came back again; confirming his prediction with a ſtrong aſſeveration that it ſhould be ſo. So ſoon as he had deliver'd his errand, he went away to the ſouthward, till he came to a torrent, where he might ſupply himſelf with water, and there he ſtopp'd for the preſent; the ravens, time after time, bringing him a ſupply of meat. The drought continuing and encreaſing, the channel was dried up; whereupon God warned the prophet to remove to || Sareptha, which is a town betwixt Tyre and Sidon; a voice from Heaven foretelling him, that he ſhould find a widow woman there that would feed and provide for him. He follow'd his order, and being come almoſt to the end of his journey, he eſpied a poor woman gathering of ſticks, not far from the port, which woman he underſtood by a divine impulſe, was to be his nurſe; ſo he called to her to give him a little water to drink; and as ſhe was going to fetch it, he ſpoke to her again to bring him a little bread too. The woman ſolemnly proteſted to him, that ſhe had nothing in the houſe, but one handful of meal, and a little oil, and that ſhe was now getting a few ſticks for a fire to bake a cake of it for herſelf and her ſon; and when that was eaten, they muſt even ſtarve; for ſhe had not one bit more in the world. "Well, ſays the prophet, "good woman, go thy ways with a good "heart, and hope for better things, and bring "me a piece of it when it is ready; for I do "aſſure thee, that when we have all eaten "our fill, thy barrel ſhall never be without "meal, nor thy cruiſe without oil, till God "ſhall ſend rain upon the earth." The woman did as the prophet bad her, and found his words to be true; for they had all three ſuſtinence ſufficient, and the proviſion was ſtill recruited again as it waſted, till this miſerable drought was over. Menander ſpeaks of it in the hiſtory of Ithobal, a king of the Tyrians. "In his time, ſays he, there was an extreme "drought for want of rain, that laſted from "the month of Hyperberetæus, till the ſame "month again next year. There were prayers "indeed put up for the averting of the judg"ment, which were follow'd with mighty "claps of thunder. This prince built Bo"trys in Phœnicia, and Auzates in Africa." This was undoubtedly the drought under Ahab; for it was in his reign that Ithobal was king of Tyre, as Menander has it in his commentaries.

AT, or about this time, the woman's ſon of the houſe fell deſperately ſick; and the mother, in a paſſionate extravagance of raging and exclaiming for the loſs of her boy, laid the blame upon the prophet. "This man, "ſays ſhe, that I have entertain'd, hath diſ"cover'd my ſins, and now brought this "judgment upon me." The child being abſolutely given over for dead, the prophet bad the woman comfort herſelf, and deliver up her ſon into his arms, with an aſſurance that he would ſuddenly reſtore him to her alive again. He took him up, and carried him into his chamber, laid him upon his bed, and offer'd up a prayer to God for him. "Lord, "says he, this will look like an ill requital to "my preſerver, to have her ſon taken from "her while I am in the family. Be pleaſed "in thy infinite goodneſs to reſtore this inno-"cent creature to life again." God was pleaſed upon the prophet's ſupplication, be-yond all thoughts or expectation, to reſtore the child to life again, that the poor woman might not have any misfortune to complain of while the prophet was in the family. The child, upon this prayer, was reviv'd, and the woman with great thankfulneſs to the prophet, found herſelf now fully convinc'd, ſhe ſaid, that he was authoriz'd and directed by the ſpi-rit of God.

The prophet raiſes a dead child, 1 Kings xvii. 22.

THE prophet, a while after this, by the commandment of God, was ſent to Ahab, to tell him that there ſhould ſuddenly be rain. The famine was now ſo pinching all over the country, and ſo general a ſcarcity of all ne-ceſſaries for life, that not only the people were ready to ſtarve for want of bread, but the very cattle alſo, and other animals upon the point of periſhing, for want of food and forage; ſo parching was the drought every where. In this diſtreſs the king ſent for Obadiah, the overſeer of his ſtables and grounds, to come to him, and to ſearch every where about the brooks and rivers for graſs for his horſes and herds; charging him by all means to get * Elias the prophet to him, whom they had been look-ing up and down for, but could not find him; ſo the king walk'd on, and bad his overſeer to follow him; and when they had gone a while together, the king ſtruck off into one way, and Obadiah into another. This Obadiah was a very good and holy man; and at the time when queen Jezabel was in the heat of her bloody perſecution againſt the prophet, he concealed and protected a hundred of them in caves, and fed them with bread and water. The king and Obadiah were no ſooner parted, but the latter met Elias upon the way; and finding who he was, by his anſwer to the queſ-tion, he did him reverence. The prophet, af-ter a while, deſired Obadiah to go to the king, and tell him that he was coming. "Why "what have I done, ſays Obadiah, to be ſent "of ſuch an errand, to a perſon that is at this "time looking after you to put you to death? "And there is no torment you are not to ex-"pect whenever he catches you. But what "now, when I go to the king, if the ſpirit "that governs you as it pleaſes, ſhould carry "you another way, and when you are not to "be found, my head lies at ſtake to anſwer "for you? Pray be not ſo indifferent in a caſe "where my life is in ſo much danger. You "may aſſure yourſelf, I do not want affection "for your party, that ran the riſque of pre-"ſerving a hundred of your prophets from the "rage of Jezabel, and to this day maintain "them in caves upon my own account." "Well, ſays the prophet, fear nothing; but "go to the king, upon my ſolemn oath, and "promiſe that I will come to him." So ſoon as Ahab underſtood that Elias was there, he mended his pace, and in haſte and indignation, advancing toward him, call'd out; "Are you, "ſays he, at this day the troubler of Iſrael? "Are you the occaſion of this drought and "famine?" Elias told him, with liberty and aſſurance, that it was Ahab himſelf, and his family, and their bringing in of foreign and falſe gods, and the ſuppreſſing of the true re-ligion, that was the cauſe of all their miſery. "Pray, ſays the prophet, will you give order "for all the people to meet in a congregation "upon Mount Carmel, and let your own and "your wife's prophets be there alſo, (expreſ-"ſing the very number of them.) Summon "likewiſe the prophets of your groves, who "are about four hundred, more or leſs." The king ſummoned them, and they met ac-cordingly; Elias ſtanding in the middle of the throng, and calling out to them after this manner: "How long, ſays he, will you ſtand "wavering betwixt two opinions. If you be-"lieve ours to be the true and the only God, "obey him, and keep his commandments; or "if you are rather of opinion for the worſhip-"ping of ſtrange gods, adhere to them only." The people making no anſwer to what he ſaid, Elias went on, and proceeded to this challenge. "If, ſays he, you have a mind to be certainly "aſſured which worſhip is the right, here do "I ſtand, a ſingle prophet on the one ſide, to "defend the cauſe againſt the four hundred on "the other. I will take an ox and lay it up-"on a pile of wood, without putting any fire "to it; let them do the ſame thing, and call "upon their gods to ſet their pile in a flame. "By this means you will be able to diſtinguiſh "the true from the falſe." The people were well enough pleaſed with the experiment pro-poſed, and Elias bad Ahab's prophets take an ox, as is ſaid before, and call upon their gods by their names, giving them the precedency of being the firſt to offer up the ſacrifice. When they had prayed, and call'd a good while, and without any effect, Elias turn'd their ſuperſtition to ridicule, and bad them cry out louder; for their gods might poſſibly be upon a journey, or aſleep, perhaps. At this rate they went on, with outcries and exclama-tions, from morning till noon, cutting and lan-cing their bodies, after the cuſtom of their way of worſhipping, and all to no manner of purpoſe. Now when it came to the other's turn to ſacrifice, and theſe phanatical prieſts were ordered to retire, Elias ſpoke to the multitude to draw nearer, and to view every where if they could find any fire that was ſe-cretly convey'd there. Upon their coming up, Elias took twelve ſtones to anſwer the number of the twelve tribes of Iſrael, and erected an altar out of them, cutting a deep ditch about it. The wood was fitted, and laid upon the altar; the ſacrifice upon the pile, and four veſſels of ſpring-water caſt upon the altar; ſo that it ran off, and fill'd the trenches. When every thing was ready, Elias call'd up-on God, and beſought him to ſhew his power now for the conviction of a miſtaken and un-believing people. While the words were yet between his lips, there fell a fire, as from Heaven, down upon the altar, that in the ſight of the people conſum'd the ſacrifice, and dried up all the water about the altar, and in the ditch. The Iſraelites, upon this prodigy, fell proſtrate upon the ground, and agreed in the adoration of one deity; confeſſing him to be the great and only true God; and for the reſt, they look'd upon them to be only the vain imaginations of weak men. The four hundred prophets were taken, and put to death by the command of Elias, who then bad the

When the king was gone, Elias went up to the top of Carmel, where he sat down upon the ground, and laying his head upon his knees, order'd his servant to get up to a rock toward the sea, and look about him, if he could see ever a cloud. He went up again and again, but still saw nothing; at last, after the seventh time, looking about him, he said he saw something blackish in the air, about the bigness of a man's foot. So soon as Elias heard that, he sent away immediately to Ahab, to make haste to the city; for he would be taken in a very great shower else; and by the time he was come to the city of Jezreel, the whole air was dark and overcast, and there fell immediately a very heavy rain. The prophet, in the mean time, by the special assistance of God, ran before Ahab's chariot, till he came to Jezreel.

Jezabel threatens Elias for the death of her prophets, 1 Kings xix. 2. Elias flies to Beersheba, Ver. 3.

When it came to the ear of Jezabel, the wife of Ahab, what wonders Elias had done, and how he had kill'd all her prophets, she sent him threatening messages, that his life should answer for theirs. Elias, upon these menaces, fled to Beersheba, which is in the farthest part of Judea, and bordering upon Idumea; in which place he left his servant, and so went away into the wilderness, where he laid himself down, as a man weary of life, and calling for death. "Lord, says he, I "am not better than those that are gone before "me; and I find no temptations left me to "the desire of longer life." So he laid himself down under a tree, and there fell asleep, till some body waken'd him, he knew not how, nor for what; and upon raising himself, he found meat and drink set before him, which he fed heartily upon, and in the strength of that refreshment he went forward to Mount Sinai, the place where, according to our tradition, God deliver'd the law to Moses. There was a large convenient cave there, which he enter'd into, with some thought of taking it up for his habitation. While he was there, the question was put to him, how he came to leave the city, and wander thus in the desart. He heard the voice distinctly, but whence it came he knew not. His answer was, that upon the killing of the false prophets, and preaching the doctrine to the people of only one God, and that God only to be worshipped, the queen for this crime threaten'd to have him put to death. He was commanded after this, by the same voice, to quit the cavern the next day, and receive his instructions how to govern himself for the future. The day following, he came out from his retreat; and immediately upon it, there was a great earthquake, and after the earthquake, the appearance in the air of a blazing fire, which fire was follow'd with a little pause of silence, and after that a still voice, bidding him fear nothing, for his enemies should not prevail against him; and so commanded him back again, by the way of Damascus, and there to anoint Hazael king of *Aram; and Jehu the son of Nimshi king over Israel; and to anoint Elisha also, of Abel, prophet in his room; for that God was resolved to root out all the wicked from the land, by the stroke of divine justice; and those that escaped the sword of Jehu, to fall by that of Hazael. Upon these words Elias presently returned according to his order, and found Elisha the son of Shaphat plowing, in company of others, with twelve yoke of oxen. He went to him, and casting his cloak over him, Elisha immediately began to prophesy, quitted his oxen, and presented himself to follow him; only desiring to take leave of his father and mother before he departed for good and all. This was granted him, and upon his return from his parents, he became thenceforward a disciple and companion to Elias; which shall suffice at present for the state of his affairs.

It happen'd that one Naboth of †Azar had a vineyard near the palace of Ahab, the king of Samaria, which lay contiguous to the king's grounds. Ahab had a mighty mind to take this parcel of land into his own gardens, and so was often soliciting Naboth to let him have it, either in exchange for some equivalent in another place, or otherwise for a sum of money. Naboth excused himself, that it being his inheritance, and in so particular a manner the gift of providence, he prefer'd it to any other the king could bestow upon him, and that he did not care to part with it, either for money or otherwise. This disappointment upon another man's estate, was as grievous to Ahab, as if he had lost his own; insomuch, that he fell sad and sick upon it; refusing to bathe as he was accustom'd to do, and forsaking his meat. Jezabel, upon this change, became very solicitous and inquisitive to know the true reason of so wonderful an alteration, that her husband should all on a sudden leave off bathing as he used to do, and forsake his meat; so that upon her importunity, he told her the story of Naboth, and how brutishly and saucily he had behav'd himself. "I gave "him, says Ahab, the most courteous words "in the world, and in truth treated him, even "below the majesty of a king; for which ci-"vility, in fine, all I got was, to be put off at "last with a flat denial." The queen, on the other side, bad him be of good cheer, and give himself no farther uneasiness upon that account; for she would undertake to effect the matter herself, and make Naboth severely suffer for the affront he was guilty of. Hereupon she wrote letters in Ahab's name to the elders and chief men of Jezreel, to this purpose: "That they should proclaim a fast, call an "assembly, and assign Naboth, upon account "of his extraction, a place there among the "principal men of the people; that they "should have three ‡ witnesses ready, who "would swear any thing, to give evidence "against him, for speaking blasphemy against "God and the king; upon which testimony "he should stand convict, and receive sentence "to be ston'd to death by the people." Every thing was done according to the queen's direction, and Naboth convict, sentenc'd, and ston'd to death. Jezabel instantly upon the news of this success, went to the king, and told him, that Naboth's work was now done, and that he might take possession of the vineyard when he pleased, without putting himself to the expence of paying for it. overjoy'd at what Jezabel told him, that the first thing he did was to take a journey to his new purchase: but God sent Elias to him in his wrath, to charge him with the murder of the true owner of that vineyard, and the iniquity of his usurping upon the possession. When Ahab saw the prophet coming toward him, he went to him with a voluntary confession in his mouth, and a tender of any satisfaction the prophet should require. This he did to prevent the other's taxing him with the fact. Elias told him, by the direction, and in the name of God, "That where the dogs "licked the blood of Naboth, they should "also lick the blood of Ahab and Jezabel; "and that his whole race should be rooted "out for this flagitious cruelty, in taking away "the life of an innocent man by calumny and "subornation." These words of the prophet brought Ahab to the sense of a true and sincere repentance. He mortified himself in sackcloth and fasting, going bare-foot, and giving all manifestation of a hearty sorrow for his sins; so that God sent the prophet once again to him with another message; and to let him know, that in regard of his penitence and humiliation, the judgment denounced should not be executed in his days, but in the days of his son it should all come to pass. Upon these words the prophet went his way.

CHAP. VIII.

Adad besieges Ahab in Samaria, and is beaten off. He is worsted again the next year, and flies to Ahab for mercy; who treats him kindly, and dismisses him, which the prophet reproves him for.

WHILE matters went thus with Ahab, Adad the king of Syria and Damascus levied a powerful army out of his whole kingdom; and being joined by two and thirty confederate kings beyond the Euphrates, he marched with this mighty force against Ahab, who did not think it reasonable, upon so vast an odds of number, to venture a battle in the plain field; but chose rather to draw his military men out of the open country into strong holds, and fortified towns, and to keep themselves upon the defensive. He himself made choice of Samaria for his capital, which he resolved to make good. The place was strong by situation, good walls, and good works about it, and a good garrison to defend it. The Syrian brought his army before it, and began in form to make his attacks, sending a herald to Ahab at the same time, for licence to dispatch ambassadors to him, with instructions to propose what he should demand. This was granted, and the ambassadors sent, and received; having a commission, as they said, to tell him, that his treasure, his wives, and his children, were all at Adad's mercy; and that if he would acknowledge as much, and permit the other to take what he thought fit out of them, he would instantly quit the siege, and withdraw his army. Ahab sent the ambassadors back with this answer; that he himself, and all he had was at their master's service. The Syrian, after this demand and return, sent yet another embassy; which was, that upon sending his officers and servants to him next morning, they should have free liberty to search all his own lodgings, with the houses and apartments of all his relations and domesticks, and to take away with them whatever they should think worth the while; and for the remainder, Ahab might keep it to himself.

Adad sends a second embassy, Ver. 5, 6.

THIS message was the less troublesome to Ahab, because it gave him a fair occasion of calling a council, and furnish'd him with matter for a very plausible and seasonable debate. "Look you friends, says he, I have had two "proposals sent me from Adad; the former "for an acknowledgment that myself, my "wives, and children, are all at his mercy; "and upon the terms of such a confession, he "was to raise the siege. Now all this I yielded to, as I would part with any thing of my "own interest for the sake of the publick "peace, and the common good of my people; "but they are now come up to insist upon a "general search and rifle, out of a mere captious humour to pick a quarrel with us; "and nothing less, they say, will do. They "began at first with my own particular concerns, out of an opinion I would have stuck "there: but I am now to deliver up my "country and my people also, which they "know I will never do; and so that must be "the quarrel of a war. But I am ready and "resolv'd at last to do only what you shall "advise me to." The council cried out upon the insolency of this Barbarian, with all the contempt imaginable, and gave their voices unanimously for a downright war; so the ambassadors were sent away with this answer; "That the king would yet agree to their first "demands; but that for the security and ho"nour of the citizens, he would never con"sent to the latter." Adad was so inraged at this answer, that he sent a third embassy, which was much more peremptory and menacing than the former. "Tell their king, "says Adad, that he values himself upon the "strength and security of his walls; but that "I will, before he is aware, cast up works "that shall over-top them; and that it will "be but every soldier a handful of earth to "do his business;" giving to understand the incredible number of his people. To which Ahab replied, "That men of honour "were to dispute with their swords, not with "their tongues." Adad happen'd to be at supper with his two and thirty confederate kings, upon the ambassador's arrival with this answer; and he gave orders in the same moment for the siege and the works; and for the doing of every thing, in fine, that might conduce to the taking of the town. Ahab, in the mean while, and his party, were as much dispirited and hopeless as men could well be, till a certain prophet came to him, and dispersed his fears with an assurance from God, that he should prevail against that prodigious army. Ahab was now desirous to know by what hands this victory should be obtain'd. "By the sons, says he, of the nobility, and "you yourself at the head of them, to con"duct them, and give your orders." So the king call'd them together to the number of two hundred and thirty two; and Ahab having information that the Syrian was in the height of his cups and luxury, the gates were thrown open of a sudden, and these young heroes made a sally. was no ſooner brought to Adad, but he forthwith ſent out a party toward them with orders, that whether they came to fight or to treat, they ſhould bring them bound to him. Ahab in the mean time had the reſt of his army in readineſs within the walls, to iſſue out upon occaſion. Theſe great officers ſons firſt engag'd with the guards, kill'd a great many of them, and purſued the reſt up to their tents.

Ahab gives the Syrians a total rout, Ver. 21.

When the king of Iſrael found that they ſucceeded thus far ſo well, he iſſued out with the remainder of the army, and made a furious charge upon the Syrians; took them at unawares, and routed them without any difficulty, having only men in drink, and without arms, to deal withal; ſo that they were forced to run for their lives, Adad himſelf eſcaping with difficulty, by the ſwiftneſs of his horſe.

A great ſlaughter, and a mighty booty, ibid.

They had, in ſhort, the chace of them a great way, killing thoſe they overtook; and ſo with a mighty rich booty of gold, ſilver, and rich equipages that they took in the tents, and the very chariots and horſes of Adad, they march'd back again to the city.

The prophet cautions Ahab to provide for another encounter next ſpring, Ver. 22. Both ſides prepare accordingly, Ver. 23—25.

The prophet however adviſed the king after all this, to have an army in readineſs to take the field next ſpring; for Adad would give him occaſion for it; ſo Ahab prepares vigorouſly for it on the one hand, and Adad calls his friends together on the other, with the remains of his broken army, to adviſe how to manage it. Adad's friends were againſt his fighting any more in the mountains; for the Iſraelites God, they ſaid, was the God of the mountains; but if they had fought upon the plains, the Iſraelites would have been worſted. They gave counſel alſo for the diſcharging of the confederate princes from any further perſonal ſervice and attendance; only their troops to ſtay, and be ſupplied with good officers at the head of them; and in the mean time, their commanders might be levying recruits of horſe and foot to fill up their broken companies. The king was well enough pleaſed with this advice, and ſo applied himſelf to his preparations. In the beginning of the ſpring he march'd his army againſt the Hebrews, and pitch'd his camp in a large plain, not far from the city of Apheca. Ahab in the mean time, with his troops, advanced and drew up juſt over-againſt him, though by many thouſands inferior to the number of the Syrians. While they were facing one another, the prophet came to the Hebrews, with an aſſurance from God, that they ſhould be victorious, and that the enemies ſhould find the God of the mountains to be the God of the vallies alſo. The armies continued for ſix days in the ſame ſtation without moving; and upon the ſeventh they advanc'd on both ſides in a line, and join'd battle. It was hard fought at firſt; but when the Syrians found that they were not able to ſtand the ſhock any longer, they turn'd their backs immediately, and every man ſhifted for himſelf, in a direct rout, with the Hebrews cloſe at their heels. Betwixt thoſe, in fine, that were ſlain upon the purſuit, and thoſe that periſh'd by miſadventure in the confuſion of their flight, by their own chariots and men, ſome torn to pieces, others trampled upon, and trod to death, the overthrow was very great. Thoſe that got into Apheca, the only place they had to fly to, were not many, conſidering ſo mighty a body of men; and of them about ſeven and twenty thouſand were buried under the ruins of the walls, beſides a matter of a hundred thouſand that were ſlain in the battle.

Adad, with ſome of his truſtieſt officers and ſervants, got into a cave, and hid himſelf, where ſome of thoſe about him extolling the natural humanity and good nature of the Hebrews, upon the iſſue, adviſed their maſter to caſt himſelf at Ahab's feet for mercy, in confidence that upon ſuch an application and ſubmiſſion, it would not be refuſed him. The king agreed to try the experiment, and thereupon a certain number of his train were immediately dreſs'd up in the habit of ſuppliants and captives, cloathed in ſackcloth, with halters about their necks, according to the cuſtom of the country in ſuch caſes, and ſent to Ahab with a commiſſion to tell him, that Adad was his priſoner, and would ever own himſelf ſo to be; and that they came in his name only to implore his grace toward him for the ſaving of his life. "Well, ſays Ahab, I "am glad he is ſafe; and you may aſſure him, "that he ſhall be as welcome to me, as if he "were my own brother."

The meſſengers, upon the ſolemnity of a ſacred oath that no violence ſhould be offer'd to his perſon, went away preſently to their maſter in the cellar, and brought him out to the king of Iſrael, who was at that time in his chariot. So ſoon as the priſoner had made his obeiſance, Ahab bow'd himſelf to receive him, taking him up to him with his right hand, and kiſſing him, giving him his faith and honour alſo for his abſolute ſecurity and freedom. Adad, on the other ſide, returning as large acknowledgments, with repeated proteſtations, that this generoſity and goodneſs ſhould never be forgotten; and in the mean time, he ſaid, he would reſtore again to the Hebrews all the cities and lands that had been taken from them, and that Ahab ſhould be as free at Damaſcus, as ever the other's father had been at Samaria. Upon this they proceeded to the ſigning and ſealing of a league, and the reciprocal interchange of oaths for the performance of covenants; and ſo Adad was diſmiſs'd, not without magnificent preſents.

After this blow given to the Syrians, a certain prophet, whoſe name was Micaiah, came to an Iſraelite, and bad him ſtrike him over the head; telling him withal, that it was God's will to have it ſo; but the man refuſing to do it, the prophet told him, he ſhould pay dear for his diſobedience; for he would come to be devour'd by a lion. This fell out accordingly; and the prophet, with the ſame words in his mouth, went afterwards to another, who immediately gave him a blow on the top of his head, that drew blood of him. Upon this he bound up his head, and went to the king with this ſtory, that he was a ſoldier, and a certain officer had deliver'd him a priſoner to keep, who had made his eſcape, and he himſelf was now forc'd to fly for it, for fear the officer that committed him to his cuſtody, ſhould put him to extremities now for letting him go. Well, ſays Ahab, and he would ſerve you but right neither. Upon which words the prophet unbound his head, to give Ahab to underſtand that he that told him this ſtory was Micaiah. He made uſe of this artful circumlocution to faſten the deeper impreſſion upon him; telling him in the end, that Michaiah reproves Ahab for letting Adad go; and tells him he will be the death of himself, and the ruin of his army, 1 Kings xx. 42.

God would call him to a ſevere account, for letting go ſo impious and blaſphemous a wretch as Adad, when he had him in his power; for the time will come, ſays the prophet, when this very Adad that you have now ſpar'd, ſhall be the death of you yourſelf, and the deſtruction of your army. Ahab was highly exaſperated at this liberty of the prophet, and order'd him to be impriſon'd; but he went home however with a heavy heart; for this diſmal prediction gave him no ſmall uneaſineſs.

The piety, good fortune, and power of Jehoſhaphat. His ſon Jehoram marries the daughter of the king of Iſrael, and joins in a war with Ahab againſt Adad.

2 Chron. xvii. TO return now from the ſtory of Ahab, and his affairs, to Jehoſhaphat king of Jeruſalem. This prince had not only enlarged his territory, and put garriſons into all the cities under his juriſdiction, but he had put men and governors into thoſe alſo in the land of Ephraim, that his grandfather Abias had taken from Jeroboam, the king of the ten tribes. This king never fail'd of God's bleſſing and protection in any of his undertakings; for he was a juſt and pious man, and not a day paſſed over his head, without doing ſome good thing or other that was acceptable to God. This integrity of his life and manners gave him a very high reputation among all the neighbouring kings, as appeared by the frequency and munificence of their preſents, which not a little contributed to the advancing even of his fortune, as well as of his fame.

Jehoſhaphat, a pious prince, Ver. 3, 4.

IN the third year of his reign, he called together the elders and the prieſts that were under his juriſdiction, and gave them orders to have commiſſioners ſent from town to town, wherever he had to do, to attend the care of God's worſhip, and to ſee that Moſes's laws might be duly executed and obſerved. This care of his for the preſervation of their religion, was ſo great a ſatisfaction to all his ſubjects, that they were at ſtrife among themſelves, who ſhould be foremoſt in the promoting of ſo excellent a work. And the princes every where about him all this while, had ſo great a reverence for him, that they liv'd in a fair underſtanding one with another, and an inviolate peace. The Philiſtines paid their ordinary tribute with punctual juſtice; and the Arabians their annuity of ſix hundred and thirty lambs, and the like number of kids. Jehoſhaphat alſo fortified his great and ſtrong towns, and kept in conſtant pay a well-diſciplin'd army, to be ever in readineſs upon occaſion. Of the tribe of Judah there were three hundred thouſand ſhield-bearers, under the command of Edra; two hundred thouſand under Johanan; and of the tribe of Benjamin, two hundred thouſand archers, under the ſame officers. There was another captain alſo, by name Ochobat, that commanded a hundred and eighty thouſand men armed with bucklers; beſide the ſoldiers that were diſperſed into towns and garriſons. He married his ſon Jehoram, in fine, to Gotholia the daughter of Ahab, king of the ten tribes; and when he had an occaſion to go to Samaria, he was moſt magnificently received by Ahab; he, and all his military men about him, with corn, wine, fleſh, and other proviſions; and upon Ahab's entreaty, join'd with him in a war upon the king of Syria for the recovery of Ramath-Gilead, which had been taken, and was detained from him by that prince. Jehoſhaphat having an army of his own, not inferior to the others, promis'd him his aſſiſtance, and ſent for his troops from Jeruſalem to Samaria, where both the kings went out of the town, and each of them ſitting upon his throne apart, took a review of their forces, and paid the army. Jehoſhaphat upon this occaſion, was of opinion, if any of the prophets were to be got, to adviſe with them in this expedition againſt the Syrians, whether or no it might be a war at that time to be undertaken; for there had been a three years peace now betwixt thoſe two kings, ſince the Syrian was taken priſoner, and ſet at liberty again.

CHAP. X.

The prophets conſulted about the war with Adad. Zedekijah tells Ahab that he ſhall be victorious. Michaiah the contrary. It comes to a battle, and Ahab the only man that falls in it; and Ahaziah his ſon ſucceeds him in the government.

AHAB call'd his prophets together about him, to the number of about four hundred, and order'd them to enquire, whether or no they ſhould be victorious in this war againſt Adad, and carry the city, which was the main point in queſtion. The prophets were altogether for the war; for the Syrian, they ſaid, ſhould be overcome, and made a priſoner, as before. Jehoſhaphat gave no credence to their words, but ſuſpected them to be falſe prophets, asked Ahab what other prophets there were, that he might have recourſe to, who made anſwer, that there was another indeed, (one Michaiah, the ſon of Imli,) but he hated the man; for he had propheſied ill ſucceſs to his affairs, and given out that he was to loſe his life in this action againſt the king of Syria; ſo that he had now put him in priſon for his pains. But Jehoſhaphat would needs have him ſent for however; and an eunuch, one of the bed-chamber-waiters, was diſpatch'd preſently to fetch him. This meſſenger was telling Michaiah, as they were upon the way together, what the reſt of the prophets ſaid, and how they were all agreed upon it, that Ahab ſhould be victorious. "Well, "ſays the other, I muſt not prevaricate with him "who made me; but by the grace of God, "what meſſage ſoever he ſhall think fit to put "in my mouth, ſhall be moſt faithfully re-"ported to the king." Upon the prophet's arrival, Ahab adjur'd him to ſpeak the very truth of the matter, as he found it, without making it either more or leſs. "Why then, "ſays Michaiah, I ſaw all Iſrael ſcatter'd and "flying, and the Syrians purſuing them, as "ſheep that had no ſhepherd; by which re-"preſentation God hath given to underſtand, "that all the reſt of the people ſhall return "ſafe, and Ahab only fall in the battle." The king upon theſe words, turning to Jehoſhaphat, "Well, ſays he, and do not you find it to be Upon Michaiah's arrival, Ahab adjures him to ſpeak the truth, Ver. 15. Michaiah anſwers him by an alluſion, Ver. 16.

" true now as I told you, that this man is my " enemy?" " No, says Michaiah, the words " that I deliver are according to the expreſs " direction and command of God; but you " ſuffer yourſelf to be flatter'd by your falſe " prophets into a war, upon the hope of vic- " tory, when you yourſelf are to fall in it." This firmneſs and reſolution of the prophet made the king very uneaſy.

Zedekiah a falſe prophet calls Michaiah an impoſtor.

ONE of the falſe prophets, whoſe name was Zedekiah, ſtept out upon this occaſion, and in contempt of Michaiah, adviſed the king not to give any heed to what the prating fellow ſaid, for there was not one word of truth in it; and there needed no other proof of his being an impoſtor, than the prediction of Elias, who undoubtedly ſaw further into things to come than he did; for he had foretold, " That " in the place where dogs licked the blood of " Naboth, (who was ſton'd to death by his " procurement,) in the field of Naboth, dogs " ſhould lick the king's blood alſo. Now this Zedekiah charges him with contradicting Elias. " is a moſt palpable falſity, in contradiction to " the prediction of a prophet of much greater " authority than himſelf; for he will have it, " that within the compaſs of three days, the " king is to fall in the battle; but it ſhall be " quickly ſeen, ſays the prophet, by what ſpi- The credit of the two prophets put to the teſt. " rit this man ſpeaks. I will now give him a " box on the ear, and let my hand wither up- " on doing of it, as Jeroboam's did upon lift- " ing up his hand againſt Jadon, when he would " have had the prophet taken into cuſtody, if " what he delivers to you be from Heaven. " I take it for granted that you have heard of " the ſtory." Upon the uttering of theſe words he ſtruck the prophet; and Ahab finding that no judgment or miſchief follow'd upon it, was harden'd in his reſolution upon this war, by the ſtrange force of a fatality, that made him give more credit to falſe prophets, than to true ones; and ſo diſpoſed of cauſes, that they might be followed with ſuitable events. Zedekiah then made him horns of iron; and, ſays he, under the figure of theſe horns, is ſignified by God, the puſhing, and the breaking of all Syria. Michaiah, on the other hand, telling the falſe prophet, that in a very ſhort time he ſhould be call'd to an account for the vanity and falſity of his pretenſions, and be driven from one hiding-place to another to ſave himſelf. Ahab was ſo exaſperated at this liberty, that he appointed * Achamon, the governor of the city, to take him into ſtrict cuſtody, and to feed him with only bread and water, till he ſhould return.

Zedekiah prefigures victory to Ahab, Michaiah the contrary, 2 Chron. xviii. 10. and 26.

Keeps Amon.

THE two kings, upon this, advanced with their troops toward Ramath, and the king of Syria hearing of it, went out to meet them. It was agreed upon betwixt them, that Ahab ſhould put himſelf that day into the diſguiſe of a private habit, and the king of Jeruſalem appear in his royal robes, the better to evade the dint of the prophet's preſage. But a providential fatality found out the king, though without any diſtinguiſhing marks about him of his regality; for Adad gave a ſtrict charge to his officers and commanders to fight, neither with ſmall nor great, but with the king of Iſrael. The Syrians, upon the firſt puſh, ſeeing Jehoſhaphat at the head of the army, immediately preſs upon him, taking him for Ahab; but when they found their error, they went off, and left him. They kept the field from morning till night, the one flying, and the other purſuing, but not one drop of blood ſpilt all this while; they only hunting after Ahab, and ſtill not finding him. But, in the end, one of Adad's domeſticks, Aman by name, drew an arrow at a venture, that ſtruck the king through the joints of his armour into his very lungs. Ahab was willing to keep it private, for fear of diſcouraging his men; and ſo ſpoke to his charioteer to carry him a little out of the army, for he was mortally wounded. He kept his chariot, however, till about ſun-ſetting, though in great pain and torment, and then betwixt agony and weakneſs with the loſs of blood, he expir'd; and the night coming on, the Syrians withdrew to their tents; and ſo ſoon as ever they were adverti ſed by a herald of Ahab's death, the camp broke up, and every man departed to his own home.

Upon Ahab's death the camp breaks up, 1 Kings xxii. 36.

THE king's body was carried to Samaria, and there interr'd; and upon waſhing the blood off from the chariot in a fountain near hand, the prediction of Elias was verified; for the dogs licked up the blood, and the place was afterwards made uſe of for common women to bathe in. He died at Ramath, according to the propheey of Michaiah; ſo that for the greater honour and authority of the revelation, the preſages of both the prophets were made good, to the eternal ſhame and confuſion of fawning and time-ſerving impoſtors, that ſquare all their judgments to their profit; and inſtead of telling us from God what we are to believe and do, give us effectually to underſtand what we are not to believe or do. Upon this occaſion I cannot but reflect upon the inſuperable neceſſity of our fate, which is not in this world to be avoided, even though it ſhould be foreknown. But we ſuffer ourſelves to be egg'd on with vain and fooliſh hopes, till we are hamper'd irrecoverably in the ſnare. This was the ruin of Ahab; he would not believe thoſe who told him the unpleaſant truth of things, but loſt his life by a fatal credulity toward thoſe who betray'd and humour'd him. This was his end, and Ahaziah his ſon reigned in his ſtead.

CHAP. I.

Jehoſhaphat gets a great victory over the Moabites, Ammonites, and Arabians. The wickedneſs and death of Ahaziah, as Elias had foretold it. Jehoram his brother ſucceeds him, who with the aſſiſtance of Jehoſhaphat, and the king of Idumea, overthrows the king of the Moabites. The death of Jehoſhaphat.

Jehu rebukes Jehoſhaphat for ſiding with Ahab, 2 Chron. xix. 2.

UPON Jehoſhaphat's return to Jeruſalem, after his joining with Ahab againſt Adad, the prophet Jehu met him, and gave him a rebuke for eſpouſing the quarrel of ſo impious and flagitious a wretch as Ahab. He told him how highly he had offended God in that alliance; but yet that he was graciouſly pleaſed, for the good that was in him, to paſs over what he had done amiſs, and to deliver him out of the hands of his enemies. Upon this admonition, the king reconcil'd himſelf to God by prayers and ſacrifices, appointed a general viſitation through all his dominions, with orders for inſtructing the people in the laws of Moſes, and in the religion of their forefathers. He alſo appointed magiſtrates in all their great towns and places, giving them charge to adminiſter juſtice to all men indifferently, to the poor as well as to the rich, without any reſpect to profit, favour, or affection; and, in fine, to diſcharge their duties, as in the ſight of an all-ſeeing God that knew the very thoughts of their hearts. When he had taken care for the eſtabliſhment of good order and manners in the ſeveral cities of the two tribes, he return'd to Jeruſalem, where he conſtituted judges out of the moſt conſiderable of the prieſts and Levites, enjoining them, by the way of precaution, to do juſtice impartially to all the people; or if there ſhould ariſe any controverſies of more weight than ordinary in any of their neighbour-cities, that ſhould be brought to them for judgment, that they ſhould not paſs ſentence, without all poſſible care and conſideration; for it would be a moſt ſcandalous and diſhonourable thing not to do punctual and accurate juſtice in a city where God had eſtabliſh'd his temple; and the king, his palace. He choſe the chief magiſtrates out of the number of his own friends; as Amariah the prieſt, and * Zebediah, of the houſe of Judah.

IT was at this time, that the Moabites and Ammonites made war upon Jehoſhaphat, aſſiſted with a mighty army of auxiliary Arabians, and encamped at Engedi, a city near the lake of Aſphaltites, about three hundred furlongs from Jeruſalem, and a place famous for balſam and palm-trees. When Jehoſhaphat underſtood that they had paſs'd the lake, and broken into his country, he was not a little ſtartled at the ſurprize, and preſently order'd an aſſembly to be call'd; and then ſtanding before the temple, he betook himſelf to prayers, for God's bleſſing upon his arms againſt ſo powerful an invader; which was but according to the form and practice of our forefathers, upon the firſt inſtitution of that holy place; who, whenever they found themſelves in danger of being over-run by a foreign enemy, cauſed all the people to meet in a full congregation to implore God's aſſiſtance toward the repelling of that violence, and for the maintenance of that inheritance which the Lord in his infinite bounty had beſtow'd upon them, and their enemies would take away by force. Jehoſhaphat mingled his prayers with tears, and the joint ſupplications of the whole multitude, with their wives and children, went along with them.

Jehoſhaphat calls an aſſembly, and prays before the temple for a bleſſing upon his arms, 2 Chron. xx. 6--12.

As they were in the fervour of their devotions, there ſtarted up a certain prophet in the middle of them, whoſe name was Jahaziel, crying out to the people, that God had heard their prayers, and would fight their battle, in favour of the religion they profeſs'd; appointing them, upon this, to be in readineſs the next day to march towards their enemies, whom they ſhould find encamped betwixt Jeruſalem and Engedi, at a certain aſcent, known by the name of Sis, which in Hebrew is as much as an eminence; telling them farther, that they ſhould not need to ſtrike a ſtroke, but only to ſtand looking on, as unconcerned ſpectators of an action wherein God would fight for them. After this declaration, both king and people fell proſtrate upon their faces; gave thanks, and worſhipped; the Levites in the mean while accompanying their hymns with muſical inſtruments.

A prophet ſtarts up in the middle of their devotions, Ver. 14, 15.

Victory promiſ'd them without ſtriking a ſtroke, Ver. 16, 17.

The king, early next morning, went into the deſart, under the city of Tekoa, where he admoniſhed the multitude to put their truſt in God according to the prediction of the prophet, and that there was no need of ranging themſelves in form of battle, but only to ſet the prieſts with their trumpets in the firſt line, and the Levites with their ſingers, and ſo to move chearfully forward, with muſick and thankſgiving, as upon a day of victory, or deliverance from a common enemy. They were all highly ſatisfied with the king's advice, and ſoon after they put it in execution; for God ſtruck the Ammonites and their allies with ſuch a panick terror and conſternation, that falling foul upon one another, the outrage was ſo furious againſt their own people, that of ſo many thouſands of ſoldiers, there was not one man left alive. When Jehoſhaphat came to take a view of the valley where the enemy was encamped, he found it all cover'd with dead bodies; never ſo eaſy and ſo abſolute a victory gain'd without either ſweat or blood; ſo that Jehoſhaphat, in a tranſport of joy for ſo unexpected a bleſſing, gave his ſoldiers the pillage of the camp, and the ſpoil of the dead, which was ſo prodigious great, that it coſt them full three days to carry off the booty.

A victory obtain'd without blood, Ver. 22, 23.

The booty ſo great, that it coſt three days to carry it off, Ver. 25.

On the fourth day all the people gather'd together in a deep craggy valley, called the valley of Beracha, where they praiſed and bleſſed God for all the works of his power and mercy. From hence it was that the valley took its name, which is as much as to ſay, the valley of bleſſings; and it is ſo called to this very day. The king led his army from thence to Jeruſalem, where he paſs'd ſeveral days in ſacrifice and feaſting. The fame of this miraculous victory poſſeſs'd all foreign princes and nations wherever it came, with ſuch a reverence for the ſanctity and piety of Jehoſhaphat, that they look'd upon him as a perſon for whom God had a peculiar kindneſs, and kept up the ſame opinion of him to his dying day. But he was yet a friend all this while to the ſon of Ahab, king of Iſrael, and went ſhares with him in the ſetting out of ſhips for the traffick of Pontus and Thrace. But the deſign miſcarried, to their very great expence and damage; for the veſſels were not of a make and ſize for thoſe ſeas; ſo that, in ſhort, what with one thing and another, whether through ill conduct or foul weather, they were all caſt away, and ſo the project fell to the ground, and was never afterwards revived. Let this ſuffice for the hiſtory of Jehoſhaphat.

This action mightily advances the reputation of Jehoſhaphat, Ver. 27--29.

* Scrip. Ekron.

Elias meets the meſſenger, and bids him tell the king he ſhall die, Ver. 3, 4.

Ahaziah had his royal palace in Samaria. He was a very wicked and prophane man, and one that altogether adher'd to the principles of his father and mother; beſide a certain emulation that he had to out-ſin Jeroboam himſelf, the capital ſeducer of Iſrael. In the ſecond year of his reign, the king of the Moabites revolted, and abſolutely refuſed to be any longer ſubject to the tribute he had formerly paid to his father. It happen'd that Ahaziah had a terrible fall down ſtairs one day, as he was paſſing from an upper chamber, that endanger'd his life. He was very ill upon it, and ſent to the god of the people of Accaron *, or the fly (as they call'd him) to know whether he ſhould live or die. Upon this occaſion the God of the Hebrews commanded the prophet Elias to go preſently and meet the meſſengers, and to ask them whether the Iſraelites had not a God of their own; and if ſo, there was no need of conſulting a ſtrange god in the caſe; and therefore they had e'en beſt go back to the king, and tell him that he ſhould not recover. The meſſengers immediately took their errand from Elias, and with all expedition haſted with it to the king, who was in great admiration at the quickneſs of their return; and enquiring farther into the matter, they told him of a man they met, who bad them go no farther, and withal charging them to tell their king in the name of the God of the Iſraelites, that his illneſs was mortal. The king was very earneſt and particular with them to deſcribe the man; ſo they told him, he was a hairy man, with a leathern girdle about him. By this deſcription the king preſently concluded this perſon to be Elias, and ſo diſpatch'd away an officer with fifty ſoldiers to take him into cuſtody. The commander found him upon the top of a mountain; and ſo call'd him down to go along with him to the king; for that was his order, he ſaid; and if he would not go by fair means, he would make him go by foul. Elias told him, that to ſhew him the difference betwixt a true prophet and a falſe, he would now convince him by a prodigy, that he was no impoſtor. "If I am a "man of God, ſays he, let fire come down "from " ty." Upon which prayer a fire deſcended, and conſumed them all. The tidings of this dreadful judgment came no ſooner to the king's ear, but in a rage he ſent another officer, with the ſame number of men, and upon the ſame errand. The captain ſaid the ſame things over again, uſed the ſame menaces, and they were all deſtroy'd after the ſame manner. After this the king ſent yet again a third officer with his party. Now the man being a perſon of candour and civility, when he came up to Elias, he ſaluted him with reſpect. " I need not " tell you, ſays he, that I am under command;

" that I come upon this errand unwillingly, as " they did likewiſe who came before me;
" wherefore I beſeech you be pleaſed out of " pity to me, and my ſoldiers about me, to " come down willingly, and follow us to the " king." Elias was ſo much mov'd with the modeſty and good-nature of the man, that he went down and follow'd him. When they had brought him into the king's preſence, the ſpirit of God came upon him, and he freely told the king, " Thus ſaith the Lord; ſince you " have an opinion of me that I am no God,
" nor able to foretel what will be the iſſue of " your diſtemper; and that you have rather " choſen to ſend to the god of the people of " Accaron for your ſatisfaction, know for cer" tain that it will be your death."

A third officer was ſent, Ver. 13.

Elias goes along with him, and tells the king that this illneſs will be his death, Ver. 15, 16.

In ſome ſhort time this prophecy was fulfilled; and Ahaziah dying without iſſue, Jehoram his brother reigned in his ſtead; a man no way inferior to Ahab for a vicious and irreligious courſe of life; for he deliver'd himſelf up wholly to ſtrange gods, to the ſcandal and diſhonour of the religion of his forefathers, though otherwiſe a man of induſtry, and well enough qualified for buſineſs.

Ahaziah dies without iſſue, and leaves the kingdom to his brother Jehoram, an impious prince, Ver. 17.

It was in his time that Elias was taken away from the converſation of men, and no manner of account given what became of him even to this day; but he left Eliſha, his diſciple, behind him, of whom we have ſpoken already. We find in holy writ the ſame thing atteſted of Enoch before the flood, as well as of Elias here, and that they were both taken away; but no mention made of the death of either of them.

Elias is tranſlated like Enoch, 2 Kings ii. 11.

No account of Elias's death.

Upon Jehoram's coming to the throne after his brother, he reſolved to make war upon Meſha the king of the Moabites, for refuſing to pay the yearly tribute of two hundred thouſand unſhorn ſheep, upon the account of what was formerly paid to his father Ahab; wherefore he began with levying an army at home, and after that ſolicited the aſſiſtance of Jehoſhaphat (upon the account of his having maintain'd an alliance with his father) to join with him, who not only promis'd for himſelf, but undertook likewiſe to engage the king of Idumea, having ſome tie upon him, in the party. When Jehoram came to underſtand how well he was like to be ſeconded, he went forthwith to Jeruſalem, where he was ſplendidly receiv'd and treated by the king of the place. Being there in council, the ways and method of the expedition were taken into debate, and 'twas agreed by common conſent for the army to ſteer their courſe through the deſart of Idumea, where the enemy would be leaſt aware of the deſign. The three kings, that is to ſay, of Jeruſalem, Iſrael, and Idumea, put themſelves upon their march, according to the reſolution of the council; and when they had wandered up and down for the ſpace of ſeven days, they fell into great diſtreſs for want of water, both for man and beaſt, till they were all within a very little of the uttermoſt extremity of deſpair. Jehoram eſpecially, who called out to God in an expoſtulatory way of impatience, " What have theſe three kings done, ſays he,
" to be deliver'd up captives to the king of " the Moabites, without the hazard of a bat" tle?" Jehoſhaphat, on the other hand, as became a pious man, ſpoke comfortable words to Jehoram, adviſing him to enquire, if there were ever a prophet in the army to ask counſel of God what was to be done under their circumſtances. A ſervant within hearing, told them that he had ſeen Eliſha the ſon of Shaphat there, the diſciple of Elias; and upon this information, the three kings, at the perſuaſion of Jehoſhaphat, went and found him out. When they came to his tent, which was a little out of the camp, they ask'd him what would become of the army; Jehoram eſpecially, with a great deal of earneſtneſs. Why, ſays Eliſha to him, you ſhould have gone to your father's and mother's prophets for ſatisfaction, without troubling other people; they would have reſolved you right no doubt. Jehoram importun'd him ſtill, intreating and praying for an anſwer, if it were but for the ſaving of ſo many mens lives that were ready to periſh. Eliſha ſwore ſolemnly to Jehoram, that if it were not for the ſake of Jehoſhaphat, who was a good and a pious man, he ſhould have had no anſwer from him at all. And upon this he order'd a muſician to be call'd, and as he was ſinging, the ſpirit of God came upon the prophet, who ſpoke to the kings to make ſeveral ditches in the channels of the torrent. " And, ſays Eliſha, you ſhall ſee
" them all flowing with water, without either
" wind or rain; water ſufficient for yourſelves
" and your cattle, to all manner of purpoſes.
" Beſide that, henceforward you ſhall never " feel any more drought; and this is not all " neither; for God will bleſs you yet further
" ſtill, for by his grace and help you ſhall
" overcome your enemies, and ſcatter them,
" and ruin their plantations; lay their coun" try waſte, and dam up their rivers and
" their fountains." The next day before ſunriſe, after theſe words of the prophet, there came down from Idumea, three days journey from the place, an impetuous torrent upon a mighty fall of rain, ſo that there was no longer any want of drink, either for horſe or man.

When the king of Moab underſtood that theſe three kings were advancing againſt him by the way of the wilderneſs, he raiſed all the force he was able to make, to meet them upon the borders, for fear of any inroad upon him by ſurprize. The two armies were by this time not far from the land of Moab, when the riſing ſun ſtriking upon the torrent, made the water look ſo red, that the Moabites took it for blood, vainly imagining, that the three kings had fallen to deſtroying one another in a rage for want of water, and that this torrent was a ſtream of their blood. In this confidence they went to their king only for permiſſion to rifle the enemy's camp, taking it for granted, that it was all abandon'd. Upon their application, they obtained leave to break in upon the enemy's pillage, and ſo in confuſion and out of order, with great precipitation advanced to the enemy's camp, as if there needed no more to the gaining of the booty, than the taking of it up; but they quickly found their miſtake to their coſt; for they were ſet upon on all hands in the attempt; part killed, and the reſt ſo ſcatter'd, that they had much ado to make their way home again. The kings, in the mean while, made an incurſion into the land of the Moabites, deſtroy'd their towns and cities, drove away all their cattle, and cover'd all the turf with the ſand and gravel of the torrent; cut down the beſt of their woods and trees, dam'd up the ſprings and fountains, and levell'd their walls to the ground; nay, the king himſelf was forc'd to take ſanctuary in a town, where he was afterward beſieged; and in ſuch danger of loſing it by an aſſault, that he attempted a ſally with ſeven hundred horſe upon the enemy's weakeſt quarter, to break through their body; but failing in his attempt, he was forc'd into the town again, where he enter'd upon the moſt horrid barbarous action that the uttermoſt diſtreſs or deſpair could put a man upon. He took his eldeſt ſon, the next heir to the government, and ſacrific'd him to God upon the walls, in the view of the enemy's army. The kings reflecting upon the force of an abandon'd deſperation, together with the viciſſitude of human affairs, and conſidering it were their own caſe too, were ſoften'd to ſuch a degree of compaſſion, that they broke up the ſiege upon it, and every man returned to his own home. Jehoſhaphat was at eaſe after this expedition, but he did not long outlive it. He died at Jeruſalem in the ſixtieth year of his age, and the twenty fifth of his reign; and he had in that city a moſt magnificent burial, ſuch a one as might become the imitator of David.

Jehoram the ſon of Jehoſhaphat ſucceeds his father. Eliſha works miracles. Adad beſieges Jehoram in Samaria. The miraculous raiſing of the ſiege. Hazael ſtrangles Adad, and uſurps the kingdoms of Syria and Damaſcus. The execrable impieties of Jehoram, and the dreadful judgment that Eliſha denounces againſt him.

Jehoram, the eldeſt ſon of Jehoſhaphat, ſucceeds his father, 2 Chron. xxi. 1.

JEHOSHAPHAT left behind him ſeveral ſons; and Jehoram the eldeſt of them, by his father's appointment, ſucceeded him in the kingdom. He bore the ſame name with his mother's brother the king of Iſrael, and the ſon of Ahab, who was then but newly return'd to Samaria from the war with the Moabites, and brought Eliſha with him. The holy ſcriptures make mention of ſeveral memorable paſſages of that prophet, which I ſhall account well worth the taking notice of in this hiſtory. The wife of Obadiah, Ahab's ſteward, applied herſelf to Eliſha, and told him, that he was no ſtranger to the outrageous violence of Jezabel againſt the prophets, and how her husband conceal'd and preſerv'd a hundred of them from deſtruction, and took up money upon his own credit to feed them while they were in the cave; but that her huſband being now dead, the creditors threaten'd to make ſlaves of her and her children for the debt; wherefore ſhe entreated him for her husband's ſake to procure her ſome preſent relief; ſo the prophet ask'd her what ſhe had in the houſe, who ſaid ſhe had nothing at all, but a little oil in a cruiſe. The prophet then bad her go borrow as many empty pots, or veſſels, of her neighbours, as ſhe could get, and keep her chamber-door ſhut, and put oil into all thoſe veſſels; for God would fill them all. The widow did as ſhe was order'd; and after the diſtributing of the oil, ſhe came back again to the prophet, and gave him a particular account of what ſhe had done, who adviſed her to ſell the oil, and diſcharge the debts; for there would be ſomewhat remaining, after ſatisfaction given to the creditors, for the relief of her children. By this means ſhe deliver'd herſelf from a troubleſome obligation.

Obadiah ſhelter'd an hundred prophets againſt the outrage of Jezabel, 1 Kings xviii. 13.

THE prophet one time having got notice of a conſpiracy againſt the life of Jehoram, and that Adad had treacherouſly planted an ambuſh to ſurprize him, he gave the king intelligence of it, with a caution to have a care of ſuch a certain place, where the Syrians had laid a plot to entrap him. This precaution kept the king from going a hunting, and diſappointed the plot. But Adad was in ſuch a rage when he found his malicious contrivance defeated, that he fell to ſtorming and railing at his own domeſticks, for a company of traitors, threatening them with no leſs than death itſelf, for diſcovering a deſign that no other perſons were privy to but themſelves. Some body made anſwer, that he had no need to accuſe his own friends and domeſticks of treaſon, or ſuſpect any of the party he had ſent to intercept the enemy, had betray'd his counſels, ſo long as he had Eliſha for a ſpy upon him, that lay perpetually prying into his ways and actions, on his maſter's behalf; and he had the faculty of diving into the moſt ſecret of his deſigns. The king preſently ſent his ſcouts abroad to enquire after Eliſha, and to learn where he was; and word was brought him, that he might be found at Dothan. Upon this intelligence he immediately diſpatch'd away horſemen and chariots to apprehend him. They went and beſet the town by night, ſo that there was no paſſing, either out or in; and early the next morning, a ſervant of the prophet's ran trembling to his maſter to tell him the news, how the town was begirt with a body of the enemy that were come to take him. Eliſha bad him have a good heart, and fear nothing; for his truſt and confidence was in the goodneſs and power of an overruling providence; and ſo he prayed to God for ſome ſpecial token of his preſence and protection, that might confirm his ſervant in a fearleſs reſignation to his holy will and pleaſure. The prophet's prayers were heard, and there appeared forthwith, in the ſight of the ſervant, a multitude of horſes and chariots round about Eliſha, as a guard upon his perſon. The conſideration of this ſuccour, as the ſervant underſtood it to be, put him out of all fear of any further danger for his maſter.

AFTER this viſion the prophet pray'd once again that God would caſt a miſt before the eyes of theſe people, and ſtrike them with ſuch a blindneſs, that they might not ſee him, ſo as to diſcern him from another man. Upon the granting of this requeſt alſo, Eliſha caſt himſelf ſelf into the middle of their troops, and ſo went from one to another, asking them for what, or for whom they ſought. They told him, for Eliſha the prophet. Well, ſays Eliſha, do but follow me to the place where he is, and you ſhall have him; ſo theſe men that were blinded in their underſtanding, as well as in their eyes, went after him without any difficulty or ſcruple, till at laſt he brought them into Samaria. Upon their entrance into the city, the prophet bad Jehoram cauſe the gates to be ſhut, and the Syrians to be ſurrounded. Eliſha, upon this occaſion, offer'd up a third prayer; which was, that God would reſtore the Syrians to their ſight again; whereupon the Syrians eyes were open'd; and to their great aſtoniſhment and admiration, they found themſelves coop'd up in an enemy's town, in the hands, and intirely at the mercy of their adverſaries.

The ſoldiers ask Eliſha himſelf where to find Eliſha, 2 Kings i. 19.

Eliſha leads them into Samaria, ibid.

Upon Eliſha's third prayer, the Syrians are reſtored to their ſight, and find themſelves in the hands of their enemies, Ver. 20.

WHILE the Syrians were at a ſtand upon this unaccountable ſurprize, and at their wits end what to do next, the king propoſed to the prophet the putting of them all to death, which he abſolutely oppoſed, as a way of proceeding that would not ſtand with his honour and juſtice; and only to be allow'd of in caſes where men are overcome in battle. But theſe were people, he told him, that were guilty of no act of hoſtility upon his country, and only brought thither by the will and power of God, without any malicious intention, or but ſo much as the bare knowledge of what they did; and therefore the prophet gave his opinion for the treating of them with hoſpitality and reſpect; and after ſuch a generous refreſhment, leaving them to their own freedom. Jehoram took the prophet's advice, gave them a ſplendid and a liberal entertainment, and ſo ſent them back again, unhurt and ſafe, to their maſter. They gave the king, at their return, ſo particular an account of this wonderful ſtory, that his conſcience was ſtruck, upon the hearing of it, with a conviction, that the hand of God was manifeſtly in this prodigy, and that what the prophet deliver'd in the name of God, was no other than the dictate of a divine inſpiration. So that after this time, Adad never enter'd into any ſecret practice againſt the king of Iſrael; but reſolved, however, to make open war upon him, in confidence of his greater ſtrength and numbers.

Jehoram, by Eliſha's advice, leaves the ſoldiers at liberty, V. 23.

UPON the taking of this reſolution, Adad rais'd a mighty army, and march'd with his whole force againſt Jehoram; who finding himſelf too weak to venture his all upon the puſh of a field-battle, kept himſelf within the walls of Samaria, where he had good works and defences to truſt to. It was a ſtrong place, and Adad in ſome doubt whether to attempt it by aſſault, or by famine; but, however, ſiege was laid to the town, and the garriſon reduc'd to ſo miſerable a ſcarcity of proviſions, that an aſs's head was ſold for * fourſcore pieces of ſilver, and a † pint and an half of pigeon's dung (for ſeaſoning) for ‡ five pieces. There was nothing the king feared ſo much in this extremity, as leſt ſome body or other ſhould betray the place to the enemy, under the force and neceſſity of an inſupportable famine; ſo that Jehoram every day viſited the walls and the guards himſelf; took care that no ſpies ſhould enter privately into the town, and had a vigilant eye upon all motions and under-hand practices whatſoever.

Adad lays ſiege to Samaria, and brings it to great extremity, Ver. 24, 25.

AS the king was attending his buſineſs, there came a woman crying to him for help; and Jehoram ſuppoſing ſhe had come to beg of him, turn'd her off with a kind of an angry rebuke; "I have no barns nor wine-preſſes, ſays he, "and what have I left me to ſupply your "wants?" The woman told him ſhe did not come to beg his meat, but to implore his juſtice, and to deſire that he would do her right in a controverſy betwixt herſelf and another woman. The king ask'd her what it was, and ſhe told him; "Sir, ſays ſhe, a certain neigh- "bour of mine, and myſelf, that were ready "to die for want of food, came to an agree- "ment betwixt ourſelves, having each of us "a little male child, to eat our children by "turns, barely to keep life and ſoul together. "Mine was kill'd and dreſs'd yeſterday, and "ſhe had her part of it; and now I ſhould "have my part of her child, ſhe breaks her "word with me, and has hid him." Jehoram, in a raging paſſion of grief and horror, rent his garment, raving and crying out, that he never knew what it was to be perfectly miſerable, till that inſtant; and all this might have been prevented, ſays he, for a word ſpeaking, if the prophet would but have interceded with God for me, on my behalf; but, ſays he, I'll have his blood for it; and in that heat diſpatch'd away an officer to cut off his head, who in the ſame moment ſet forward upon that commiſſion.

Jehoram imputes this miſery to Eliſha's not interceding for them, V. 31.

Jehoram gives order to cut off Eliſha's head, ib.

THIS outrageous diſpleaſure of the king's was no ſecret to Eliſha, who told his diſciples as he was ſitting with them at home, that Jehoram, that ſon of a murderer, had ſent an officer, who was then upon his way, to take off his head; wherefore, ſays he, do you watch and obſerve him; and when he comes near the houſe, be you ſure to ſhut the door upon him, only to put him to a little ſtand till the king himſelf ſhall come up, who hath now chang'd his mind, and is haſtening after as faſt as may be to prevent miſchief. They watch'd as they were directed; ſhut the door upon the men when they came, and kept them out till Jehoram appeared himſelf, who made all the haſte that was poſſible, for fear of being too late to countermand the execution of the order, and to ſave the life of the prophet.

Jehoram changes his mind, Ver. 32.

UPON the king's coming to Eliſha, he fell to reproaching of him, that he could have the heart to ſee him and his people in ſo many extremities of diſtreſs, without putting up one prayer to God for their relief. The prophet gave him for answer, this promise and assurance, that by the same hour the next day Samaria should be so abundantly stored with all sorts of necessaries for life, that a * measure of fine flour should be sold publickly in the market for † one shekel, and two measures of barley at the same rate. The king and his court made no doubt at all of the truth of his predictions, having had so many proofs of their authority and credit: So that they comforted themselves upon the presage, as if it had been a thing already done, and made their present difficulties easy to them in the hope of what was to come; but a certain favourite, and an officer of the King, who commanded a third part of his army, told the prophet, as the king was leaning upon him, in a familiar way,

"Elisha, (says he) a body may as well believe, that it shall rain flour and barley from "heaven, as what you have now foretold; "for it seems to me incredible, even to the "degree of an impossibility." Well, says the prophet, make no question of it; for you shall see it: But you shall only see it, without enjoying it: Which prediction was made good.

IT was a custom among the Samaritans, that no leprous persons should be suffer'd to live within the walls of the city; and at this time there were four lepers who had their habitations without the gates. The famine in the city was so extreme, that there was no provision to be expected from thence: so that whether they went back into the town, or staid where they were, they had certain death before them the one way as well as the other. Upon this deliberation, they took up a resolution of casting themselves upon the enemy. If they spar'd them, they should live; or if they put them to death, it would be a gentler way of dispatch. They agreed all four in this opinion, as the best expedient they had before them, and so slipt away by night into the enemy's camp; in which very point of time it pleased God to possess the Syrians with a panick terror upon the imaginary noise of horses and armed men breaking in upon them; and in the strength of this fancy and apprehension, they all ran in a great consternation to Adad, and told him that Jehoram's confederate kings of Egypt, and of the islands, were just at hand, and within hearing of the march of the army. Adad gave the more credit to the delusion, in regard that he himself labour'd under the same false imagination; so that in this unaccountable affright, the whole army broke up in confusion, and every man did what he could to shift for himself, leaving their horses, carriages, baggage, and their whole treasure in the camp, without any other care in the world than how to save their lives. When the lepers came up to the out-skirts of the Syrians camp, they found all things in a profound silence, and a vast plenty of all necessaries: advancing farther, and entering into every single tent, and finding them evacuated, they ate and drunk what they pleased, took as much gold and rich booty as they could carry away, without seeing so much as one person in the field. They loaded themselves four times, and buried their burdens in a hole they digg'd for that purpose without the camp. They might now reasonably conclude the enemy to be drawn off, and came upon this to blame themselves for not giving Jehoram and the citizens an account of this wonderful desertion, upon the first discovery of it. Wherefore they made all possible haste back to Samaria, calling aloud to the watch from under the walls, that the enemy had totally abandon'd their camp; and upon this intelligence, in the same instant sent by them to the king's guards, Jehoram presently called a great council upon it, of his friends and officers, and gave his own opinion, that he looked upon it as a stratagem to draw his people into an ambush under that pretence. They might, says he, perhaps despair of starving us, and so bethought themselves of this invention to surprize us; and if they could but draw us out to take possession of the booty, they might make an excursion upon us from their places of retirement, cut our men to pieces, and with great ease make themselves masters of the city; and therefore, says the king, I am for providing against treachery, and being the more wary still for this pretence, I cannot think they are fled away, and should be loth to venture the main chance upon the credit of this intelligence. One of the council stood up, and with great respect to the king's opinion, judg'd it to be the true reason of the case. But this notwithstanding, says he, it might be worth the while I conceive, to send out two horsemen upon the scout for discovery, as far as Jordan. If they should happen to be taken, it will serve for a warning to others, however, not to expose themselves too far; and then the loss of two men would not be very great, who in case they escape the sword, are in danger to die of the famine. The king was much of this counsellor's mind, and sent away his scouts immediately for intelligence; who returned soon after with this report: That they had been so far, without seeing so much as one enemy; but that they saw arms, and corn, and several bundles of things upon the way, that look'd as if the Syrians had thrown them down in order to make their flight the more expeditious. The king, upon this information, sent out his People to the plundering of Adad's Camp, where ‡ they found a wonderful rich booty, in gold, silver, Horses, and several sorts of Beasts; beside such an incredible provision of grain, that it look'd more like a dream than a truth: So vast a quantity, in short, that the people presently forgot their former scarcity in this superabundance; for two measures of barley were sold for one shekel, and a measure of flour at the same price too, according to the prediction of Elisha. Now this measure contains about an Italian bushel and a half: Only the officer before spoken of, that commanded the third part of the army, had no benefit by this relief, being posted at the gate by the king's command to keep the people in order, that they should not crowd one another to death upon the sally they were to make. He himself was trodden to death in the throng.

This

This was a judgment that befel him for his unbelief, in giving ſo little heed to what Eliſha foretold.

Adad eſcapes to Damaſcus.

ADAD was by this time gotten back ſafe to Damaſcus; and when he came to underſtand that all theſe alarums of chariots and horſemen that had given ſuch an irreparable rout to him and his army, were, in truth, only judicial impreſſions of affright and terror, without any other foundation, he look'd upon it as a declaration from Heaven againſt him; and the anxiety of that thought brought upon him a dangerous ſickneſs of body. Eliſha went then toward Damaſcus; and Adad being informed where he was, ſent Hazael, his particular and truſty friend, with a compliment and magnificent preſents, to meet him, and to enquire likewiſe of the prophet, whether the king ſhould out-live this diſeaſe or not, and what would be the iſſue of it. Hazael took forty camels, and loaded them with the choiceſt curioſities that either the court or the country afforded, advanced with them toward Eliſha; and meeting him upon the way, ſaluted him with great reverence, in the name, and by the order of king Adad; telling him, that he had in his commiſſion to offer him thoſe preſents, and likewiſe to adviſe with him about his diſcaſe, whether or no he might hope for any relief. The prophet told Hazael, that the king was to die; but charged him to ſay nothing of it to the king. This went to the heart of Hazael, and Eliſha fell upon that into an extreme fit of weeping, in the contemplation of the miſeries the people were to endure after the deceaſe of Adad. Hazael ask'd the prophet what might be the cauſe of that exceſſive grief? "Why, ſays the prophet, I "cannot forbear weeping to think of the ca- "lamities that you yourſelf are to bring upon "the Iſraelites. You ſhall put the beſt of "their men to the ſword, burn their walled "cities, daſh their children to death againſt "the ſtones, and rip up the children out of "the bellies of their mothers." "Well, "ſays Hazael, but how is it poſſible for me "to compaſs all this miſchief?" "Why, ſays "the prophet, it is declared to me by God, "that you are to reign in Syria." And upon this diſcourſe Hazael left him, and returned to his maſter, with an account that he ſhould recover of his diſtemper. On the day following he made the king a viſit; and taking his opportunity, ſtrangled him with a wet cloth, and took poſſeſſion of his palace and government. He was a man of great intereſt and reputation with the people of Syria and Damaſcus; inſomuch, that to this day the memory of Adad, and of Hazael his ſucceſſor, is celebrated among the Syrians with divine honours, not only for their bounty and generoſity in general, but in particular for the pompous magnificence of the temples they erected at Damaſcus, and the care they took for the honour and ornament of the city. Their images, in fine, are carried about in a daily proceſſion, as in an oſtentation of their antiquity; whereas, in truth, they were not of above eleven hundred years ſtanding from their original.

THE death of Adad ſet the heart of Jehoram, the king of Iſrael, much at eaſe, as it gave him a breathing time from wars and broils, and the comfort of ſeeing himſelf once again in a ſtate of peace. But Jehoram's nameſake, (I mean Jehoram the king of Judah,) of whom I have ſpoken already, was no ſooner enter'd upon the ſovereignty, but for a welcome to his reign, he began with the ſlaughter of his brothers, and of his father's friends; and briefly, with ſuch outrages, as if he had been upon a competition with the worſt of former kings, which ſhould be the wickedeſt; having alſo at his elbow his wife Gotholiah, the daughter of Ahab, an excellent inſtructreſs to all impious purpoſes, and the inſtrument of his idolatrous defection from the true worſhip, to the ſervice of ſtrange gods. Now though God would moſt certainly ſtand firm to the promiſe he made to king David, that he would never utterly extinguiſh the whole race, Jehoram did all he could yet to provoke a total extirpation, by a lewd daily courſe of freſh impieties and abominations. Idumea at this time revolted from Jehoram, and they made way to their apoſtaſy by the murder of their king, who had ever been faithful to Jehoſhaphat, and by ſetting up another in his place. Upon the firſt impreſſion of this affront, the king made a ſpeedy incurſion by night, with a good body of horſe and charioteers, into the enemy's quarters. But they were forc'd to content themſelves with burning and making a little havock upon the borders; and ſo falling off again, without daring to attempt any farther progreſs into the country. This expedition was ſo far from ſtriking any ſort of terror or apprehenſion into the deſerters, that, on the contrary, it ſerv'd for an encouragement to others to follow the example of their leaders, and to ſhake off their yoke likewiſe; Libnah rebelling alſo at the ſame time. Such, in ſhort, was the madneſs and folly of Jehoram, that he forc'd the Iſraelites up to the groves and high places upon the mountains, and there to worſhip falſe gods. He went on for ſome time in the defiance and contempt of law and religion, and all that could be ſacred either in Heaven or earth, till in the end there came a menacing letter from the prophet Eliſha to him to this effect: "That ſince he had audaciouſly and wilfully ſet himſelf up againſt "the practice and example of his forefathers, "and eſpouſed the impious ſuperſtition of the "Iſraelites; and not reſting there neither, had "likewiſe debauch'd the tribe of Judah, and "the citizens of Jeruſalem, from the religion "of their country, into the paganiſh ſuperſtitions of idolatry, in making gods of images, "after the example of Ahab's violence upon "his people to force them into theſe abomi- "nations." After the doing of all this, and the polluting his hands in the blood of his own brothers, and other good and righteous men, this judgment was denounced againſt him in the aforeſaid letter; "That his family and "his people ſhould fall into the hands of a "mercileſs enemy, that ſhould ſpare neither "women nor children; that he himſelf ſhould "be tormented with a lingering pain in the "guts, till his bowels, by little and little, "ſhould rot, and fall out." This was to be his miſerable condition, that ſhould bring him at laſt, though too late, to a ſenſe and a ſight of his wickedneſs. This, in ſhort, was the ſubſtance of the writing that was deliver'd to Jehoram in the name of Eliſha.

SOME short time after this, an army of Arabians from the borders of Ethiopia, together with a medley of other Barbarians, broke in upon the kingdom of Jehoram, ravaged the country, rifled the palace, put the king's wives to the sword, and all his children, one only excepted, Ahaziah by name, who very narrowly escaped the fury of the enemy. The king, after this publick calamity, fell into a disease, according to what the prophet foretold him; which was such a kind of plague in the guts, that all people looked upon it as a just judgment of God upon him in his displeasure; his bowels dropping daily out of his belly before his own eyes. The people insulted over the carcass, and drew inferences from the exemplary manner of his punishment, to the degree of his wickedness, and that the wrath of God was upon him. They would neither vouchsafe him a royal funeral, nor a place in his father's monument. He lived forty years, and reigned eight; and the people of Judah placed Ahaziah upon the throne of his father.

Jehoram besieges Ramoth, receives a wound, and retires to Jezreel. Jehu carries on the siege. Jehu anointed king of Israel, with a command to extirpate the family of Ahab. He marches directly to Jezreel, where Jehoram and his nephew Ahaziah were at that time together.

Jehoram besieges Ramoth-Gilead, and leaves it to Jehu, Ver. 5, 6

JEHORAM, the king of the Israelites, was in hope, after the death of Adad, that he might recover Ramoth of Gilead; and in that prospect he levied a great army, and sat down before it. At the siege he received a wound with an arrow from the bow of a Syrian. It was not mortal; but yet, such as it was, he was obliged to withdraw to the city of Jezreel for the conveniencies of the cure, leaving his whole army behind him at the siege of Ramoth, under the command of Jehu, the son of Amasis, who took the town by force. Jehoram proposed upon his recovery, to make war upon the Syrians; and in the mean time Elisha sent one of his disciples with holy oil to Ramoth, there to anoint and declare Jehu king, and to do it in the name of God, and by his authority and order. The prophet gave him some other things in charge also, and commanded him to be as expeditious as he could, and without making any person privy to his journey. When he came to the town, he found Jehu sitting with the head officers of the army, as was foretold him by Elisha; so he went up to him, and gave him to understand, that he desir'd to have a short conference with him in private. Jehu rose up presently, and the messenger follow'd him into his apartment. So the young man took out the oil, and poured it on his head; telling him, that God had chosen him king for the destruction of the house of Ahab, and to revenge the blood of the prophets, which against all right and reason was spilt by Jezabel; and that as Jeroboam the son of Nebat, and after him the family of Baasha, were utterly rooted out, and destroy'd for their wickedness; so there should be no remainder left of the wicked stock of Ahab. So soon as he had spoken these words, he convey'd himself out of the apartment in haste, and with all imaginable privacy, that no body should see him; Jehu returning forthwith to his place among the commanders. The officers had a great mind to know what that young man's business was; for he look'd, they said, as if he were not right in his wits. Why you are not much out in your conjecture, says Jehu, for he did speak effectually the words of a mad man. This suspension did but make the officers more and more inquisitive what it was he came about; so Jehu told them in plain terms, that he came to him with a message from God to pronounce him king. At the hearing of these words, the commanders took every man his cloak, and laid them one upon another for Jehu to sit down upon, instead of a throne; and when he had taken his place, they all saluted him king, with acclamations, benedictions, and the sound of horns and trumpets, to congratulate his accession to the throne. Jehoram was now under the surgeon's hands at Jezreel for the wound he had received at the siege of Ramoth; and his sister's son Ahaziah was there at the same time too, to visit him as he lay sick of his wounds; so that Jehu took this opportunity of marching with his army to Jezreel, where he might surprize them both at once; precautioning his soldiers, as a proof of their fidelity to him, neither directly nor indirectly to give Jehoram any knowledge or intimation of the matter.

CHAP. V.

THE soldiers executed their orders with great cheerfulness, possessing themselves of all the passes and avenues to the town, and keeping so strict a guard upon them, that it was morally impossible to convey any intelligence into the place without discovery. While this was a doing, Jehu mounts his chariot, and with a party of choice men advances in all haste toward the city. The king had a scout abroad to observe what people passed that way, and his scout finding Jehu at the head of the troops, posted away immediately to Jehoram, with the tidings of a body of horse upon their march. The king upon this dispatch'd away an horseman out of hand, with instructions to go up towards the party, and learn who they were. The messenger went, and did according to his instructions, inquiring also into the state of the army; for the king, he said, had a mind to know. Do not you trouble your head, says Jehu, with the business of the army, but fall off into the rear, and march along with them. The man did so, and the scout presently gave the king notice of it, that his messenger had join'd the troops. Jehoram, upon this, sent once again yet with the same instructions, and with the very same success; when receiving no satisfaction upon the main, he took his chariot himself, and Ahaziah the king of Judah along with with him, (who, as I before obſerved, being his kinſman, was come there to viſit him; ſo they went out together to meet Jehu, who moved very leiſurely, and coming into the field of Naboth, Jehoram asked Jehu how matters went in his army; the other anſwering with a bitter reflection upon the whoredoms and witchcraft of his mother. This gave Jehoram to miſtruſt, that that was no place for him to ſtay in: ſo he told Ahaziah that he was betray'd; and as he was driving away to make his eſcape, Jehu ſhot him thro' the heart with an arrow, ſo that he dropp'd from his chariot, and ſoon after commanded Bidkar, the captain of a third part of the army, to take the carcaſs, and caſt it out into the field of Naboth, calling to mind what the prophet Elijah had formerly ſaid to his father Ahab; to wit, that he and his family were to periſh in that place; which he himſelf had heard as he was ſitting in a chariot behind Ahab; and every thing fell out accordingly. Upon the death of Jehoram, Ahaziah apprehending his own life alſo to be in danger, turn'd off his chariot into a by-way, where he thought Jehu would not find him; but following him however to a certain bank, he wounded him with an arrow, which made him preſently leave his chariot, and take horſe to ſave himſelf by flight. He got off to the city of Megiddo, where he lay a while for his cure, and not long after dy'd of his wound; from whence he was carried to Jeruſalem, and there bury'd, after he had reign'd one year, and a wickeder man by much than his father.

Jehu orders Jezabel to be put to death; with Ahab's ſeventy ſons, and all his relations; forty two perſons of the blood of Ahaziah, and all the prieſts of the Tyrian Baal: The temple alſo to be deſtroyed, which Ahab erected to the honour of that idol.

AS Jehu came into Jezreel, Jezabel planted herſelf in a turret-window, ſet out gloriouſly with dreſs and ornament, to ſee his entry. As he was paſſing by, ſhe let fall this ironical ſcoff upon him: "a hopeful ſervant, "(ſays ſhe) to kill his own maſter!" Jehu, both ſeeing the woman, and hearing the words, call'd out to her to know what ſhe was, and bad her come down; but not coming immediately, he commanded the eunuchs that were then about her to caſt her down headlong; which they did, and the walls were blobdy with the daſhing of the body in the fall. When ſhe came to the ground, the horſemen rode over the carcaſs, and trampled her to death. After this, Jehu and his friends marched forward to the palace to refreſh themſelves. When they had been there a while, Jehu order'd Jezabel's ſervants, out of reſpect to her quality, to ſee their miſtreſs bury'd; for, ſays he, ſhe was a king's daughter: But when they came to look for the body, there was nothing to be found but a piece of the skull, the palms of her hands, and the ſoles of her feet; the dogs having eaten up all the reſt. This providence gave Jehu more and more veneration ſtill for the divine ſpirit of Elijah, who had foretold, "that dogs ſhould eat the fleſh of "Jezabel in the field of Jezreel."

AHAB had ſeventy ſons, and all at this time in Samaria, where they were brought up: So Jehu wrote thither two letters, one to their governors, and the other to the magiſtrates of the place, wherein he gave to underſtand, that being well provided of horſes, men, arms, chariots, and other neceſſaries for war, beſide fortify'd towns and ſtrong holds, they ſhould do well to make choice of one of the fineſt, and the braveſt young men they could pick out of the whole race of Ahab, for their king, under whoſe conduct they might revenge the death of their lord and maſter. He writ to them in this ſtile, only to feel their pulſe, and to try how they ſtood affected to his intereſt. The perſons to whom theſe letters were addreſs'd, read them over and over with great care and conſideration; and agreeing upon the main, that it would not be ſafe, under their circumſtances, to oppoſe a power that had already been too hard for two great kings, the anſwer they reſolv'd upon was only in the way of a politick and civil excuſe, to let him know that they neither did nor would own any other lord and maſter than himſelf, and that they were to all purpoſes at his devotion. Jehu wrote them word back again that if they favour'd his intereſt, they ſhould forthwith ſend him the heads of all Ahab's ſons, as a token and teſtimony of their readineſs to ſerve him. The magiſtrates and the young mens tutors confer'd together about it; and without any ſcruple of tenderneſs or compaſſion, agreed among themſelves to cut off all their heads, and ſend them in baskets to Jezreel. The king and his friends were together at ſupper when the news was brought him that the heads were come: ſo he order'd them to be laid in two heaps before the gate, on each ſide one; and the next morning going out to view them, addreſſing himſelf to the people, "I had a hand (ſays he) in the death "of my maſter; but whoſe doing is all this?" His buſineſs was to ſatisfy the people that all this rigour upon the houſe of Ahab was not only according to the will of God, but anſwerable to what God himſelf had foretold by the mouth of the prophet. He deſtroy'd as many, in ſhort, of the family of Ahab as he could find, and returned afterward to Samaria. Falling into company upon the way with ſeveral of the kindred of Ahaziah, king of Jeruſalem, he asked them whither they were going? They anſwer'd, that they were going to pay their duty to Jehoram and king Ahaziah, having heard nothing as yet of their death by the hand of Jehu. There were two and forty of them in number, and Jehu cauſed them all to be ſlain. He happen'd afterward to meet with Jonadab, a particular friend of his, and a very good and juſt man; who, after the firſt ſalutation, highly commended him for his zeal in rooting out the race and family of wicked Ahab, according to the command and appointment of God. Jehu then invited him into his chariot, to go along with him to Samaria; telling him that he ſhould now ſee he would ſpare no apoſtates, but put all the falſe prieſts and prophets to the ſword, every man of them, that had ſeduced the people from the religion of their forefathers into the idolatrous worſhip of falſe gods; accounting it a glorious ſpectacle for a good man to ſee the wicked puniſh'd according to their deſerts. ted to the king's pleaſure, and waited upon him in his chariot to the city. Jehu, as ſoon as they came thither, cauſed a ſtrict ſearch to be made for Ahab's relations, and put them all to death as faſt as he found them; and being alſo reſolv'd that none of Ahab's falſe prophets or profane prieſts ſhould eſcape him, he circumvented them all by a ſtratagem. He appointed the people to meet in an aſſembly, telling them that if Ahab ſerved Baal a little, Jehu ſhould ſerve him twice as much, for he would worſhip double the number; and therefore he would have all the prieſts and prophets of Baal to be preſent, to a ſingle man; for he had a great ſacrifice to offer to the God of Ahab, whom they called Baal, and it ſhould be death for any prieſt to abſent himſelf. So he ſent his meſſengers up and down all over Iſrael, to ſummon the prieſts up to Samaria at the appointed day. Upon their arrival they had veſtments given them, which they put on. So Jehu took Jonadab with him into the houſe of Baal, where a ſtrict ſearch was made, that there might not be any perſon there preſent more than the ſervants of Baal; for Jehu would not ſuffer, he ſaid, any profane intruder to intermix in that holy worſhip. When Jehu found that they were all Baalites, and juſt entering upon the ceremony, he had fourſcore men ſet ready at the door, that waited only the word of command to break in upon the apoſtates. Their orders were to put all the falſe prophets to the ſword, and to vindicate the religion of their anceſtors, under this condition and penalty, that whoever ſhould ſpare the life of but any one of them, his life ſhould anſwer for the other's. The word was given, and they executed their commiſſion to the uttermoſt rigour. They ſlew them all to a man, ſet fire to the palace itſelf, and ſo purged the city of all its ſacrilegious abominations. This Baal was the Syrians idol, to whom Ahab dedicated an altar, in Samaria, for the ſake of Ithobal his father-in-law, king of Tyre and Sidon, and aſſign'd them prieſts and prophets, and other neceſſaries appertaining to their religion. Now Jehu aboliſh'd the rites and ceremonies of this worſhip, but permitted the Iſraelites to go on ſtill in the adoration of their golden calves. This ſeverity of his againſt that impious generation was ſo far pleaſing to him, that he ſignify'd to him by his prophet that his poſterity ſhould ſit upon the throne of Iſrael to the fourth generation.

CHAP. VII.

Athaliah meditates a revenge upon the houſe of David, for that of Ahab. Jehoiada the high-prieſt ſaves Joaſh, the ſon of Ahaziah king of Judah; ſets him upon the throne, and cauſes Athaliah to be put to death.

Athaliah propoſes to avenge herſelf upon the family of David, for the havock made in the family of her father Ahab, 2 Kings xi. 1, 2, 3.

WHEN Athaliah, the daughter of Ahab king of Iſrael, and the widow of Jeboram king of Judah, came to underſtand what havock Jehu had made in her father's wicked family, king Jehoram her brother aſſaſſinated, her ſon Ahaziah dead of his wound, and the whole ſtock upon the point of being utterly rooted out, ſhe form'd a reſolution of going the ſame way to work with the houſe of David, and not to leave ſo much as one man alive of the family, to pretend afterward to the kingdom of Judah. This was her determination, and it was none of her fault that it was not executed: For of all the ſons of Ahaziah, there was only one that eſcap'd; and the manner of his deliverance was this: Jehoſhabeth, the ſiſter of Ahaziah, and the wife of Jehoiada the high-prieſt, coming into the palace, ſhe found a male child of about a year old, whoſe name was Joaſh, among the dead bodies of the ſons of Ahaziah, which the nurſe it ſeems had hid there. She convey'd it away by ſtealth to her own lodgings, and ſo into the temple, where ſhe conceal'd and took care of it, through the whole ſix years of Athaliah's reign over Jeruſalem and the two tribes, and no one of her council all this while was privy to the ſecret but her own husband.

All Ahaziah's ſons put to death, but Joaſh, and how he came to eſcape, ib.

IN the ſeventh year Jehoiada enter'd into an aſſociation with five captains, to force the government out of Athaliah's hand, and tranſfer it to the right heir; ſhewing them the child that was then preſent: So that their buſineſs was now only to interchange an oath of faith and ſecrecy, and ſo apply themſelves to the execution of the deſign; which they did immediately, and not without great hope and confidence of ſucceſs. The captains that Jehoiada had engaged in this enterprize, travell'd all over the country, with ſummons to the prieſts and Levites, and ſeveral of the principal men in their tribes, in the high-prieſt's name to go up to Jeruſalem; where Jehoiada told them, that they were now call'd up for advice, about the common good of the publick; and that he would lay the whole matter before them; but it muſt be kept private however; beſide that the caſe requir'd not only ſecrecy, but help. Upon this he gave them their oath of ſecrecy, and then told them the whole ſtory without any further ſcruple, ſhewing them the child likewiſe that he had taken into his care and preſerv'd. "This "child, (ſays he) is your king, and a branch "of that family, which God hath both pro-"miſed and foretold (as you know very well) "ſhall never be wanting to ſupply the throne "of David. Now it is my advice, that you "divide yourſelves into three bodies; one "third to be upon the guard of the king in "the temple; a ſecond third to ſecure the "paſſes and avenues that lead to it, and the "remainder to guard the open gate that leads "to the palace. As for thoſe that have no arms, "let them be in the temple, if they think fit; "but no armed man to be admitted there, if "he be not a prieſt." Jehoiada gave order alſo for a ſelect number of prieſts and Levites to ſtand with their ſwords drawn, as a guard about the king's perſon, and to kill any man whatſoever, that ſhould preſs into the temple with a weapon about him; and to ſecure the life and ſafety of the king, at what rate ſoever. They were all pleas'd with the advice and contrivance of the high-prieſt. So that the next thing to be done, was the putting the project in execution. Jehoiada, upon this, open'd a magazine of armour that David had long ſince ſtor'd up in the temple, delivering out lances, arrows, and what other military weapons were there depoſited, to the centurions, prieſts, and Levites; who planted themſelves themſelves as a guard upon the temple quite round it; and ſo ſtrictly beſet the doors, that not a perſon was let in that had no buſineſs there. The child was now produc'd with a royal crown upon his head, and being anointed with holy oil according to form, the high-prieſt pronounced him king; which ſolemnity was accompanied with innumerable acclamations, and wiſhes of happy life, and victory over all his enemies, by the univerſality of the people.

Joaſh is produced, crowned, anointed, and pronounced king, with an univerſal joy and acclamation, 2 Kings xi. 12.

THE clamour of this outcry and proclamation was a terrible ſurprize to Athaliah, who preſently haſted away with her guards, from the palace to the temple, where ſhe herſelf was admitted by the prieſt, but the ſoldiers that follow'd her were kept out by the guards that were poſted there by Jehoida for that very purpoſe. So ſoon as Athaliah ſaw the child upon the throne, and with a royal crown upon his head, ſhe tore her garments, and call'd out with a loud voice to kill that traiterous uſurper. Jehoida, on the other ſide, commands the officers to ſeize that woman, and carry her away to the brook of Kidron, and there to put her to death; but the temple was not to be polluted with the blood of a ſorcereſs. Order was likewiſe given, that if any man ſhould attempt a reſcue, they ſhould put him to death. They that had the charge of this commiſſion, carried her out of the gate by the paſſage of the king's mules, and there diſpatch'd her. So ſoon as this plot againſt Athaliah had taken effect, Jehoida call'd all the people and ſoldiers together, into the temple, and gave them an oath of allegiance and fidelity to the king, for the ſafety and defence of his perſon, and the honour and preſervation of his government. After this, the king himſelf took an oath of a religious reverence to God, and for the obſervance of thoſe laws that Moſes received from heaven, and tranſmitted to the people. In the next place the people haſted in great numbers to the houſe of Baal, a temple that Athaliah, together with her husband Jehoram, had erected, in contempt of the true God, and to curry favour with Ahab. This temple the multitude deſtroy'd from the very foundations, and kill'd Mattan, one of Baal's prieſts, who was then in waiting. But for the care of the holy temple, that was committed to the charge of the prieſts and Levites, according to the inſtitution of David, Jehoida appointing two ſolemn ſacrifices to be offer'd up every day, with incenſe, according to the direction of the law; appointing porters alſo out of the number of the Levites, for the keeping of the temple, that there might not any pollution get into it by ſtealth. When all things were thus diſpoſed of, Joaſh was conducted out of the temple into the palace, by the captains, the governors, and all the people, where being placed a ſecond time upon the throne, and received with repeated acclamations, the people gave themſelves up for ſome days to mirth and feaſting, and not a ſoul of them but was ſatisfied with the death of that wicked woman. Joaſh was ſeven years of age when he began to reign. His mother's name was Zibia, of Beerſheba. He was a moſt ſtrict obſerver of the laws and religion of his country, ſo long as Jehoida liv'd. When he came afterwards to years of maturity, he married two wives, with the approbation of the high-prieſt, and had children by them of both ſexes. Let this ſuffice for the hiſtory of Joaſh, how he eſcaped the ſnares of Athaliah, and afterward ſucceeded to the government.

HAZAEL, the king of Syria, made a bloody war upon the Iſraelites and their king, laying waſte a great tract of land to the eaſtward beyond Jordan, particularly in the tribes of Reuben, Gad, and Manaſſes, and ſo in Gilead and Batanea; not only burning and pillaging, but putting man, woman, and child to the ſword alſo, wherever he came, without either mercy or quarter; and all this was done with little or no difficulty or oppoſition from Jehu neither, being a man that ſpent his whole time in a ſtupid contempt of God's religion and holy laws. He died, having reigned ſeven and twenty years over Iſrael, and was buried at Samaria, Jehoaſh his ſon ſucceeding him.

Hazael makes a ſharp war upon the Iſraelites, 2 Kings x. 32, 33.

IN the days of Jehoram and Athaliah, and of their ſons, the temple was gone quite to ruin for want of care and repairing; ſo that Joaſh the king of Jeruſalem ſent for Jehoiada the high-prieſt, to give him orders about it; which was, that he ſhould ſend prieſts and Levites into all the quarters of his dominions, to charge every man at * half a ſilver ſhekel a head, toward repairing the breaches and decays of the temple. But notwithſtanding this command, there was nothing done toward it at preſent; for Jehoiada very well knew, that the people would not at that time be overforward to lay out money to ſuch a uſe. But Joaſh afterward, in the three and twentieth year of his reign, finding the project of ſo good and needful a work to be totally forgotten and laid aſide, he charged the high-prieſt and the Levites with the care of it once again; and not without blaming them, in ſome degree, for the former neglect of their duty. This put Jehoiada upon bethinking himſelf how the buſineſs might be brought about without any grievance to the people; and in the end he fix'd upon this expedient. There was a wooden cheſt provided, cloſe wrought and lock'd, with a ſlit through the cover of it, to receive what pieces of money ſoever ſhould be put into it. This was to be placed near the altar, and the people invited to ſhew their good-will upon this occaſion toward the work in hand, in proportion to the zeal they had to the true religion and God's ſervice. The whole multitude was ſo well pleaſed with this method and contrivance, that they brought in gold and ſilver in a kind of emulation who ſhould contribute moſt. The

Upon this abominable apoſtaſy, both of the king and of his miniſters, God ſent prophets to them to expoſtulate and reaſon the matter with them, and to convince them of their wickedneſs; but they were ſo reprobated and harden'd in their iniquity, that neither the example of their forefathers, and their families, that had been cut off and rooted out, for the ſame contempt, nor the threatenings of the prophets, wrought any thing upon them; but the king cauſed Zachariah, the ſon of the high-prieſt Jehoiada, to be ſton'd to death in the very temple, without any regard to the merits and good counſels of his father. And what was his fault, but the exhorting of both king and people to repentance, and to the adminiſtration of equal juſtice; and not without a premonition of the grievous judgments that would befal them, if they perſiſted in their iniquity? Zachariah, with his laſt breath, appealed to God, both as his judge and as his witneſs, "That the crime he died for was only the "giving of good advice, and being the ſon "of a father that had deſerved ſo well from "Joaſh; and that the death he then ſuffer'd "was but the reward of thoſe ſervices." It was not long after this that divine vengeance overtook the king himſelf; for Hazael, the king of Syria, made an inroad into his country, plundered and deſtroy'd Gath, in the firſt place, and from thence marched to Jeruſalem, where the king himſelf had taken ſanctuary. Joaſh was ſo affrighted at the approach of the Syrians army, that he compounded for himſelf and the city, and deliver'd up all the treaſure of the temple, as well what was dedicated to God, as the donatives of particular kings, as a bribe to Hazael, to purchaſe exemption from the danger that then threaten'd him, and ſecurity for the future; which he accepted of, being a prodigious ſum of money, and ſo raiſed the ſiege upon it. Joaſh, after this, fell into a deſperate fit of ſickneſs, and the friends of Zachariah took their revenge upon him by ſurprize, for the murder of the ſon of the high-prieſt. He was buried at Jeruſalem, at the age of forty ſeven years; but a man of ſo exemplary a wickedneſs, that they would not allow him the honour of a ſepulchre among the kings his predeceſſors.

AMAZIAH ſucceeded Joaſh his father in the government of Judah, and in the one and twentieth year of Joaſh, Jehoahaz the ſon of Jehu enter'd upon the government of Iſrael in Samaria, and reigned ſeventeen years; not ſo much after the example of his father, as after that of the worſt of his former predeceſſors, who liv'd in an open defiance of God and all goodneſs. The king of Syria, in the mean time had brought down his mighty power to the miſerable pittance of ten thouſand foot, and five hundred horſe to truſt to, over-running ſeveral of his cities, and killing vaſt numbers of his people. This calamity of the Iſraelites was foretold by Eliſha in his prediction to Hazael, when he told him that he ſhould kill his lord, and poſſeſs himſelf of the government of Syria and Damaſcus. In this unhappy juncture, Jehoahaz had recourſe to God by prayers and ſupplications, for deliverance from the power and oppreſſion of Hazael. Upon which humiliation of his, that gracious God, who not only cheriſhes the innocent, but pardons the penitent, and chuſes rather to correct and to reform the wicked, than to deſtroy them, was prevail'd upon to deliver him from the burden of a ruinous war, by a timely peace, and to reſtore his dominions to their former ſtate of happineſs and plenty.

Hazael makes good all the ill that Eliſha had foretold of him, Ver. 3.

AFTER the death of Jehoahaz, Joaſh his ſon came to the government of Iſrael and Samaria, in the ſeven and thirtieth year of the reign of Joaſh, king of Judah, this king and the king of Jeruſalem being both of a name. He held the government ſixteen years; an excellent man, and intirely the reverſe of his father in his way of life and converſation. The prophet Eliſha was now far gone in years; and being at this time upon his laſt bed of ſickneſs, Joaſh made him a viſit in his extremity, and out of a tenderneſs to ſee the good man labouring in his agonies, burſt out into tears and lamentations; treating him in the ſtile of the father, the defender and protector of his country; for ſo long as he liv'd, the people were ſecure, he ſaid, againſt all their enemies, even without any need of arms, through the benefit and bleſſing of his prayers and predictions; but that whenever he was taken away, they ſhould be left naked and defenceleſs, at the mercy of the Syrians and other enemies; and therefore, for his own part, he had infinitely rather leave the world with him, than ſtay in it without him.

Eliſha falls into his death-ſickneſs, and Joaſh makes him a very affectionate viſit, Ver. 14.

THIS compaſſionate ſoftneſs wrought ſo far upon the prophet, that to comfort the king, he call'd for a bow and arrows, laid his hand upon it, and bad him bend it and ſhoot. He ſhot thrice, and then gave over; ſo Eliſha told him, that if he had let fly more ſhafts, he ſhould have ruined and deſtroyed the whole kingdom of the Syrians; but ſince he gave it off at the third ſhot, he muſt content himſelf with three ſeveral victories over them; wherein he ſhould recover the countries they had taken from his father. The king went his way upon theſe words; and the prophet expired ſoon after. He was a man celebrated for his juſtice, and without all diſpute highly in God's favour, as appears by the hiſtory of the wonderful things he did, and the miracles that he wrought in abundance, as the account of them ſtands ſacred upon the records of the Hebrews to this day. They gave him, in fine, a pompous and an honourable interment, anſwerable to the dignity and merit of ſo great a ſaint. It happen'd, after this, that a traveller was kill'd upon the way by thieves, and the body thrown into the prophet's monument; which, upon the bare touch of Eliſha, was immediately reviv'd; ſo that both dead and living, this prophet wrought miracles.

HAZAEL was now dead, and the kingdom of Syria devolved by an hereditary right to his ſon Adad, who was overthrown by Joaſh in three battles; and all that country recover'd to the Iſraelites again, which his father had wreſted from them, according to the prediction of Eliſha. Upon the death of Joaſh, Jeroboam his ſon enter'd upon the government.

CHAP. X.

Amaziah deſeats the Amalekites, Idumeans, and Gabilites. He apoſtatizes. Joaſh overcomes and takes him priſoner. He delivers up Jeruſalem to ſave his life. He is kill'd by his own people, and his ſon Uzziah ſucceeds him.

Amaziah began his adminiſtration in the bringing the murderers of his father to juſtice, Ver. 5.

IN the ſecond year of Joaſh king of Iſrael, Amaziah came to the government of the tribe of Judah, in the city of Jeruſalem. His mother's name was Jehoadan, a native of the place. He had a wonderful reverence for juſtice, even in the tenderneſs of his youth; and began his adminiſtration in revenging the death of his father upon the heads of thoſe perſons who had treacherouſly murder'd him, under a cloak of friendſhip. He brought the aſſaſſins all to publick juſtice, but ſpar'd their children, according to the laws preſcribed by Moſes, who thought it unreaſonable to puniſh the children for the iniquity of the fathers. After this he made a levy in the tribes of Judah and Benjamin, of the choiceſt young men that were to be found, of about twenty years of age, little over or under, and found the number to amount to three hundred thouſand; all which he liſted, and ſet centurions over them. He treated with the king of the Iſraelites for one hundred thouſand auxiliaries, at the rate of an * hundred talents of ſilver for the hire of them, and the money paid down, being fully determin'd to make war upon the Amalekites, the Edomites, and the Gabilites. He was juſt upon the point of marching againſt them, when a man of God adviſed him by all means to diſmiſs the Iſraelites; for they were a wicked generation, and would certainly be deſtroyed, together with thoſe that join'd with them; beſide that he had a ſufficient force of his own, with God's aſſiſtance, to overcome the enemy. The king having already parted with his money, was not a little troubled at the thought of loſing both his pay and his men; but yet upon the prophet's inſtance to reſign himſelf wholly to the will of God, under whoſe protection he ſhould be ſure to want nothing, he diſcharg'd his auxiliaries, with this compliment at the farewel, That he frankly beſtow'd that treaſure upon them as a bounty, which they had received only as a hire. Immediately upon parting with his mercenaries, he advanc'd with his own proper troops againſt the people abovementioned, whom he overcame, and cut off ten thouſand of them in one battle, and carried away ten thouſand more to the top of a great rock, that over-looks Arabia, where they were all thrown down the precipice and deſtroy'd; and ſo Amaziah return'd home again with a great booty. But in the mean time the Iſraelitiſh mercenaries took it ſo heinouſly to be turn'd off after ſo flighting a manner, and without any colour of reaſon for it, that to revenge the affront of that contempt, they made an outrageous inroad into the king's country, laying all waſte as far as Bethſemere; putting three thouſand people to the ſword, and carrying away a great number of their cattle.

He made vaſt levies of his own people, and dealt with the kings of Iſrael for an hundred thouſand mercenaries, but diſmiſs'd the Iſraelites, 2 Chron. xxv. 6.

Amaziah gives the Amalekites a great overthrow, V. 11.

The mercenaries make an outrageous inroad into the king's country, V. 13.

AMAZIAH was ſo puffed up with the conceit of this victory, that he had no longer any veneration for that God who was the author of it, but went over from his worſhip to the idols of the Amalekites. The prophet, upon this, went to the king and told him, that he could not but wonder at his confiding in thoſe powers, that were ſo far from being able to protect their ſervants, that they could not defend themſelves, but were taken priſoners by the Hebrews, and carried away like ſlaves to Jeruſalem, with the reſt of the ſpoil. Theſe words of the prophet highly provok'd the king's wrath, inſomuch, that he bad him at his peril, not to meddle any further in a buſineſs that did not concern him. The prophet's anſwer was, that for the future he would be quiet; but aſſuring him withal, that God would take ſevere vengeance on him for this wicked and idolatrous innovation in religion.

Amaziah, in the pride of his heart, goes over from the true God to idolatry, Ver. 14.

AMAZIAH was ſo tranſported with vanity and inſolence upon his late ſucceſs, that without any regard to the hand of divine providence, he wrote an imperious letter ſome time after to Joaſh, the king of the Iſraelites, commanding him and his people to pay the ſame allegiance to him, which they had formerly render'd to his anceſtors, David and Solomon; or in caſe of their refuſal, to expect a deciſion of the cauſe by the ſword; to which ſummons Joaſh returned this anſwer:

Joaſh anſwers it with the fable of the cypreſs and the thiſtle, Ver. 18.

" things out of your reach. Have a care that " this confidence and pride of yours for the " overthrow of the Amalekites, do not betray " you ſome time or other to the loſs of your " life and kingdom."

THIS anſwer to Amaziah was but ſo much oil to the flame, and made him ten times more furious and implacable than before; God in his juſtice giving him up, as may be reaſonably ſuppoſed, to ſuch a violent impotency of rage and paſſion, as would certainly expoſe him to the ſtroke of divine juſtice for his impiety. In this heat he took the field, and both armies were drawn up in form of battle. But no ſooner were his men advanced within ſight of the enemy, but they were inſtantly ſtruck with ſo judicial a conſternation and terror, that they turned their backs without ſtriking a blow, and flying ſeveral ways, left Amaziah priſoner in the hands of his enemies, who refuſed to give him quarter upon any other terms, than that the citizens of Jeruſalem ſhould ſet open the gates, and receive him and his victorious army into the town; which, betwixt the pinch of neceſſity and the love of life, they were prevail'd upon to do; ſo that Joaſh enter'd the town in his triumphal chariot through a breach of three hundred cubits of wall that he had cauſed to be broken down, with his priſoner Amaziah marching before him; and this was the manner of his making himſelf maſter of the place. He made a ſeizure of all the holy plate and treaſure, and of all the gold and ſilver likewiſe that he could find in the palace, carrying the whole ſpoil away with him; and then diſmiſſing the king, he returned to Samaria: this calamity befel Jeruſalem in the fourteenth year of Amaziah's reign. The people of Jeruſalem, after this, enter'd into a conſpiracy againſt him; ſo that he was forced to fly for ſafety to Lachiſh; but that would not ſerve his turn, for the aſſaſſins follow'd him thither, and there they murder'd him. His body was carried back to Jeruſalem, where it was buried with a royal ſtate: this was the miſerable end he came to, for the neglect of God's worſhip, and his introducing innovations in religion. He died in the one and fiftieth year of his age, and twenty ninth of his reign, leaving his ſon Uzziah the ſucceſſor to his government.

Amaziah takes the field in a rage; but at firſt ſight of the enemy, his men run ſeveral ways without ſtriking a blow, and leave Amaziah priſoner, 2 Chron. xxv. 21-23.

Jeroboam, the ſon of Joaſh, made king in the 15th year of Amaziah, 2 Kings xiv. 16

IN the fifteenth year of the reign of Amaziah, Jeroboam, the ſon of Joaſh, was made king over Iſrael, and kept his court in Samaria, in the palace of his foreſathers, for the whole forty years of his reign. He was a prince impious to the higheſt degree, wholly abandon'd to idolatry; and ſo licentious, that he ſtuck at nothing, though never ſo wicked, that he had a mind to; and the judgments that his profligate courſe of life brought upon the Iſraelites, were almoſt innumerable. It was foretold of him by Jonas the prophet, that he ſhould overcome the Syrians, and enlarge his territories as far as the city Hamath on the north, and the lake Aſphaltites on the ſouth, which were formerly the bounds of the land of Chanaan, according to the allotment of Joſhua the general. Jeroboam was ſo elevated upon this prediction, that he took away from the Syrians all that tract of ground before ſpoken of, and annexed it to his own dominions; and therein made good the prediction of the prophet. Now in regard that I have ſtrictly tied up myſelf to write the hiſtory of the Hebrews with exact truth and good faith, I muſt not paſs over what I find recorded of this matter in holy writ.

The prophet Jonas points at him, V. 25.

and Jeroboam values himſelf wonderfully upon the prediction, Ver. 27, 28.

" THE word of the Lord came unto Jo- " nah, ſaying, Ariſe and go to Nineve, and " there cry aloud to them, that that great " kingdom is to be ſuddenly deſtroy'd; but " Jonah, to avoid the danger of being an au- " thor of ſuch tidings to them, thought it " better to ſlip out of the way, (as if he could " hide himſelf from God,) and ſo went aboard " a veſſel at Joppa, that was bound for Tar- " ſhiſh in Cilicia. While they were upon the " way, there aroſe a violent tempeſt, that put " the maſter, the mariners, and the pilot him- " ſelf, all to their wits end for fear of being " ſwallowed up. But it was obſerved, that " while the crew were at their prayers, and " labouring to keep the ſhip above water, Jo- " nah was the only man that made no buſtle, " but lay flat upon his face in the hold, with " his head cover'd, without doing as other " people did. The wind ſtill blew harder " and harder; and the ſtorm encreaſing, the " company took up a conceit, that this cala- " mity had befallen them for the wickedneſs " of ſome other of the people that they had " aboard; and ſo they agreed among them- " ſelves to put it to the lot, who might be the " man. They did ſo, and the lot fell upon " the prophet. This put the crew upon en- " quiring what he was, and what might be " his buſineſs. He told them that he was an " Hebrew, and a prophet to the great God; " but I am the man, ſays he, that has rais'd " the ſtorm, and you have no way left you to " ſave yourſelves and the veſſel, but by caſt- " ing me over board. They look'd upon it " at firſt to be ſo barbarous and inhuman an " impiety, to deliver up a ſtranger, and one " that had put his life into their hands, to ſo " certain and inevitable a deſtruction, that for " a while they durſt not reſolve upon it; but " in the end, partly by the extreme neceſſity " of the caſe, (for the ſhip was upon the very " point of ſinking,) partly by the authority " of the prophet, and partly by their own " fear, they were prevail'd upon, and threw " him into the ſea; in which inſtant the ſtorm " ceas'd. This is what we find reported of him in the records of holy scripture.

Jeroboam's reign, 2 Kings xiv. 23, &c. Zachariah his son succeeds him, Ver. 29. Uzziah succeeds Amaziah, 2 Chron. xxvi. 1.

BUT to return now to Jeroboam. After a prosperous reign of forty years, he was buried at Samaria; Zachariah his son succeeding him, as, as Uzziah succeeded Amaziah in the fourteenth year of Jeroboam, to the government of the two tribes at Jerusalem. His mother's name was Achia, a native of Jerusalem. He was a man naturally of great courtesy and justice; brave, provident, and industrious; made war upon the Philistines, and took Gath and Jamnia from them by assault, demolishing their walls; and he made another expedition also against the Arabians, who bordered upon Egypt, and built a town near the Red Sea, which he committed to the guard of a strong garrison. After this he subdued the Ammonites, and put them under contribution, reducing the whole country as far as the frontiers of Egypt, under his power; betaking himself in the end, to the care of the city. Where the walls were ruinous or decay'd, whether by age, or by the neglect of former governors, he rebuilt them anew, and repair'd that breach also, which the king of the Israelites had made, when Amaziah was his prisoner, at his triumphant entrance into the city. He erected also several towers of one hundred * and fifty cubits in height, and built castles and several strong forts for the security of the open country, beside a great many aqueducts, cisterns, and basons, for the relief of his herds and cattle, whereof the number was incredible, the country being naturally disposed for pasture. He was himself also a great lover of tillage, planting, gardening, nurseries, and all sorts of husbandry. As to military affairs, he had an army of three hundred and seventy thousand select men, under the command of two thousand brave and experienc'd officers; all well arm'd, with swords, bucklers, brazen corselets, bows, slings, and train'd up to the exercise of arms, and the drawing up of armies, after the most advantageous way of martial discipline. He had several machines and engines also for battery, and casting of stones and darts, beside grappling hooks, and other instruments of war. But his heart was so puffed up with the vanity of these preparations and designs, that the arrogance of his ambition for a transitory and an earthly glory, took him quite off from the thought of blessings everlasting, and from the duties of holiness and religion, in the worship and service of the Almighty; insomuch, that he falter'd in his integrity, after the example of his father, out of an impotency of mind, that was not able to bear up against the tide of a constant course of prosperity and success.

He makes inroads upon the Philistines and Arabians, and brings the Ammonites under contribution, Ver. 6--8.

He rebuilds the walls of Jerusalem, and repairs the breaches, providing for the strength and ornament of the city, Ver. 9.

His militia, and mighty provisions, Ver. 12--15

His vanities and ambition take him off from his piety and zeal for God's worship, Ver. 16.

THE king, upon a solemn festival day, once dress'd himself in a sacerdotal habit, and went into the holy temple to offer up incense to the Lord upon the golden altar; but Azariah the high-priest, with a train of fourscore priests more along with him, rush'd into the temple, to the king, exclaiming against the wickedness of that usurpation, in breaking in upon an office belonging peculiarly to the priests of the race of Aaron, exclusive of all others; so that Azariah bad him immediately to depart, and not provoke the wrath of God with those indignities any longer. The king in a passion bad them be quiet without more ado, upon the peril of their lives; which menace was followed with a terrible earthquake, and the roof of the temple opening with the shock of it, there pass'd a beam of the sun through the cleft that struck directly upon the face of this sacrilegious prince, who in that very moment became a leper; and this prodigy was accompanied with another. There was a place at some small distance westward from the town, that they call'd Eroge; where, by the same earthquake, one half of a great mountain was torn from the other; and after it had rolled over and over, a matter † of four furlongs, it stopt in the conclusion upon the east side of a mountain over against it, having choak'd up the highway, and cover'd the king's gardens all over with rubbish ‡. When the priests found the king to be leprous, and that the Lord had smitten him, they admonish'd him to depart the city, as an unclean person, and not fit for common society. The shame of lying under such a calamity, had by this time in some measure humbled his pride; so that he submitted and obey'd; and when he had liv'd for some time a private life out of the city, Jotham his son taking upon him the administration of the government, his grief brought him at last to his grave, in the sixty eighth year of his age, and in the fifty second of his reign; and his body was laid in his gardens in a monument by itself.

Uzziah becomes a leper, and the priests drive him out of the city, Ver. 20.

Jotham his son governs in the interim of his absence, and after his death succeeds him, Ver. 21.

ZACHARIAH, the king of the Israelites, and the son of Jeroboam: in the seventh month of his reign, was murder'd by the treachery of one of his own domesticks, Shallum by name, the son of Jabesh; who, upon the slaughter of Zachariah, took possession of the government. It was ill got, and he lost it as ill, on the thirtieth day after the seizing of it. Menahem had at that time the command of an army that was at || Thapsa; and upon the news of what had befallen Zachariah, he marched away presently with his troops to Samaria, where he fought and overthrew Shallum, put him to the sword, and afterward by his own authority took all the ensigns of royalty to himself, and exercised sovereign power. With this victorious army he marched to Thapsa; but the citizens shut their gates upon him, and refused to admit him, which put him into such a rage against them, as revolters, that he laid waste the whole country thereabouts, and in ‡ That Uzziah was stricken with a leprosy, we read in 2 Chron. xxvii. 19. but that the fact was accompanied with such dreadful, amazing, and miraculous circumstances as Josephus here relates, we find no where recorded in holy writ. Nor have we any stronger evidence to avouch the truth of the convulsive throws and agonies that nature is hereupon said to have suffer'd, than the word of a priest, in a case that very nearly concern'd the privilege of priesthood; a testimony too weak, I think, to sway the belief of any unbigotted, unprejudiced, and impartial, considerate thinker.

He was threaten'd, after this, with an invaſion by Pul, the king of Aſſyria; but he durſt not run the riſque of a battle, and ſo came to a timely agreement with him, for the compoſition of a * thouſand talents of ſilver, which he raiſed upon the people at fifty ſhekels a head. He died ſoon after, and was buried at Samaria, leaving Pekahiah, the next heir, to ſucceed him; who inherited the inhumanity and ill-nature of his father, as well as the government. But his time was ſhort; for after two years reign, he was cut to pieces, together with ſeveral of his friends, at a publick feaſt, by the treaſonous practice of Pekah, the ſon of Remaliah, one of his tribunes; who withal ſeized upon the government, and reigned a matter of twenty years; leaving it a queſtion at laſt, whether he was more remarkable for his impiety to God, or for his injuſtice towards men?

Jotham, the ſon of Uzziah, reigned in Jeruſalem over the tribe of Judah, his mother a native of that city, and her name Jeruſhah; a prince famous and celebrated for all excellent qualities and virtues; a man exemplary for his reverence to God, for his juſtice to men, and for the care he took of the commonwealth; making it his buſineſs to keep all things in order, and to rectify what he found amiſs. He repair'd the decays of the porches and galleries in the temple; made good the city walls, where they were falling to ruin; erected large and ſtrong towers; brought the Ammonites under the contribution of a † hundred talents a year, ‖ thirty thouſand chomers of wheat, and as many of barley, advancing the kingdom alſo to ſuch a ſtate, that the people were both happy at home, and formidable abroad.

In the reign of this prince, there appear'd a prophet, whoſe name was Nahum; and he foretold the deſtruction of Nineve, and the ſubverſion of the Aſſyrian empire, in manner as follows: "The condition of Nineve, ſays "he, ſhall be like that of a fiſh-pool, in a "violent agitation of the waters before a great "wind. The people ſhall fly away before the "ſtorm, in trouble and confuſion; calling "out one to another, hold, ſtay a little, and "take your gold and your ſilver along with "you, and no body ſhall mind it; for their "lives ſhall be much dearer to them than "their treaſure. They ſhall have deſperate "factions and diviſions among themſelves; "weeping and wailing, with the knocking of "their knees, and death in their faces. What "will become of the habitation of the lions, "and the dams of the lions whelps?" "Nineve, ſays the Lord, I will ſtrike thee out "from off the face of the earth, and put an "end to the outrages of the wild beaſts, that "thou haſt ſent into the world." The prophet's predictions about Nineve were more at large; but the particulars are not neceſſary for my purpoſe, and would appear tedious, perhaps to the reader. Let it ſuffice that the prophecy was fulfilled a hundred and fifteen years after; and ſo I ſhall ſay no more of it.

The death of Jotham. Ahaz ſucceeds him. Rezin and Pekah make war upon him. Ahaz overthrown by Pekah, with a prodigious ſlaughter.

JOTHAM departed this life in the one and fortieth year of his age, and the ſixteenth of his reign; and Ahaz in the courſe of an hereditary right ſucceeded him. He was the moſt impious prince of all that ever ſat upon that throne, both for his apoſtaſy from the laws of his country, and for his idolatry, in imitation of the kings of Iſrael. He built altars in Jeruſalem; ſacrific'd to idols upon them, and his own ſon among the reſt for a burnt-offering, after the manner of the Chanaanites; and a great many other things he did too, equally as bad as this. While Ahaz was in the courſe of theſe wicked extravagancies, Rezin the king of Damaſcus, and Pekah the king of the Iſraelites, being join'd in a league of amity and alliance, marched together, with united forces, up to Jeruſalem, preſſing it hard with repeated aſſaults, and lying a conſiderable time before it; but the place was ſo well fortified and defended, that they were forced to quit it in the concluſion. In the mean while the king of Syria poſſeſs'd himſelf of the city Elath by the Red Sea, put all the inhabitants to the ſword, and introduced a colony of Syrians into their places. He poſſeſs'd himſelf, after this, of ſeveral caſtles and ſtrong holds; did terrible execution upon the Jews, and ſo with a prodigious booty marched his army back again to Damaſcus.

The king of Syria makes terrible havock among the Jews, and returns to Damaſcus, Ver. 6.

When the king of Jeruſalem came to underſtand that the Syrians were gone away, he look'd upon himſelf to be a match for the king of Iſrael, and ſo drew out an army againſt him; but his wickedneſs was ſo great, that God in a juſt indignation gave the victory to his enemy, with the loſs of a hundred and twenty thouſand of his men. In the ſame battle, Zachariah, the general of the Iſraelites, kill'd Amia, the ſon of Ahaz, in a ſingle encounter, and ſlew alſo Azica, the captain of the guards; taking Elkanah, the general of the Jews troops, priſoner; beſide an infinite number of captives of both ſexes, of the Benjamites, that they carried away, and ſo returned with the ſpoil to Samaria. There was at that time a prophet in Samaria, whoſe name was Obel *, who went out of the town to meet the army in their return before the walls, crying out to them with a loud voice, that they were not to look upon this victory as an advantage gain'd by their own virtue and valour, but as a judgment from heaven upon king Ahaz. The prophet therefore told them, they were to blame not to reſt ſatisfied with the proſperous ſucceſs of their undertaking, without making ſlaves of their kindred and relations of the two tribes; adviſing them by all means to ſet them at liberty, and ſend them home again, without offering any indignity to their perſons, upon the peril of falling under God's diſpleaſure, if they refuſed it. The Iſraelites, upon this admonition, call'd a council to deliberate what to do upon this occaſion. The queſtion being put, there ſtood up one Berechiah, a man of great authority in the aſſembly; who, with three more, declared themſelves utterly againſt the bringing any of the priſoners into the town, for fear God's vengeance ſhould fall upon all the reſt. They had enough to anſwer for, in tranſgreſſions already paſt, that the prophet had denounced againſt, without any need of encreaſing the provocation, or the number. The ſoldiers were ſo far wrought upon by this conſideration, that they gave their priſoners leave and liberty to go whither they would, and to take what they would along with them; whereupon the four perſons aforeſaid ſet them free of their bonds, appointed care to be taken of their bodies, furniſh'd them with proviſions for their journey, and ſo diſmiſs'd them ſafe back again; bearing them company themſelves as far as beyond Jericho. And when they had brought them on their way within a little of Jeruſalem, they returned to Samaria.

a great part of the land of the Iſraelites, carrying away vaſt numbers of them priſoners. After the haraſſing of the Syrians at this rate, Ahaz took all the gold and ſilver out of the king's treaſury, and that likewiſe out of the temple, with all the rich donatives and preſents, and carried the whole maſs along with him to Damaſcus; where, according to his agreement, he deliver'd all up to the king of Aſſyria, with acknowledgments for the favour of his relief, and ſo returned back again to Jeruſalem. Now this king had ſo little ſenſe, either of honour or of reaſon, that the mortal enmity betwixt him and the Syrians, did not hinder him yet from worſhipping their gods, and joining in their ceremonies; vainly perſuading himſelf that they would be propitious to his arms, in favour of his impious zeal in a falſe worſhip; and then when he was overcome, on the other hand, his buſineſs was to make friends of the gods of the Aſſyrians; ſo that no ſort of idolatry came amiſs to him, provided he might but keep clear of the reverence he owed to the true God, and to the religion and traditions of his anceſtors. This apoſtaſy was the cauſe that drew down the wrath and vengeance of God upon him. Nay, the contempt and averſion that he had for the honour and ſervice of God, was ſo extravagant, that after he had robb'd and rifled the temple of all that was precious in it, he commanded the very doors to be kept ſhut too, out of pure ſpite to God and goodneſs, and to prevent the celebrating of any act or office of religious worſhip in that holy place. But at laſt, after a conſtant courſe and exerciſe of theſe outrageous impieties, he departed this life at thirty ſix years of age, and in the ſixteenth of his reign, leaving his ſon Hezekiah his ſucceſſor to the government. About this time Pekah king of Iſrael loſt both his government and his life, by the treachery of a court-confident, whoſe name was Hoſea, who enjoy'd the fruit of an impious violence and uſurpation, for the ſpace of nine years. He was one of the worſt of men; and in his life and converſation he ſhewed not the leaſt thought or belief of a God. Salmanezer, the king of the Aſſyrians, led an army againſt him, and being caſt off by God, whom he himſelf had rejected and deſpiſed, he was eaſily overcome, and forc'd to ſubmit to the terms of a tributary.

In the fourth † year of Hoſea's reign, Hezekiah came to be king of Jeruſalem. He was the ſon of Ahaz, by Abi, a native of that city; a perſon endowed with excellent intellectuals, and naturally a lover and practiſer of piety and juſtice; for the firſt thing he did upon his coming to the throne, was to provide for the comfort of his people, in ſettling the main affair of religion and God's worſhip; to which end, he immediately ſummon'd a meeting of the prieſts and Levites, and treated them with a diſcourſe, as it is reported, to this effect: "I ſhall not need to mind you of the "many and the great calamities that have be- "fallen you for the iniquities of my father, "in not rendering to God the honour due to "him, and for the madneſs of your being pre- "vail'd upon to pay a divine adoration to his "idols; wherefore being now taught by wo- "ful experience, how dangerous a thing it is " to prevaricate with the Almighty, it is my " advice, that all paſt miſcarriages may be " forgotten, and that you purify and purge " yourſelves, together with the prieſts and " Levites, from all your former pollutions; " and after that preparation, that you ſet open " the doors of that holy place; and when you " ſhall have reſtor'd it to the ſtate of its ori- " ginal purity and reverence, by conſecrations, " expiatory luſtrations, and ſacrifices in form, " we may then promiſe ourſelves that God will " pardon our impieties, and proſper us in all " our undertakings." The prieſts were ſo elevated and encouraged by this advice of the king's, that they preſently open'd the temple, clear'd it of all prophane impurities and defilements, made ready their holy veſſels, and laid their ſacrifices upon the altar, according to the Jewiſh manner. The king, in the mean time, ſent meſſengers through all his dominions to ſummon the people up to Jeruſalem, to the feaſt of unleavened bread; which had been then a long time intermitted, through the impious neglect of former kings; exhorting and inviting the Iſraelites alſo to forſake the practice of their idolatrous ſuperſtitions, and return to the exerciſe of the true religion, and to the worſhip of the true God; promiſing them that they ſhould have free leave and liberty to come and go, and to celebrate this feſtival in common with his own people. Hezekiah told them, that it was not for his own ſake, but for theirs, that he gave them this invitation; and that they themſelves ſhould find the comfort of it, if they follow'd his counſel. But when the Iſraelites heard of the meſſage, they were ſo far from giving any heed to it, that they had the meſſengers in deriſion, and treated the prophets contemptibly, for the good office of adviſing them to return to their duties, and foretelling them the miſeries that ſhould befal them, without a timely humiliation and repentance. And their outrage did not ſtop here neither; for they took ſeveral of them afterward, and put them to death*. At this rate they went on from one wickedneſs to another, and never gave over, till God in his wrath avenged himſelf upon them for their impiety, by delivering them up into the hands of their enemies, as will be ſeen in its proper place. But there were great numbers yet of the tribes of Manaſſes, Zabulon, and Iſſachar, that had their hearts touch'd with this premonition of the prophets, and who went in great numbers up to Hezekiah at Jeruſalem, to worſhip.

and put ſeveral of the prophets and meſſengers to death.

WHEN the multitude was there gather'd together, the king went up to the temple, together with the princes and the people, where he ſacrificed for himſelf ſeven bulls, ſeven rams, and as many goats; and when he had firſt laid his hands upon the heads of the victims, both the king and the princes left the execution to the prieſts, who cut the throats of the ſacrifices, and burnt them whole, the Levites ſtanding in a ring about them, ſinging divine hymns, and accompanying their voices with muſical inſtruments, in ſuch manner as David had preſcribed to them of old, the reſt of the prieſts joining in the concert. When this was over, the king and the people caſt themſelves proſtrate with their faces upon the ground, and worſhipped the Lord. He ſacrificed after this, ſeventy bullocks, a hundred rams, and two hundred lambs; beſtowing alſo ſix hundred bullocks, and three thouſand other cattle, as a largeſs for the entertainment of the people; and when the prieſts had done their parts according to the cuſtomary method and order, the king himſelf made good cheer, and communicated with the people, joining together in praiſes and thankſgivings.

A donative over and above, 2 Chron. xxx. 24.

THE feaſt of unleavened bread was now coming on, and in the time of their preparations for the feaſt of the paſſover, they offer'd up a courſe of other ſacrifices, for ſeven days ſucceſſively, and the king beſtow'd upon the people, out of his own bounty, two thouſand bulls, and ſeven thouſand of other cattle, over and above their own number; the princes likewiſe, after Hezekiah's example, ſuperadding out of their own liberality, a thouſand bulls, and a thouſand and forty of other beaſts; inſomuch, that from the days of Solomon to this particular time, there was never ſuch a ſolemnity known to be ſo ſplendidly celebrated.

Never ſuch a ſolemnity ſince the days of Solomon, Ver. 26.

So ſoon as this feſtival was over, they made it their next work to purge the whole country, having firſt purified Jeruſalem itſelf from the abomination of their idols. The king then appointed daily ſacrifices, according to the law, to be ſupplied out of his own ſtores, and commanded the people to preſent the prieſts and Levites with their tenths and firſt fruits, that they might not be taken off by any common buſineſs from their attendance upon the altar. By this means they were abundantly furniſhed with all ſorts of fruits and proviſions. The king alſo ordered the building of granaries and ſtore-houſes, for the common uſe and ſervice of themſelves, their wives, and children, to be diſtributed in proportion to their ſhares; ſo that by theſe degrees, the antient diſcipline came in ſome meaſure to be reſtor'd.

A thorough reformation, 2 Chron. xxxi. 1.

MATTERS being thus ſettled, the king made war upon the Philiſtines, and over-ran their country, ſubduing all their cities, from Gath to Gaza, which he added to his own territories. But the king of Aſſyria, in the mean time, ſends a meſſage to him to demand the tribute from him, which was formerly paid him by his father, with a menace, in caſe of refuſal, to take his country from him; but Hezekiah did ſo abſolutely depend upon the goodneſs of God, the conſcience of his own innocence, and the veracity of the prophet Iſaiah, from whom he was ſure to be forewarned of the event of things, that he gave no heed at all to the menaces of the Aſſyrians. And ſo much for the ſtory of this king.

presently marches with his army against Samaria. (This was in the seventh year of the reign of Hosea, and the city standing out against him.) In the third year of the siege, and in the ninth of the present king, he took it by assault, in the seventh year of the reign of Hezekiah king of Jerusalem. The loss of this place was the final ruin of the kingdom of Israel; the people were all transplanted into Media and Persia, and Hosea the king taken with them alive; while the king of Assyria brought others from thence in exchange, as far as Chuthah, a river of Persia, to re-people the land of the Israelites, and so to plant in Samaria, and up and down that country.

Hosea a prisoner, and the people transplanted, 2 Kings xvii. 3--6. and xviii. 9--12.

THIS transportation of the ten tribes from the place of their abode, fell out to be about nine hundred and forty seven years, from the coming of their forefathers out of the land of Egypt, to their taking possession of that land before, by force of arms; eight hundred years from the days of Joshua, and two hundred and forty years, seven months, and seven days after the revolt from Rehoboam, the grandson of David, to Jeroboam, of whom we have spoken heretofore. This was the miserable end of that stiff-necked people, that would neither be subject to laws, nor hearken to the voice and precautions of their prophets, though they foretold them, that their certain destruction was at hand, unless they departed immediately from their evil ways. Now the rise of all these calamities took its date from that seditious revolt from Rehoboam, in advancing a servant over the head of his master; who, in contempt of God, and his holy laws, drew the indignation of Heaven upon the people, by corrupting them into the practice of the same abominations, after his example. But the justice of God came home to him in his own person too in its due season.

The date of the transportation.

The revolt from Rehoboam was the rise of all this mischief.

THE king of Assyria, in fine, ravaged with his army, and domineer'd every where in Syria and Phœnicia. There is mention also made of his name in the history of the Tyrians; for in the reign of Elulæus, as Menander has it in his annals, (that were translated out of the Tyrian language into Greek,) he made war upon Tyre. His words are to this purpose: "This same Elulæus reigned thirty six years; "and upon a revolt of the Gittæans, he sent "a fleet thither, that reduced them to his "obedience; and the king of the Assyrians "sent out an army also against him, and in-"vaded the whole country of Phœnicia; till "upon the conclusion of a peace, he march'd "with his troops back again. Some short "time after this exploit, the cities of Sydon, "Arce, Palæ-Tyrus, and several other towns, "went over from the Tyrians, to the Assy-"rian king; who taking it so heinously to "see the Tyrians the only people that dis-"puted his authority and power, he dispatch'd "a navy against them of sixty sail, and eight "hundred rowers, under the conduct of the "Phœnicians, which the Tyrians encounter'd, "with only twelve vessels; broke the whole "body, and took five hundred of the rowers "prisoners. The success of this encounter "gave them a wonderful reputation for their "skill and ability in naval affairs. The king "of Assyria, upon this affront, returns, and "sets guards along the river, and upon all "springs and aqueducts, to keep the Tyrians "from water. The Tyrians labour'd under "this distress for a matter of five years, when "they were forced to relieve themselves from "pits of their own digging."

See Menander in his annals.

THIS is what we find written of Salmanazer in the chronicles of the Tyrians. Now the new-comers in Samaria are called Chuthites, from a country of Persia of that name, and from the river Chuthah, from whence they had their original. There were five nations of them, and they brought as many of their own country gods along with them, highly provoking the true and the great God to indignation against them, for the worship they paid to these idols; so that they were visited with so * dreadful a plague, that the place was well nigh unpeopled with it; and finding no relief from any human means, they were advised by the oracle to have recourse to the worship of the great God; for their case was desperate and hopeless, without such an application. The people immediately upon this sent for commissioners to attend the king of Assyria with a petition, that he would be pleased to send them some of the priests that were carried away captives with the Israelites. This being granted, and the priests brought, as they desired, they had the law of Moses read, with an explication upon the practice, and the reason of their religion and discipline, which had so wonderful an effect upon them, that they gave themselves wholly up to the study and exercise of it; and soon after this the pestilence ceased. Now the † people of that country retain'd to this day the name of Cuthites, among the Hebrews; but the Greeks call them Samaritans. They are a people unfix'd and changeable in their opinions and inclinations, accommodating themselves to the present time and occasion. So long as the Jews are prosperous, we are all of a blood, they cry, and of the lineage of Joseph; but if they happen to fall under any affliction, or adversity, alas, say they, we have nothing to do with them, they are strangers to us: we came a great way off, they say, into that country, and the like. But of this in its proper place.

Sennackerib enters Judah with a mighty army; conditions with Hezekiah for a ſum of money to withdraw; receives the money, and breaks his articles. He carries the war into Egypt, and leaves the ſiege of Jeruſalem to Rabſhaketh. The prophet Iſaiah promiſes Hezekiah aſſiſtance from Heaven.

Sennacherib makes war upon Hezekiah, 2 King. xviii. 13. He over-runs Judah and besieges Jerusalem, ibid.

IN the fourteenth year of Hezekiah, king of the two tribes, Sennacherib the king of Aſſyria marched againſt him with a powerful and well-appointed army; and having taken all the cities of Judah and Benjamin by aſſault, he was now ready to advance toward Jeruſalem, when an embaſſy came to him with an offer of ſubmiſſion to his power, and of paying him tribute. Sennacherib gave the embaſſadors audience, and reſolved immediately to deſiſt from the war, and to treat upon the king's terms, promiſing with the ſolemnity of an oath, that upon the receipt of * three hundred talents of ſilver, and † thirty of gold, he would depart with his army, without attempting any act of hoſtility againſt him. Hezekiah, upon this aſſurance, emptied all the treaſuries, and ſent him the money, in confidence of the enemy's departure according to his oath, and that he might reign afterward without any difficulty or danger. The Aſſyrian took the money, but broke his word; for he marched himſelf with his troops againſt the Egyptians and Ethiopians, and left Rabſhaketh lieutenant-general, with Tharata and Anacharis, as collegues with him, to carry on the war againſt Jeruſalem. Upon the drawing up of their army, they pitch'd their camp within ſight of the walls of the town; and by a meſſenger ſummon'd Hezekiah out to a parley. Hezekiah was not willing to truſt himſelf, and therefore ſent out three of his particular friends to ſupply his place; that is to ſay, Eliakim, his deputy-governor; Shebnah and Joah, keepers of the records. Upon their coming out of the town, and preſenting themſelves before the officers of the Aſſyrian army, Rabſhaketh, ſtaring them in the face, bad them carry their maſter this meſſage: "That the great king Sennacherib would fain "know what confidence he valued himſelf "upon, that he ſhould dare to make any great "difficulty of owning that great king for his "maſter, and to refuſe entrance to his army "into the city? " condition to cope with the army of my " maſter? Why certainly he muſt be worſe " than mad, to imagine it, and to truſt to a " broken reed that will both deceive him, if " he truſts to it, and run into his hand, and " wound him, if he lays any ſtreſs upon it. " But, ſays Rabſhaketh, you are to inform " your maſter, that this expedition is not at- " tempted without God's holy will and di- " rection, who will as certainly give the king " of Aſſyria victory over Hezekiah and his " ſubjects, as he hath already made him victo- " rious over the Iſraelites." Rabſhaketh deliver'd himſelf in Hebrew, being a language that he was well skill'd in; but Eliakim fearing the effect ſuch a diſcourſe, in a known tongue, might have upon the multitude, deſir'd him rather, if he pleaſed, to ſpeak Syriack. Now Rabſhaketh very well underſtanding what the other was afraid of, raiſed his voice, and continued his diſcourſe ſtill in Hebrew, to this purpoſe: " Pray, ſays Rabſhaketh, let " your people hear, and underſtand the com- " mands of my maſter; for it concerns them " ſo to do, and to render themſelves in ſea- " ſon. It is the buſineſs, I know, both of " yourſelves and of your king, to ſeduce your " people with vain and empty hopes of de- " fending themſelves by force; but if you " have the courage to put it to a hazard, or " any ſort of pretence to beat off this army " from your walls, I am ready to furniſh you " with two thouſand horſe, if you will only " undertake to find riders to them. But, alas! " you have not riders wherewithal to try the " experiment. If it be ſo, why are you then " ſo long a deliberating upon a thing you will " be compell'd to do in the concluſion, eſpe- " cially in a caſe where you are ſafe, if you " do it willingly, and run all the hazards in " the world, if you ſtay to be driven to it up- " on conſtraint; as the weaker muſt of neceſ- " ſity yield at laſt to the ſtronger?"

THIS was all ſpoken in the hearing, as well of the people as of the deputies; and no ſooner brought to the king's ear, but he immediately diveſted himſelf of his royal robes, and put on ſackcloth, after the cuſtom of the country, in token of his humiliation, caſting himſelf proſtrate upon the ground, and imploring the aid and favour of Almighty God, being utterly hopeleſs of any comfort elſewhere. He ſent likewiſe ſome of his particular friends, together with others of the prieſthood, to the prophet Iſaiah, to deſire him that he would intercede with the Lord, by prayers and ſacrifices for the common ſafety, and for the abatement of the pride and power of the enemy, in compaſſion to his people. The prophet complied with the king's requeſt, and ſucceeded ſo far in his mediation, that he was authorized by a divine revelation to bid the king and his friends be of good courage; for the enemy ſhould be overcome without a battle, and abandon his deſign with loſs and diſgrace; that his ſtomach ſhould be brought down, and that the hand of the Almighty ſhould be upon him, to his ruin; that Sennacherib himſelf ſhould miſcarry in his Egyptian expedition, and upon that diſappointment go to his own home again, where he ſhould fall by the ſword.

Hezekiah humbles himſelf in ſackcloth, 2 Kings xix. 1, 2.

The prophet Iſaiah mediates to God for Hezekiah, and obtains an aſſurance of victory over his enemies, Ver. 6, 7.

IT happened that at this very juncture of time, Hezekiah received letters from the king of Aſſyria, with inſolent expoſtulations in them, what a fool he was to imagine any poſſibility, under his circumſtances, of maintaining his liberty againſt the power of a prince who had already ſubjected ſo many warlike nations to his obedience, concluding with a menace, of putting man, woman, and child to the ſword, if they did not, without delay, and of their own accord, ſet open their city gates, and give a free entrance to his army. Hezekiah did ſo abſolutely depend upon the truth and power of God, that he laid no ſtreſs at all upon this inſolent letter, but folded it up again, and laid it in the temple, betaking himſelf ſtill to repeated prayers and ſupplications, for the ſafety of the city, till Iſaiah returned with this anſwer: " That his petition was heard, " and that the danger was over, for any harm " the Aſſyrians ſhould do them upon that un- " dertaking. He told them likewiſe, that " there were happier times at hand, wherein " they ſhould live in peace and ſecurity upon " their own lands and poſſeſſions, without fear " of an enemy." In proceſs of time the king of Aſſyria finding all his attempts to be fruſtrated, and nothing to ſucceed with him, he withdrew his army, and went back again upon this occaſion. He had ſpent a great deal of time before Peluſium; and at laſt when he had brought up his platforms within a little of the top of the walls, and was upon the very point almoſt of giving the aſſault, news was brought him, that * Tharſices, king of Ethiopia, was upon his march, and approaching with a great enforcement to aſſiſt the Egyptians; and that he took his way through the deſart, with a deſign to fall upon the Aſſyrians by ſurprize. Sennacherib was ſo alarm'd at this report, that he immediately drew off his army. † Herodotus calls this war of Sennacherib's againſt the king of Egypt, a war againſt the prieſt of Vulcan, as being both a king, and a prieſt of that falſe God. " Now " this was the reaſon, ſays he, of Sennache- " rib's raiſing the ſiege of Peluſium. The " king of Egypt, upon this occaſion, call'd " to his God for help; which being granted " him, was fatal to the Arabian, by a miſtake, " writing Arabian for Aſſyrian. And, ſays " he, in one night there came ſuch troops of " rats into the camp of the Aſſyrians, that " they gnaw'd all their bow-ſtrings to pieces, " and made uſeleſs ſeveral other pieces of their " arms, even to the diſarming of the Aſſy- " rians, who, upon this diſappointment, drew " off from the town." Now Beroſus, a Chaldee hiſtorian, ſpeaks of this king Sennacherib, and how he reigned over the Aſſyrians, and made war upon all Aſia and Egypt. ‡ His words are to this following effect.

Sennacherib beſieges Jeruſalem. One hundred eighty five thouſand of his men cut off by a judicial plague the firſt night. He quits the ſiege, and goes home again, where he is murder'd by two of his ſons, in the temple of his idol.

A dreadful plague, 2 Kings xix. 35.

*SENNACHERIB, at his return from the Egyptian war, found his army that he had left under the command of Rabſhaketh almoſt quite deſtroy'd by a judicial peſtilence, which ſwept away, in general officers, tribunes, and common ſoldiers, to the number of one hundred eighty five thouſand men, the firſt night they ſat down before the city. This dreadful mortality put Sennacherib in ſuch a fright, partly as it was a ſtroke of divine vengeance, and partly for fear of the reſt of his army, that he made all poſſible haſte back again, by great marches, to his palace at Nineve; where, after a while, he was cut off by his two eldeſt ſons, Adrameleck and † Selennar, in the very temple of Araſcus, which was his darling idol. The people of the country, deteſting the inhumanity of the action, baniſhed them out of their dominions, whereupon they fled into Armenia, || Aſſarachod, the third ſon, ſucceeding to the government: and thus ended this expedition.

Hezekiah falls ſick, and has fifteen years added to his life. A league betwixt him and Balad the king of Babylon; whereupon the prophet Iſaiah foretels the Iſraelites captivity in Babylon, and the calamities that were to befal Hezekiah and his poſterity. The death of Hezekiah.

HEZEKIAH being now deliver'd beyond all expectation from any farther apprehenſion of trouble or danger, and being likewiſe thoroughly convinced that it was the only and immediate hand of God that wrought his preſervation, as well by the plague that deſtroy'd one part of the Aſſyrian army, as by the terror of that judgment that frighted away the reſt; he, together with the people, offer'd up praiſes and thankſgivings for the mercies receiv'd; and while his thoughts were wholly taken up with the honour and worſhip of God, he was ſeized with ſo dangerous a diſtemper, that his phyſicians, and the reſt of his friends deſpair'd of his life. In this diſtreſs, nothing ſo ſenſibly afflicted the king, as to conſider, that upon his dying without iſſue, the ſucceſſion of the family would be then at an end, and the kingdom left without a legitimate heir. The anxiety of this conſideration lay ſo heavy upon his ſpirits, that he addreſs'd himſelf to God with ſupplications and tears, only for the prolonging of his life till he might have a ſucceſſor out of his own loins, and not to take him out of the number of the living, till he might be the father of a ſon, to keep him alive in his poſterity. God took compaſſion of him, and the rather, becauſe he was not ſo much troubled for the loſs of the advantages of a kingdom, as for the want of an heir of his own body to govern it. Upon this the prophet Iſaiah was ſent to him, with the comfortable aſſurance, that in three days his diſeaſe ſhould leave him, and that he ſhould live fifteen years longer yet, and the kingdom deſcend at laſt to his own ſon and heir. When the prophet had deliver'd this meſſage to the king, according to his order, the diſeaſe was ſo deſperate, and the news ſo ſurprizing, that Hezekiah could not perſuade himſelf into a belief of it, without ſome prodigy of a token from Iſaiah, in confirmation of his authority and commiſſion, and that he was ſent from God upon this errand. Now this is a common courſe, when we meet with difficulties out of the reach of hope and reaſon, to bring about, or to comprehend, to get the truth confirm'd to us by ſome extraordinary evidence. The prophet ask'd what ſign or token would give him ſatisfaction. So he propounded that the ſhadow upon his dial might go ten degrees backward from the place where it then ſtood. The king, finding this miracle wrought, upon the prayers of the prophet, was reſtored preſently to his health, and went immediately up to the temple, where he worſhipped and paid his devotion.

The prophet Iſaiah brings him word that his prayers were heard, Ver. 4--6.

The prophet confirms his aſſurance by a miracle, V. 11.

IT was about this time that the Aſſyrian empire happen'd to be diſſolv'd by the Medes, of which we ſhall ſpeak elſewhere. But Balad, the king of Babylon, having ſent ambaſſadors with preſents to Hezekiah, invited him into a league of amity and alliance. Hezekiah receiv'd them with great courteſy; gave them a royal entertainment, and ſo ſhewed them his treaſure and his armoury, and whatever elſe he had that was magnificent and valuable, either in gold or precious ſtones, and in the end ſent them back again well rewarded to their maſter. Upon this Iſaiah came to him, and ask'd him who thoſe men were, and whence they came? He told the prophet, that they were ſent from the king of Babylon, and that he had ſhewed them all the riches and curioſities of his palace, that they might gather from thence, how great a prince he was, and ſo poſſeſs their king upon better grounds, with the truth of the matter. "Know "then, ſays the prophet to the king, that it "will not be long before this treaſure of yours "ſhall be carried to Babylon; ſeveral of your "poſterity ſhall be unmann'd, and ſerve the "court of Babylon in the quality of eunuchs. "This you will find to be a truth; for God "himſelf hath foretold it." This prediction piereed to the very ſoul of Hezekiah. "Well, "ſays he, though I cannot but be much trou-"bled at the thought of the miſery that at-"tends my family, yet ſince it is God's plea-"ſure that it ſhould be ſo, I have no more to "beg from heaven, than that I may enjoy the "ſmall remainder of my miſerable life in "peace." Beroſus takes notice alſo of this Balad, king of Babylon; but the prophet Iſaiah who was ſo infallibly and miraculouſly inſpir'd in all he ſaid, and ſo certain of the truth of his predictions, committed all his prophecies to writing, and left them to poſterity, for all men to judge of what he foretold, by the event; and this was not his buſineſs alone, but

CHAP. IV.

Manaſſeh, the king of Judah, a wicked prince. The king of Babylon ravages his country, and takes him priſoner; but upon his converſion he is ſet at liberty. His life and death. Amon his ſon ſucceeds him, but is ſoon after cut off; and his ſon Joſiah came next to the throne.

MANASSEH, the ſon of Hezekiah by * Achiba, a native of Jeruſalem, ſucceeded his father in the government, but led a life directly contrary to the practices of his predeceſſor. He left no impiety unattempted, but made choice of all ſorts of abominations that had brought ſo many heavy judgments upon the Iſraelites, for his imitation and example. He was ſo daring a libertine, as to prophane the holy temple itſelf, and conſequently the whole city, and every corner of his dominions, with the tincture of the ſame iniquity and pollution. He began his reign with the contempt of God, and ſo proceeded to a barbarous and bloody perſecution of holy and good men, dipping his hands in the blood of the very prophets themſelves; inſomuch, that hardly a day paſs'd without putting ſome or other of them to death, ſo that the very ſtreets of Jeruſalem ran blood. The cry of theſe impious inhuman outrages called ſo loud to heaven for vengeance, that God was highly incenſed at this audacious courſe of wickedneſs, and ſent ſundry prophets, one after another, both to the king and to the people, with cautions to them to repent in time of their neglect of God's worſhip, and to return to their duty, upon the peril of ſuffering the ſame calamities for the ſame ſins that their brethren the Iſraelites had ſuffer'd before them; but theſe were diſcourſes that they gave no credit too, till in the concluſion they found the menaces follow'd with effects, when it was too late to ſtruggle with thoſe miſeries, which by a ſeaſonable belief and conſideration, might have been eaſily prevented. But upon their perſiſting in this train and habit of wickedneſs, God ſtirr'd up the king of Babylon and Chaldea, to make war upon them; who ſent an army into Judea, that over-ran and deſtroy'd the whole country; ſurpriz'd Manaſſeh, and carried him away in the quality of a priſoner, every hour at mercy. This miſerable prince came now by dear experience to be ſenſible of his fault; and upon that reflection earneſtly beſought God, only ſo far to ſoften the hearts of his enemies, as might move them to treat him with ſome ſort of tenderneſs and humanity. God was not inexorable, but in pity gave ear to his ſupplication; ſo that the king of Babylon, after ſome time, gave Manaſſeh his liberty, and reſtor'd him to his former government. Upon his arrival at Jeruſalem, by the leave and clemency of the conqueror, he did all the good that was poſſible, to atone for his former miſcarriages, even to the utter effacing of them, being now quite another man in his inclination and manners, and wholly intent upon the advancement of religion; for he purged the city, and conſecrated the temple afreſh, making it his whole buſineſs to expreſs his gratitude and reverence toward God, and to preſerve himſelf in the bleſſing of his favour all the days of his life. He took care alſo, both by his example and his authority, to inſtruct the people in their duties, being conſcious to himſelf, that his former male adminiſtration contributed not a little to the misfortunes of the publick. He cauſed an altar to be erected after the preſcription and appointment of Moſes, and offered daily ſacrifices upon it. And when he had reſtor'd religion, and the diſcipline of it, to its original ſtate and purity, he made it his buſineſs to fortify Jeruſalem; repairing the old walls, and encompaſſing them with new ones. He built ſeveral high and ſtrong towers, and furniſhed all the out-works with proviſions of all ſorts. He was, in fine, ſo much alter'd for the better, that from the inſtant of his return to God, to the day of his death, he was look'd upon to be one of the happieſt of princes. He died at ſixty ſeven years of age, in the five and fiftieth of his reign, and was buried in his own gardens. His ſon Amon, which he had by Emalſema of the city of Jabat, ſucceeded him in the government. This prince following the looſe example of his father's youth, and indulging himſelf in the ſame wicked liberties, was quickly call'd to an account for his miſcarriages, by ſome of his familiar friends and domeſticks, who cut him off in the four and twentieth year of his life, and the ſecond of his reign. The people brought the murderers to condign puniſhment, and laid his body in the monument of his father, delivering up the government to his ſon Joſiah, who was at that time a youth of but eight years of age.

Joſiah's zeal for the extirpation of idolatry, and the eſtabliſhment of God's worſhip, after the example of king David.

THE mother of Joſiah was born in Boſcath, her name Jedida, and himſelf of a gracious and an excellent diſpoſition, propoſing the example of David for the rule and model of his whole life. In the twelfth year of his age, he gave an eminent inſtance of an innate piety and juſtice, in the reformation of the people from their erroneous perſuaſions concerning falſe Gods, and in the gaining of them over to reverence for the religion of their country. He repealed ſeveral of the ordinances of his forefathers; corrected whatever he found amiſs, and applied as proper remedies, where the caſe required any ſuch expedient, as the moſt mature and conſummated wiſdom and experience could have ſupplied. Where he found matters well, he kept them ſo, and lived in a conformity to what he approv'd; and all this he did, partly out of an inbred faculty of choice and judgment, and partly upon the admonition and advice of his council; for so long as he kept to the line of the law in the government of the commonwealth, and in the matter of divine worship, he was sure to be right, having so many examples before his eyes, among his apostate predecessors that had been cut off and destroy'd, only for breaking those measures; wherefore he caused all the groves to be cut down that were dedicated to false gods; their altars to be demolished, and all the donatives that had been consecrated by their ancestors to the honour of a false worship, to be taken away, and treated with derision; and this to be done, both in the city, and all over his dominions; by which means the people were drawn from the vanity of their superstitions, to a reverence for an exercise of the true religion, and to the use and custom of burnt-offerings, and other sacrifices upon the altar. He appointed also certain magistrates and commissioners, for the regulation of manners, and the ordering of matters in private cases, that no less care might be taken for the distributing of particular justice, than for the government of life itself. He likewise dispatch'd messengers throughout all his dominions, with orders to receive contributions of gold and silver toward the reparation of the temple, from those that were willing to advance the affair; but leaving all people at liberty, that they might have no cause of complaint. The money being collected and brought in, the care of the management and expence was committed to Amaliah, the governor of the city; Shaphan, the scribe; Joath, the recorder; and Helkiah, the high-priest; with orders immediately to enter upon the work, and to provide artificers, and all materials necessary for the reparation. And by this means was the temple repaired, and a lasting monument erected to posterity, of the king's piety and bounty.

Josiah orders the disposing of the collections, V. 9--13

JOSIAH, in the eighteenth year of his reign, order'd Hilkiah the priest to have the surplusage of the gold and silver that remain'd over and above the charge of the fabrick, to be cast into cups, chalices, goblets, and other vessels, for the use and service of the temple; giving order likewise, that all the gold and silver remaining still in the treasury, should be brought out, and applied to the same purposes. But the high-priest upon removing the gold, happen'd to discover the sacred books of Moses, as they were deposited in the temple, which he took out and gave to Shaphan to peruse; who, upon reading them over, went to the king, and told him, they had executed all his commands; but withal, that they had just now found the books of Moses, which he read over to Josiah. Upon the reading of these books, the king rent his garment, and calling some of his particular friends about him, with the scribe himself, and Hilkiah the high-priest, he sent them to the prophetess Huldah, the wife of Shallum, a man of great eminence and fame, to desire her intercession to God on their behalf, to implore his mercy for him and his people; for it was much to be fear'd that some heavy judgment would befal that people for their ancestors neglect and contempt of the laws of Moses, and lest they should be forced away from their native soil, to live like vagabonds, dispersed over the face of the earth, and end their days in misery, without obtaining such a reconciliation to God. The prophetess upon the hearing of the king's orders and instructions, bad them return him this answer: "That the sentence was already pro- Huldah foretels the destruction of Jerusalem, Ver. 23--25.

Now this unchangeable decree is to convince them by the event, that there is a just and an over-ruling God; and that the predictions which he deliver'd by the mouth of his prophets, are infallibly true, and the certain indications of his holy pleasure to mankind. "But, however,

Josiah sends to consult the prophetess Huldah, V. 22.

JOSIAH, upon the report of this answer from Huldah, sent messengers up and down to all the cities; commanding all the priests and Levites, and men of all ages and conditions, to come up to Jerusalem; and the first thing he did upon the meeting, was to read the holy books of Moses to them; after which, advancing himself upon a place higher than the rest, in the middle of the throng, he gave them an oath of obedience to the laws and precepts of Moses, and the observance of God's holy worship; which was taken by the whole multitude, and not without great alacrity, and an universal consent. This sacred oath was followed with sacrifices and prayers to God, for the grace of his favour and blessing. In the next place he laid a strict charge upon the high-priest to take a particular account of the plate and vessels in the temple, and to cast out so many of them as he should find to have been dedicated by any of his ancestors, to the worship of idols. There were a great many pieces of that kind, that were all reduced to dust, and the powder thrown into the air; all the priests being likewise put to death that were not of the stock of Aaron.

He renews the covenant with God, Ver. 3.

UPON the perfecting of this reformation in Jerusalem, the king took a progress through his whole dominion, where he destroy'd all the relicts of Jeroboam's superstition and idolatry, and burnt the bones of the false prophets upon the very altar that Jeroboam had set up, which we have said something of already, and of the prophet's intervening with a prediction, in the hearing of all the people, at the very time when Jeroboam was offering sacrifice, that one of the race of David, Josiah by name, was to do this, whose prediction had been made good by the event, three hundred sixty one years after the thing was foretold.

AND Josiah's zeal did not rest here neither; for he sent and went himself to several other Israelites that had made shift to escape the servitude and bondage of the Assyrians, to persuade them at last to forsake the superstitious vanities of foreign religions, and to cleave wholly wholly to the worſhip of the great God of their fathers, according to the rites and cuſtoms of their country, and him only to ſerve. And the king reſted not here neither; but he cauſed a ſtrict ſearch to be made in all towns and villages for the diſcovery of any remainders of idolatrous practices, that might lie conceal'd, even to the very figures of the horſes over the porch of the temple, that their forefathers had dedicated to the ſun; and ſo for what other monuments ſoever, to which the ignorance of the common people had ever aſcribed divine honour, Joſiah cauſed them all to be taken away and deſtroy'd.

The celebration of the paſſover at Jeruſalem. 2 Chron. xxxv. 1--19.

AFTER the purging of the whole nation in this manner, he conven'd all the people together to Jeruſalem, to celebrate the feaſt of unleavened bread, otherwiſe call'd the Paſſover, and gave the multitude out of his own ſtore, thirty thouſand young kids and lambs, and three thouſand oxen. The heads of the prieſts contributed likewiſe to the prieſts upon the ſame occaſion, two thouſand ſix hundred lambs: And ſo the chief of the Levites gave to theirtribe five thouſand lambs, and five hundred bullocks: And this prodigious number of victims was offer'd up in ſacrifice according to the laws of Moſes. The prieſts had the conduct of the ſolemnity; and the precedency in their example to the people. Now from the time of Samuel the prophet, to that day, there had never been ſo ſolemn a feſtival; and the reaſon of it was this, that every thing was done according to the direction of the law, and the preſcriptions of ancient cuſtom. Joſiah, after this bleſſed regulation, enjoy'd his government in peace, honour, and plenty: And we are now about to give the reader an account how he came to his end.

Joſiah oppoſes Pharaoh Nechoh in his march againſt the Medes and Babylonians. Ver. 20--24.

PHaraoh-Nechoh, king of Egypt, marched with a powerful army toward Euphrates, againſt the Medes and Babylonians, who had ſubverted the Aſſyrian empire, with a deſign to make himſelf maſter of Aſia. When he had advanced as far as Mendes *, a town under the juriſdiction of Joſiah, Joſiah abſolutely refuſed him any paſſage againſt the Medes through his country. Pharaoh upon this, ſent a Herald, to give Joſiah to underſtand, that he had no thought of any hoſtility toward him; nor any deſign, but to make an haſty march of it toward Euphrates; deſiring him withal, not to put him upon any neceſſity of making his way by force, which was a thing much beſide his intention. This meſſage of the Egyptian had ſo little effect upon Joſiah, that he perſiſted in the denial of his paſſage; which look'd as if he had been driven upon this invincible obſtinacy by the impulſe of a fatality that improv'd this denial to his ruin. For as he was in the head of his army, and riding up and down to give orders from one wing to another, an Egyptian, with an arrow, quickly put an end to the eagerneſs he had for that war; for finding himſelf to be ſhot, and impatient of the pain, he commanded his army to retire; himſelf returning to Jeruſalem, where he dy'd of the wound. He was bury'd with a magnificent ſolemnity, in the ſepulchre of his anceſtors, at nine and thirty years of age, and in the one and thirtieth year of his reign; the people mourning for him ſeveral days, with great anxiety of ſorrow and lamentation. The prophet Jeremiah wrote a paſſionate elegy upon this occaſion, which is yet extant at this day; the prophet plainly foretelling the approach of the Babylonian captivity, and the calamities alſo of our times; committing his predictions to writing for the information of poſterity. And Jeremiah was not the only prophet neither, that foretold the miſeries of this terrible revolution; but Ezekiel alſo left behind him in writing two books of prophetical preſages upon this ſubject. Theſe two prophets were both of the ſacerdotal race: Jeremiah living at Jeruſalem from the thirteenth year of the reign of Joſiah, to the time of the deſtruction of the temple and City: of which we ſhall ſpeak farther in its proper place.

CHAP. VII.

Nebuchadnezzar defeats Pharaoh, and makes Jehoiakim his tributary; who is foretold, by the prophet Jeremiah, the miseries that are to befal him.

IN the fourth year of Jehoiakim's reign, †Nebuchadnezzar the king of Babylon advanced with a mighty army to Carchabesa, a city situate upon the Euphrates; with a resolution to make war upon Pharaoh ‖Nechoh, who at that time had all Syria under his command. Now the Egyptian very well understanding that the Babylonian was no contemptible enemy, took the field with a strong and a numerous army, and so march'd to the Euphrates, with a resolution to oppose him: where the two armies engaging, the Egyptian was forc'd to retire with the loss of many thousands of his men. But the Babylonians getting over the Euphrates, subdu'd the whole country of Syria as far as Pelusium, Judea only excepted. In the fourth year afterward of Nebuchadnezzar, and the eighth of Jehoiakim, the Babylonians broke in furiously upon Judea, threatning them with all extremities, unless they would content themselves with the condition of tributaries, as the rest of the inhabitants of Syria were. Upon this menace, Jehoiakim's heart fail'd him, so that he submitted to purchase his peace with a sum of money; and for the space of full three years, he made due payment of his contribution: but the year following, upon the credit of an idle rumour, that the Egyptian was advancing an expedition against the king of Babylon, Jehoiakim refused to pay him his tribute any longer; but quickly found himself miserably disappointed in his expectation, for the Egyptians durst not look the Babylonians in the face: which was no more than the prophet Jeremiah had many a time foretold, and warn'd him of; and that he would find the Egyptians a broken reed to trust to. He presaged likewise the fate of Jerusalem, and that it was suddenly to be destroy'd by the Babylonians, and Jehoiakim himself to be made a prisoner. But these were forewarnings which no body laid any stress upon, and so no body was the better for them: nay, on the contrary, from the highest to the lowest, the generality of the people look'd upon them with contempt. Not but that there were some again that exhibited formal accusations against him to the king, and would have had him punish'd as a mover of sedition. The cause, in fine, was brought before the council; and the majority were for putting him to death; but the reason of things is not always determin'd by a plurality of voices: so that some that were better advis'd than others, were rather for discharging him the court, and diverting the blow; for Jeremiah, they said, was not the only man that had foretold these calamities to the city, but Micah had prophesied to the same purpose before him; and so had several others, without being call'd to account for it by the government: nay, they were rather had in honour and esteem for their predictions, as the prophets of the Lord. By this soft way of reasoning upon the matter, the council was wrought upon to change their minds, and to make void the sentence. The prophet put all his predictions in writing; and upon a day of fasting, when the people were met together in the temple, in the ninth month of the fifth year of the reign of Jehoiakim, he read the book to the congregation; wherein was contained the whole history of what was to befal the temple, the city and the people. The princes, upon the hearing of this book, took it away from the prophet, commanding both himself and his scribe Baruch, to be gone immediately, without letting any body know where to find them. They carry'd the book then to the king, who order'd his secretary to take and read it to him, with his friends about him. The king was so transported upon the hearing of it, that he tore the book, and threw it in the fire, and order'd Jeremiah and Baruch to be immediately brought to him, and punish'd for it: but they were already withdrawn out of the way.

Jehoiakim receives Nebuchadnezzar into Jerusalem. His perfidy and cruelty. He puts Jehoiakim, the father, to death; and Jehoiakin, the son, is made king of Judah in his stead.

IT was not long after this, that Jehoiakim being affrighted with so many dismal predictions, receiv'd the king of Babylon with his army into the city; for as to his own part, he reckon'd himself secure, and so never troubled his head, either for keeping him out, or preparing for a war: but the Babylonian, upon his admittance into the city, broke his conditions, and put the flower of the youth of Jerusalem, together with the king himself, to the sword; commanding his body to be cast into the fields without the walls of the city, and constituting his son Jehoiakin king, both of the city and country, in his father's stead. He carry'd away a matter of three thousand men of note and quality, captives to Babylon; in which number was the prophet Ezekiel, being at that time a youth. This was the end of king Jehoiakin, who lived six and thirty years, and reigned eleven; and his son Jehoiakim succeeded him. His mother's name was Nehushta, of Jerusalem; and the time of his reign was three months and ten days.

to take all opportunities of ſtirring up the people to a rebellion, in order to gratify his revenge. Upon this conſideration he ſent away an army to beſiege Jeruſalem. Now Jehoiakin, being a juſt and an eaſy prince, cou'd not endure to ſee the city run the riſque of being utterly deſtroy'd for his ſake; and therefore upon a treaty with the king's deputies, for the delivering up of the city, upon condition that neither the town itſelf, nor the inhabitants ſhould ſuffer any ſort of damage, the agreement was ratify'd, and his mother and kindred deliver'd up as hoſtages to the king's commiſſioners, for the performance of articles: but before the expiration of the year, the king of Babylon breaking his faith with them, commanded his officers to ſecure all the youth of the city, and all ſorts of artificers, and to bring them to him bound and fetter'd; which they did, to the number of ten thouſand eight hundred thirty two perſons, wherein was Jehoiakin himſelf, his mother and his kindred; who by the king's command were all kept in cuſtody.

Jehoiakin made a priſoner. Nebuchadnezzar ſets up Zedekiah in his place, upon condition, not to ſide with the king of Egypt. Zedekiah falſifies, and Nebuchadnezzar beſieges Jeruſalem. The King of Egypt marches to his relief. Nebuchadnezzar riſes; gives him battle; routs him, and then returns to the ſiege. Zedekiah's obſtinacy againſt all the counſels and predictions of Jeremiah.

JEHOIAKIN being now a priſoner, the king of Babylon advanced Zedekiah, his father's brother, to the government in his place; obliging him by an oath, neither to attempt any innovations in that country, nor directly or indirectly to join with, or aſſiſt the Egyptians. He was one and twenty years of age when he enter'd upon the command; and he and Jehoiakin were brothers by the mother's ſide. He had little or no regard, either for honour, or for virtue; and his companions were altogether as impious and extravagant as himſelf: beſide that this looſeneſs of manners in his days, was become popular; and the corruption epidemical: inſomuch that the prophet Jeremiah was often exhorting him with earneſt entreaties to change his courſe of life, and to betake himſelf to the love and exerciſe of piety and juſtice, without laying ſo much ſtreſs upon what his courtiers, or his falſe prophets told him; a lewd ſort of people, that abus'd him in their promiſes and predictions, when they told him the Babylonians ſhould never beſiege Jeruſalem again; and that whenever they encounter'd, the Egyptians ſhould have the better of them: For this was all falſe he told him, as would appear by the event. Zedekiah could not for the preſent but acknowledge this diſcourſe of the prophet to be reaſonable and true, and that it was for his intereſt ſo to believe it; but when he came afterward to be manag'd by ill company and counſels, who could wind and turn him as they pleaſed, all that the prophet had ſaid before went for nothing.

Flatterers and falſe prophets were the ruin of Zedekiah, Ver. 14.

IT was at the ſame time that Ezekiel, being then at Babylon, foretold the deſtruction of the temple, and ſent the prediction of it to Jeruſalem. Now the two prophets agreed exactly in the taking of the town by force, and in carrying away Zedekiah captive; but the thing, and the only thing that ſtagger'd Zedekiah in the belief of the prophecy, was this: Ezekiel foretold that Zedekiah ſhould not ſee Babylon; and Jeremiah affirmed that the king himſelf ſhould carry him priſoner thither. This ſeeming inconſiſtency, or at leaſt diverſity of expreſſion, gave Zedekiah ſome ſort of colour to doubt the truth of all the other circumſtances wherein they agreed, though the following events made good every thing that had been foretold, as we ſhall ſhew more properly in another place.

Ezekiel agrees with Jeremiah in predicting the downfal of Jeruſalem, and making Zedekiah a priſoner.

A ſeeming contradiction betwixt the two prophets reconcil'd.

AFTER an alliance of eight years ſtanding betwixt the two kings, Zedekiah ſhamefully broke his contract, and went over to the intereſt of the Egyptians; making no doubt at all, but their two powers in conjunction, might be able to cruſh the king of Babylon: but the Babylonian, upon the firſt notice of this treachery, marched his army directly toward Zedekiah; laid his country deſolate, forced his caſtles and ſtrong holds; and ſo advanced ſtrait forward to the attack, even of Jeruſalem itſelf. The Egyptian being given to underſtand with what ſtraits and difficulties his friend and ally Zedekiah was ſurrounded, advanced preſently to his relief, with a reſolution to attempt the raiſing of the ſiege. Now the Babylonian, upon intelligence of his march and deſign, did not think fit to wait his coming, but choſe rather to intermit the proſecution of the ſiege for ſome time, to draw off his army, and give him battle: which he did, and ſo terrible a rout withal, that he beat him quite out of Syria at that one blow. The ſiege being quitted, or rather reſpited upon this occaſion, the falſe prophets ſuggeſted a thouſand deluſions to Zedekiah; as, how fooliſh a thing it was for him, or his ſubjects, to apprehend any danger from the Babylonians, or to fancy any ſuch thing as the Babylonians forcing and tranſporting the Hebrews from their native habitations, and carrying them away captive to Babylon; whereas it was rather to be expected, on the other hand, that their priſoners that were already exported, ſhould be call'd back again; and all the plate and treaſure that the king had carried away, reſtored to the temple. But Jeremiah, on the contrary, told the king quite another ſtory, in a flat contradiction to that of the falſe prophets; poſitively charging them with impoſture and deluſion, and affirming that there was no good to be expected from the Egyptians; but that they ſhould firſt be overcome, and the Babylonian army return back to beſiege Jeruſalem; and that as many of them as ſhould ſurvive the ſword and famine, ſhould be carried away captives, their houſes pillag'd, their goods taken away; the temple and city plunder'd, and laid at the mercy of fire and ſword, without any diſtinction of ſacred or prophane. "We are condemn'd, ſays the pro-

Theſe words of the prophet gain'd credence with the major part of the people; but the leading men, and the licentious, atheiſtical part of the multitude, look'd upon all the prophet ſaid, but as the diſcourſe of a mad man, and treated him accordingly. As Jeremiah was going toward Anathoth, the place of his birth, and a matter of * twenty furlongs from Jeruſalem, he had the fortune to be met withal upon the way, by a certain magiſtrate, who apprehended him, and took him into cuſtody, upon a pretext, that he was a deſerter, and going over to the king of Babylon. The prophet denied the accuſation, and ſaid in his own defence, that he was only going to the place where he was born; but the other would not believe him, and ſo carried him away to the miniſters of ſtate and juſtice; where, after the formality of examination and torture, he was ſet aſide as a malefactor condemn'd to die; and in this condition of miſery, he continued for ſome time.

Some were moved with his diſcourſe, others take him for a mad man.

Jeremiah taken into cuſtody, and charg'd as a deſerter.

Examin'd, tormented, condemn'd, and committed to priſon.

But in the ninth year of Zedekiah's reign, the tenth month, and the tenth day of that month, the king of Babylon came once again with his army to Jeruſalem; and laying ſiege to it, tried all the ways in the world, for a matter of eighteen months together, to maſter it, either by art, or by force; but it ſtill held out, not only againſt a powerful enemy before it, but a raging peſtilence and famine alſo in the bowels of it; Jeremiah being in priſon all this while, and crying out to the multitude to ſet open the gates, and receive the Babylonians into the city; for they had no other way in nature to ſave themſelves, their families, and the town, from a certain and an inevitable ruin; telling them withal, that thoſe who ſtaid in the city muſt expect to periſh, either by the ſword, or by famine; whereas thoſe who fled out to the enemy would ſave their lives; but the princes, in the depth of their extremity, were yet ſo far from giving ear to the prophet's preſage and advice, that they repreſented him to the king, as a violent hot-headed man, and a mutineer; a diſcourager of the people with his idle ſtories of miſery and deſolation; ſuggeſting that the garriſon was hearty and reſolute enough to defend the place to the laſt extremity, did not he with his ill-boding menaces of ſlavery and deſtruction, take off the edge of their zeal and courage. The king in his own nature was not apt to be fierce or bitter; but ſtanding upon that pinch of neceſſity, in ſome awe of the great people about him, he did not think it ſafe to diſoblige ſo many men of power and intereſt; and ſo rather than croſs them, he left them at liberty to do with the prophet as they thought fit. So ſoon as they had gain'd that point, they went in all haſte to the priſon; took out the prophet, and let him down by a rope into a naſty pit, where he was up to the neck in mud, with an intent to choak him. But as he was in this condition, a favourite ſervant of the king's, an Ethiopian born, went and told Zedekiah how they had treated the prophet; and giving his own opinion in the caſe, that his great men and favourites had not done well in the aggravation of his misfortune, by expoſing him to a death, ſo much more grievous than that which he was reaſonably to expect in his chains. Upon this diſcourſe of the ſervant, the king heartily repented his leaving the prophet to the diſcretion of his enemies, and ſo order'd the Ethiopian to take thirty men out of his family, ſuch as he could truſt, with ropes, and whatever he ſhould find neceſſary for the ſaving of him, and to join with them in the getting of him out of the pit with all poſſible expedition. The ſervant did as he was order'd, and ſet the prophet at liberty; who was ſoon after this brought privately to the king, and had this queſtion put to him, whether or no he could procure him from heaven any preſent relief under his miſerable circumſtances? The prophet anſwer'd him, that he could; but that people would neither believe him, nor follow his counſels. " All your pretended friends, ſays he, are my " mortal enemies: they look upon me as a " falſe wretch, and are at this inſtant in a con- " ſpiracy to deſtroy me; and where are thoſe " impoſtors now, that fooled the people into " a belief that they were out of danger of the " Babylonians? ſo that to tell you the very " truth of things, may be as much as my life " is worth." The king, upon this, promiſed the prophet with an oath, that he would neither take away his life himſelf, nor ſuffer any of his people to do it. Jeremiah took his word and honour for it, and adviſed him by all means to deliver up the city into the hands of the king of Babylon. This was the only way in the world, he told him, to be ſafe in his own perſon, to avoid the imminent danger he was in; to prevent the burning of the temple, and the laying of the city level with the ground; and if he purſued any other meaſures, he was to tell him, in the name, and by the direction of God himſelf, that all the calamities that ſhould enſue upon his miſcarriages, with the utter ruin of himſelf, his family, and his people, would be charged to his account. The king then told him, that he had a great inclination to take his counſel for the common good; but he was afraid leſt ſome of his friends that were already gone over to the Babylonians, ſhould accuſe him to the king, and put him in danger of his life. But for any thing of that, the prophet bad him ſet his heart at reſt; for if he deliver'd up the city, neither he himſelf in his perſon, nor his wives, his children, or the temple itſelf, ſhould ſuffer any thing. After theſe words the king diſmiſs'd the prophet, with a charge not to make any words; no, not ſo much as to the princes themſelves, of what had paſs'd in this conference; but if any body ſhould come to have a hint that there had been ſuch a meeting, and enquire into the buſineſs, it might be pretended that the prophet came to move the king for his liberty. IN the mean time the king of Babylon went on vigorouſly with the ſiege; his works were finiſh'd, and his towers carried up ſo high, as to command the town, and to beat the defendants from the walls; and at this rate they were provided quite round the city for a general aſſault: and the defence of the place was carried on with as much bravery as the attack, having plague and famine to contend withal within the town, as well as enemies, and other difficulties without. They ſtood firm, in ſhort, againſt all ſtratagems and machines, oppoſing one inſtance to another, as if the diſpute had been matter of skill and art, as well as force; the beſiegers buſineſs being to take the city, and the ſafety of the beſieged conſiſting in eluding or diverting the plots and endeavours of the enemy. This conteſt laſted eighteen months; but in the end, for want of meat within the town, and of numbers of defendants to maintain it, againſt the numerous multitudes of beſiegers, accompanied with all manner of arms and warlike inſtruments, they were brought to the laſt inevitable neceſſity of delivering it up. It was taken in the eleventh year, and the ninth day of the fourth month of the reign of Zedekiah, by the commanders to whom the care of the ſiege was committed by Nebuchadnezzar, who at that time was at Reblatha. If the reader ſhould be curious to know the names of the officers, there was Nergelear, Aremantus, Emegar, Nabaſaris, and Echarampſaris. The city was taken about midnight. The captains, with the reſt of the ſoldiery, went into the temple; which king Zedekiah perceiving, he took his wives, children, commanders, and friends, and they all together fled away privately by a narrow paſſage toward the deſart. But the Babylonians getting intelligence of this eſcape, by the means of deſerters, they made after them early the next morning, and overtook and ſurrounded them at a place not far from Jericho. Zedekiah's friends and companions, in his flight, ſeeing the enemy advancing toward them, quitted their maſter, and ran ſeveral ways to make the beſt ſhift they could for themſelves; the king being in a manner quite abandon'd, with his wives and children, and a ſmall remainder of his company, fell into the hands of the enemy, who preſently carried them to the king. Nebuchadnezzar no ſooner laid his eyes upon him, but he call'd him all the faithleſs perfidious names that he could think of. "Did not you "promiſe me, ſays he, to manage the power "and authority that I put you in poſſeſſion of, "for my advantage and behoof; and am not "I well requited, do you think, for making "you a king in your brother Jehoiakim's "place, by your employing of the credit and "intereſt that I gave you to the ruin of your "patron and benefactor? But that God is "great and juſt; who, for the puniſhment of "your treachery and ingratitude, hath now "made you my priſoner." When the king had laid upon him this load of reproaches, he immediately cauſed his children and his friends to be put to death before his face, and in the ſight of the reſt of the captives; commanding Zedekiah's eyes to be put out, ſo ſoon as this execution was over, and ſo to be carried away in chains to Babylon. This way of proceeding has verified the two prophecies of * Jeremiah and Ezekiel; which Zedekiah made ſo little account of, by reaſon of ſome ſemblance of a contradiction betwixt them; the former foretelling, that he ſhould be taken captive, and carried to Babylon, ſpeak with the king himſelf, and ſee him face to face; but Ezekiel's prediction was, that he ſhould be carried away to Babylon, and ſhould not ſee him; which he could not do there, when he was brought blind thither.

THIS may ſerve to convince, even the moſt ignorant, of the power and wiſdom of God, and of the conſtancy of his counſels, through all the various ways of his operations; and it may likewiſe ſhew us that God's foreknowledge of things is certain, and his providence regular, in the ordering of events; beſide, that it holds forth a moſt exemplary inſtance to us, of the danger of our giving way to the motions of incredulity and folly, that take from us the means of diſcerning the fatalities that threaten us.

THIS was the end of the race of David, after one and twenty kings in ſucceſſion, in the ſpace of five hundred and fifteen years, ſix months, and ten days, including the twenty years reign of Saul, who was of another tribe.

The race of David was now extinct.

NEBUCHADNEZZAR, after this great victory obtain'd, ſent Nebuzar-Adan, his commander in chief, to Jeruſalem, with orders to pillage the temple, and burn it; to do the like to the palace; and after the laying of the city all level with the ground, to carry away the people captive to Babylon. In the eleventh year of the reign of Zedekiah, Nebuzar-Adan put his inſtructions in execution; taking away out of the temple all the veſſels of gold and ſilver, Solomon's great laver, with the brazen pillars, and their chapiters, with the golden tables and candleſticks; and after this general plunder, he firſt ſet the temple on fire; and after that, he laid the palace and the city in aſhes. This paſs'd on the firſt day of the fifth month; the eleventh of Zedekiah, and the eighteenth year of the reign of Nebuchadnezzar. The temple was burnt four hundred and ſeventy years, ſix months, and ten days from the building of it; one thouſand and ſixty two years, ſix months, and ten days, from the Iſraelites coming out of the land of Egypt; one thouſand nine hundred fifty years, ſix months, and ten days from the deluge, and three thouſand five hundred and thirteen years, ſix months, and ten days from the creation of the world. Upon Nebuzar-Adan's priſoners, Jer. lii. 24, 25.

UPON the deſtruction of Jeruſalem, and the tranſportation of the people, Nebuzar-Adan took the following perſons priſoners with him. There was the high-prieſt Seraiah, and after him Sepheniah, who was the next prieſt in dignity; three head-keepers of the temple; the firſt eunuch of the bed-chamber, with ſeven of the king's friends, beſide the king's ſecretary, and other men of note, to the number of ſixty; which were brought altogether to the king, who was then at Reblathis, a city of Syria. The king cauſed the heads of the high-prieſt, and the great men, to be ſtruck off in that city; but the multitude of the priſoners, together with Zedekiah himſelf, he order'd to be bound, and carried captive to Babylon, together with Jehozadack, the high-prieſt, to be taken and bound along with them; which Jehozadack was the ſon of Seraiah, who was put to death at Reblathis, as is ſaid already.

Some of them put to death, Ver. 27, 28. Others kept in chains.

HAVING now gone through the royal line, and the ſucceſſion of them from father to ſon, in order, it will be convenient to obſerve the ſame method with the high-prieſts, who from time to time, in a continued ſucceſſion under thoſe kings, exerciſed the ſacerdotal office. The firſt Pontifex after the building of Solomon's temple was Zadok. After him came his ſon Ahimaaz; and after Ahimaaz, Azariah; and ſo forward; Joram, * Iſus, Axioramus, Phideas, Sudeas, † Julus, Jotham, Urias, Nerias, Odeas, Saldumus, Elcias, Sareas, and Jehoſadoc, who was carried away to Babylon. All theſe handed down the pontificate in a continued ſucceſſion in their families from generation to generation.

The ſucceſſion of the high-prieſts in Jeruſalem.

UPON the king's return to Babylon, Zedekiah was committed to priſon; and in the priſon he died, and had afterward the honour of a royal ſepulchre. The holy veſſels the king took out of the temple, he dedicated to his idols; allotted habitations to the people in Babylon, and ſet Jehozadack at liberty. Now Nebuzar-Adan, the general that brought away the people priſoners, left the poorer ſort of people, and the deſerters, under the command of Gedaliah, the ſon of Ahikam, an eminent perſon, both for generoſity and juſtice, who allotted his priſoners ſuch a proportion of ground to improve and live upon, paying ſuch a certain tribute to the king. The prophet Jeremiah was alſo diſcharg'd of his impriſonment; and the king having given order to the governor to take a particular care of him, Gedaliah mov'd it to the prophet to go along with him to Babylon; for it was but reaſon the king ſhould be at the charge of his journey; or if he did not like that place, let him pitch upon any other, and he would write to the king about it. The prophet's anſwer was, that he had no mind to remove at all, but rather ſtay where he was, and take his part in the miſerable ruins of his native country. Nebuzar-Adan being inform'd how the prophet ſtood affected, gave Gedaliah a ſtrict charge to ſee him well provided for; made him ſeveral conſiderable preſents himſelf, and ſo left him, and returned to Babylon. Jeremiah upon this made choice of Mizpah for the place of his abode, having firſt obtain'd of Nebuzar-Adan, Baruch's liberty, as well as his own, whom he took for his companion.

Jeremiah diſcharg'd, and the care of him committed to Gedaliah, Jer. xl. 4, 5.

Jeremiah goes to Gedaliah at Mizpah, Ver. 6 and takes Baruch for his companion.

This Baruch was the ſon of Neriah, a perſon nobly born, and perfectly well ſkill'd in the language of his country.

THE burning and the ſacking of Jeruſalem, and the return of the Babylonians into their own country, was by this time made known to all the deſerters that had left the city in the time of the ſiege; and ſo they gather'd together from all places in throngs to Gedaliah at Mizpah. The principal men among them were Johanan, the ſon of Careah; Jaazaniah and Saraiah, with ſome others; and beſide theſe there was Iſhmael, a perſon of royal blood; but otherwiſe falſe and malicious to the higheſt degree. This man, in the time of the ſiege, fled to Bathal, the king of the Ammonites, for ſanctuary, where he had continued ever ſince. Upon the application of theſe people to Gedaliah, he gave them an invitation to continue there, and to plant; for they might live quietly and at eaſe, without any danger from the Babylonians; binding himſelf by an oath to ſtand by them and aſſiſt them, if any man ſhould offer to give them any moleſtation or trouble. Now, ſays he, do but you reſolve among yourſelves what town or place you would ſettle in, and you ſhall have ſome of my people along with you to aſſiſt you in preparing and fitting up habitations for you; only you muſt take care not to ſlip the ſeaſon of providing for the next vintage and harveſt, that you may not want corn, wine, or oil, next winter for your ſubſiſtence. When he had given them this encouragement and aſſurance, he left every man at liberty to diſpoſe of himſelf at his own diſcretion, and to chuſe for his reſidence what place he himſelf pleaſed.

The ſcatter'd Jews throng thither to Gedaliah, V. 7, 8.

Gedaliah invites them to continue there and plant, Ver. 9, 10.

THE report of Gedaliah's generous humanity and tenderneſs toward the fugitives who had applied themſelves to him for refuge, gain'd him ſo great a reputation with all the neighbouring nations, that they came trooping to him from all parts, and quickly made up a conſiderable plantation; for they had lands aſſign'd them in propriety, upon condition only of paying a certain acknowledgment to the king of Babylon. Johanan and the reſt of the great men had a very high eſteem for the courteſy of Gedaliah to the planters, and therefore advertiſed him in friendſhip and reſpect, that there was a conſpiracy carried on againſt him, betwixt the king of the Ammonites and Iſhmael; and that Iſhmael was to aſſaſſinate him with ſecrecy and treachery; and being a member of the royal family, that he intended to aſſume the government of the Iſraelites by that means. Now the ready way to ſecure Gedaliah againſt this practice, would be for them privately to diſpatch Iſhmael; which, with his leave, they would undertake to do; for they were afraid, if this miſchief was not timely prevented, it would prove the ruin of all the Iſraelites in the concluſion. Gedaliah told them, that he could not believe it poſſible for any man to be ſo barbarous and ungrateful, that lay under ſo many obligations to the contrary; neither could it enter into his head, that a man who was never known to do any ſuch thing under the provocation of his neceſſities, ſhould now be in a plot to deſtroy that perſon himſelf, whom by all the ties of honour and hoſpitality he was obliged to de-

But to make ſhort, he told them however, that ſuppoſing the information to be true, he had much rather loſe his own life, than take away the life of any man that had committed himſelf to his truſt. Johanan, and his companions, finding that all they ſaid was to no purpoſe, upon this declaration of Gedaliah's, went their way.

SOME thirty days after this diſcourſe, Iſhmael, with ten of his friends, gave a viſit to Gedaliah at Mizpah, where they were received and treated with all the freedom and reſpect imaginable. They drunk very plentifully, till Gedaliah and his companions were dull and heavy-headed; and the other party obſerving it, took the opportunity of falling upon them, and without any difficulty kill'd the maſter of the houſe, and all the reſt of his guards. It was now in the dead of the night; and all the people, as well ſoldiers as others, careleſly ſecure, and aſleep; ſo that they made the ſame havock in the ſtreets, and elſewhere, as they had done at Gedaliah's juſt before; deſtroying and murdering all they could find, whether Jews or Babylonians, without any diſtinction. The next day there came up to the city a company of about fourſcore men out of the country, with preſents for Gedaliah, knowing nothing as yet of the maſſacre of the laſt night. So ſoon as Iſhmael ſaw them, he call'd them in to Gedaliah; ſhut the doors upon them, and cut their throats in the palace, cauſing the bodies afterward to be thrown into a pit, where they might lie conceal'd. There was not a man of all that number that eſcaped, ſave only ſome few that promiſed to make diſcovery of goods, cloaths, and corn, that were concealed under ground, if they would but reprieve them till they made the diſcovery. Some of them were ſpar'd upon the hope of this diſcovery; but for the common people of Mizpah, the women, and the children, they were all carried away; and among the reſt, the daughters of Zedekiah, which Nebuzar-Adan had left, under the care of Gedaliah. Iſhmael went away preſently with the news of this exploit to the king of the Ammonites; but Johanan, with the reſt of the leading men, hearing of this bloody execution at Mizpah, and the death of Gedaliah, took it ſo heinouſly, that they drew every man his ſoldiers together, and join'd in the purſuit of Iſhmael, whom they overtook at the fountain of Hebron. The firſt ſight of the purſuers rejoic'd the hearts of the priſoners that Iſhmael was carrying away with him; for ſuſpecting them at firſt ſight to be, what they really were, friends come to their aſſiſtance, they went over immediately, one and all, to the party of Johanan; but Iſhmael, with only eight of his companions, fled to the king of the Ammonites. Johanan, in the mean time, with the people he had taken from Iſhmael, eunuchs, women, and children, marched to a place that is called Mandra, and there they ſtaid one day, bethinking themſelves of going into Egypt, leſt the Babylonians, in a rage for the murder of their governor, ſhould in revenge fall upon them; but, however, for their better ſecurity, they took up a reſolution to conſult Jeremiah what courſe to take. So they put the queſtion to him; promiſing with an oath to do whatever he ſhould adviſe them to. The prophet aſſured them he would do what he could for their ſatisfaction; and upon the tenth day after this, God appeared to him, and bad him go and tell Johanan, and the reſt of the commanders, "That if they continued where "they were, he would aſſiſt and ſecure them "againſt any harm from the Babylonians, "whom they were ſo much afraid of; but if "after this premonition, they ſhould rather go "into Egypt, let them look to themſelves, "and expect the ſame fate and judgment that "had befallen their brethren before them." This was the meſſage the prophet deliver'd them by God's expreſs direction, though they could hardly believe it to be the will of God, that they ſhould continue where they were; but took it rather for an invention of the prophet's, in favour of Baruch, his diſciple, and to expoſe them to the wrath of the Babylonians; ſo that Johanan and the reſt of the people, in contempt of God's word by his prophet, went away into Egypt, and carried Jeremiah and Baruch along with them. When they were come thither, it was revealed from heaven to the prophet, that the king of Babylon ſhould bring an army into Egypt; and he commanded Jeremiah to tell the people as much, and that Egypt ſhould be taken, where part of them ſhould be kill'd, and part carried away captives to Babylon, which came to paſs accordingly; for in the fifth year after the deſtruction of Jeruſalem, and the three and twentieth of Nebuchadnezzar, he made an inroad into Cœle-Syria; and upon ſubduing it, carried the war forward to the Ammonites and Moabites; and when he had ſubjected them too, he made a furious incurſion into Egypt; kill'd the then reigning king, and ſet up another in his place; and the Jews whom he found there, were carried away a ſecond time priſoners to Babylon.

THIS was the miſerable fate of the Hebrews, as we have the ſtory, who were twice carried away beyond the Euphrates; for the ten tribes were firſt tranſported by the Aſſyrians out of Samaria, in the reign of Hoſeah; and then the other two, by Nebuchadnezzar the king of the Chaldeans and the Babylonians, upon the taking of Jeruſalem. Now Salmanaſſer tranſplanted the Chuthites into the country of the Iſraelites, out of the heart of Media and Perſia; and they were called Samaritans from the name of the place into which they were tranſplanted; but they king of Babylon carried away the other two tribes, without introducing any other in their ſtead. And this was the reaſon that Judea, with Jeruſalem, and the temple, lay wholly abandon'd for the ſpace of ſeventy years. The time betwixt the captivity of the ten tribes, and the tranſmigration of the other two, was one hundred and thirty years, ſix months, and ten days.

NEBUCHADNEZZAR appointed a very ſtrict and ſelect choice to be made, out of the youths of the Jews, both for birth, vigour, and beauty, and ſeveral of them, the relations of king Zedekiah; he appointed alſo the beſt tutors that could be had, for their inſtitution, and divers of them to be caſtrated according to the practice of that country, being the handſomeſt boys of conquer'd nations. He ſent them their meat from his own table, and took great care to have them inſtructed in the Chaldean diſcipline and learning, wherein they advanced very much in a ſhort time. There were four of Zedekiah's relations in the number, whoſe names were Daniel, Ananias, Miſhael, and Azariah; but the Babylonians changed their names, and called Daniel, Belteſhazzar; Ananias, Shadrach; Miſhael, Meſhach; and Azariah, Abednego. The king had a wonderful tenderneſs for them all, both in regard of the ſweetneſs of their diſpoſition, and the extraordinary pregnancy of their underſtanding. Daniel look'd upon that voluptuous way of feeding to be too delicate for people in their condition, and therefore they went to Aſchanes, the eunuch, that had them in charge, and intreated him rather to make uſe of thoſe delicacies which the king ſent them from his own table, for the ſervice of himſelf, and his family; and if they had but pulſe, or dates, or any ordinary food that had no life in't, it would be to them full as ſatisfactory; for thoſe delicacies, they ſaid, went againſt their ſtomachs. The eunuch told them that he would gratify them with all his heart; but if they ſhould grow lean, and thin, upon ſuch an abſtemious way of feeding, or look perhaps leſs aimable upon it, and appear in a leſs agreeable habit of health and colour, he was afraid the king might have ſome ſuſpicion of the matter, and take offence at it; which might be as much as his life was worth; eſpecially when the reſt of their companions, that fed better than they did, ſhould be obſerved to look better too. They found the eunuch not ſo obſtinate in oppoſing their requeſt as he might have been, and ſo preſs'd him to make the experiment, only for ten days; and after that time, if he found the change did not ſo well agree with them as their former allowance, and that they ſhould not keep their health, their colour, and the ſame habit of body, after that trial, that they had before, he might bring them back again to the king's way of entertainment. The eunuch was prevail'd upon to make trial of it, and when he found them ſo far from being the worſe for the alteration, that they grew more vigorous upon it, both in the diſpoſition of their bodies and minds, he made no longer a ſcruple of complying with their deſires, but gave them what they demanded, and kept the king's allowance to himſelf; which agreed ſo well with Daniel, and his friends, that, comparatively, they ſeem'd to be better provided for than the reſt, and all their faculties kept in better tone for either ſtudy or labour; being neither overcharg'd or ſurfeited with variety, nor render'd effeminate with the luxury of pleaſing the palate. By this temperate frugal way of menage and diſcipline, their ſpirits were kept clear and active, as appeared by their wonderful improvement in the Hebrew, as well as the Chaldean learning; but of Daniel eſpecially, who had gotten ſuch an inſight into their arts, that he took upon him the expounding of dreams, and had many times viſions of his own to work upon.

Nebuchadnezzar has a dream, and forgets it, Dan ii. 1

SOME two years after the deſtruction of Egypt, Nebuchadnezzar had a wonderful viſion, and a revelation from God in his ſleep, of the meaning of it: but when he came afterwards to riſe from his bed, he had quite forgotten it. So he preſently ſent for his learned men, as Chaldeans, Magi, and Prophets, and told them that he had had a ſtrange dream, but it was now utterly out of his head, and therefore required them to tell him what it was, and what was the ſignification of it. They made him anſwer, that as to the firſt part of his propoſition, it was a thing not to be done; but if he would be pleas'd to tell them the dream, they would be anſwerable to give him the interpretation of it. The king in a rage commanded them without any more ado, to tell him his dream, or they ſhould die for't; but they could not undertake it, they ſaid, and ſo they were all order'd to be put to death. When Daniel came to underſtand that the wiſe men were all to be put to death, and to conſider, that he and his relations were alſo in danger upon the ſame account, he went to Arioch, the captain of the king's guards, to learn what the crime was they were condemned for: ſo the captain told him, that the king had a dream, which he himſelf had forgotten, and that they were to die, becauſe they could not tell him what it was. Daniel made anſwer, that if he could but get them a reprieve only for one night, he would not deſpair of giving him the ſatisfaction he requir'd; for he had ſome hope that God would that very night be prevail'd upon to enable him to do it. The captain gave the king an account of this diſcourſe and propoſal; and thereupon the execution was reſpited, only to try what good was to be done upon that experiment. Daniel, with his companions, went into his bedchamber, and ſpent that whole night in prayers to God, for the means of reſolving the queſtion, and for the delivering thoſe people from death, that were now fallen under the king's diſpleaſure, by laying before him the particulars of the laſt night's dream, which was now ſlipt out of his memory. God was pleaſed upon this interceſſion of Daniel, both in compaſſion to the miſerable, and out of tenderneſs for the prudence of Daniel's mediation, to make known, not only the dream itſelf, but the ſignification of it; to the end, that he might communicate the whole matter to the king. Daniel was ſo tranſported with this revelation, that he got up early in the morning, gave his brethren a word of comfort, being now brought to the laſt point of deſperation, and thinking of nothing but death, bad them cheer up, and hope the beſt, for that all things were now ſecure. When they had given God thanks, together for his fatherly care and piety over them, Daniel went to Arioch by break of day, to carry him to the king, with aſſurance that he ſhould now have all the particulars laid before him of his late dream.

Upon Daniel's admittance to the king, he firſt told him, "That it was not any over"weening opinion he had of his own wiſ-
"dom, as if he knew more than the Chal-
"deans and the Magi; or any deſign of a "reproach upon them, for not being able to "reſolve a queſtion which he could explain.
"It was not any thing of this, ſays he, that "made me engage in this matter; for I am "not a perſon to pretend to more skill and "underſtanding than my neighbours: but it "is purely the work of God in pity to the "miſerable, and in mercy to my prayers, for "the lives and ſafety of myſelf and my "friends,

" friends, that hath revealed this dream to " me, and laid open the meaning of it. I have " not been ſo ſolicitous for the ſafety of my- " ſelf, and my companions under your diſ- " pleaſure, as for your honour and glory; in " caſe of putting ſo many good and worthy " men to death, contrary to right and juſtice, " and only for not being able to do a thing " which it is utterly impoſſible for fleſh and " blood to do; or for any but a ſupernatural " power to accompliſh.

" You were bethinking yourſelf what would " become of the empire of the world when " you were gone, and who ſhould ſucceed to " it. Now the dream you had was a kind " of a reſolution upon that enquiry; for God " ſhew'd you in your ſleep thoſe that were to " rule after you. You dreamt you ſaw a " large image, or ſtatue, ſtanding upright; " the head was gold; the ſhoulders and arms " ſilver; the belly and the thighs, braſs; the " legs and the feet, iron. You ſaw then a " ſtone broken off from a mountain, that " fell upon this image, overthrew it, and " broke it ſo ſmall, that the duſt of the gold, " ſilver, braſs, and iron, was as light as " chaff, and carry'd away by a blaſt of wind " to the furthermoſt parts of the earth; the " ſtone growing ſo great all this while, that " it lay like a mountain upon the face of the " earth. This was your dream, and I come " now to the interpretation of it. By the " golden head is ſignify'd yourſelf, and other " kings of Babylon before you: the two hands " and ſhoulders portend that two kings ſhall " deſtroy your empire; and afterward, their " empire will be ſubverted by another king " coming from the weſt in armour of braſs; " and he is to be ſubdued afterward by ano- " ther in iron; which, in the nature of it, is " ſtronger than gold, ſilver, or braſs, and not " to be reſiſted." Daniel gave an interpre- tation alſo of the ſtone, which I ſhall paſs over in this place; for it is my buſineſs to write of things paſt, and not of things to come. But for the ſatisfaction of the inqui- ſitive into the dark events of things, I ſhall only recommend unto them the book of Da- niel, as we have it in ſacred writ.

and the expoſition of it, ibid.

NEBUCHADNEZZAR, in great admiration, ac- knowledg'd this to be his dream, and falling upon his face, ador'd Daniel like a God, and appointed divine honours to be done him: and this would not ſerve neither, without giving him the name of his God *, and ſo he made him ruler of the whole province, join- ing ſeveral of his kindred with him the ſame commiſſion. This promotion was follow'd with ſuch an envy upon Daniel and his relations, that it had like to have coſt them all their lives, by a diſguſt the king took upon this fol- lowing occaſion.

The king adores Daniel for his wiſdom, and gives him the name of his god Belteſhazzar, Ver. 46. and iv. 8.

He ſets up a golden image. Dan. iii. 1.

NEBUCHADNEZZAR the king made an image of gold, ſixty † cubits in height, and ſix  in breadth, and placed it in the great plain of Babylon. He call'd together, upon the dedi- cation of it, the princes, the great men and officers out of all his dominions; making proclamation, that immediately upon hearing the ſound of a trumpet, they ſhould all fall down and worſhip this image; and that who- ever refuſed it, ſhould be caſt into the fiery furnace. Upon the ſounding of this trumpet, accordingly, all the people fell down and ſhipped, ſave only Daniel and his relations; who refuſing to do it, out of a reverence to the laws of their country, were inform'd a- gainſt, and caſt into the fire; but by a mer- ciful providence, and beyond all human ima- gination, their lives were preſerv'd, as if the flame itſelf had been conſcious of the in- juſtice of the ſentence, and ſuſpended the ve- ry nature of its conſuming quality in favour of the innocent; for they were not ſo much as ſcorch'd with it; as if God, in his gra- cious providence, had made their bodies proof againſt the flames. But the thing that moſt re- commended them to the king's tenderneſs and eſteem, was the miraculous proof of God's love and goodneſs to them in their juſtifica- tion; for upon this ground the king had a ve- ry great honour for them ever after.

NOT long after this Nebuchadnezzar had another dream, as ſurprizing as the former; which was, that " Being driven away from " his kingdom he lived ſeven years among " the beaſts of the foreſt, and was afterwards " reſtored to his former dignity and ſtate." The king put the queſtion once again to the Magi upon this viſion alſo; but Daniel was the only perſon again to expound the mean- ing of it: and according to his prediction, it ſucceeded in the event; for " after ſeven " years of his life ſpent in an inſociable ſoli- " tude, and no perſon all this time daring " to make any attempt upon his government, " God, by his prayers, was prevail'd upon to " re-inſtate him in the exerciſe of his kingly, " power." Let no body blame me for deli- vering the ſame reports in my writings, that I find in ancient hiſtory; for I have anticipated all thoſe cavils in the very beginning of this work, by making a publick profeſſion, to do the part only of a faithful tranſlator of the ſtory out of Hebrew into Greek, and to deli- ver every thing honeſtly as I find it, without making it more or leſs than in truth it is.

NEBUCHADNEZZAR, in fine, was a prince very induſtrious, and much more fortunate than any of his anceſtors. He died in the three and fortieth year of his age. Beroſus, in the third book of his Chaldean hiſtory, makes mention of it in theſe words: †† Ne- " buchodonoſor the father, ſays he, under- " ſtanding that a certain great officer of his, " to whom he had committed the govern- " ment of Egypt, Cœle-Syria, and Phœnicia, " was fallen off from his allegiance, and not " being in a condition of body himſelf to " bear the fatigues of the war in his own " perſon, he ſent his ſon Nebuchodonoſor, " with part of his army, to reduce him to

The father " in the mean time was taken away by a sick- " ness at Babylon, in the * one and twentieth " year of his reign. The young prince was " no sooner informed of the death of his fa- " ther, but he took immediate care for the " settling of his affairs in Egypt, and the rest " of the provinces; recommending to some " particular friends the charge of conveying " his prisoners, Jews, Syrians, Phenicians, " and Egyptians, to Babylon, with the army " and baggage; while he himself, with a small " retinue, took his way thither over the de- " sart. The government was reserv'd for him " in the mean while, by the Chaldeans; and " by the great men among them, in his ab- " sence, secured till his return. So that when " he came to enter upon the administration, he " was established in the full possession of his " paternal empire. The first thing he did was " to make a commodious distribution of his " captives into colonies; and after that, to " adorn and illustrate the temple of Belus, " and other religious places, with spoils of " war. He repaired and enlarged the ancient " edifices of the city, and raised works upon " the banks of the river, to prevent all ap- " proaches that way. He erected three walls " or retrenchments, within the bounds of the " city, and as many without, all brick work; " and when he had fortified the town after " this remarkable manner, he beautified the " gates with a curiosity of frontispiece, like " the finishing of the temple work; and ad- " vanc'd another palace contiguous to that of " his father's, with all possible art and magni- " ficence; but the particulars are too many, " and would be too long to be described in " this place. There is only one thing that I " cannot but take notice of; which is, that " this spacious and stately fabrick was finished " in fifteen days. † In this building there " were vast stones supported upon arches, that " look'd like mountains hanging in the air; " and they were planted on the top, with se- " veral sorts of trees, in a compliment to the " queen, who being a Median, had a passionate " desire to see some artificial resemblance of " the gardens and rarities of her own country."

Megasthenes. Megasthenes, in the fourth volume of his history of India, speaks of these garden works, and sets forth this king, both for his enterprize, and for his performances, to have been much superior to Hercules himself, having subdued the ‡ greatest part of Libya, and likewise Iberia.

Diocles and Philostratus. Diocles makes mention of this king in the second book of his Persian history; and so Philostratus, in the account he gives of the Phenicians and the Indians; telling how this prince, in the days of Ithobal king of Tyre, maintain'd a siege of thirteen years against that town. And this is all the account I can find among the historians concerning him.

Evil-Merodach succeeds Nebuchadnezzar, and discharges Jehoiakin. The royal line of Babylon down to Belshazzar. Cyrus and Darius besiege him in Babylon. Daniel expounds a vision to him. Babylon taken, and Belshazzar in it. Darius makes Daniel his particular favourite. Daniel's wonderful deliverances, visions, and predictions.

Evil-Merodach succeeds Nebuchadnezzar. Jehoiakin set at liberty, and preferr'd, Jer. lii. 31.

AFTER the death of Nebuchadnezzar, Evil-Merodach his son succeeds him, who set Jeconiah, or Jehoiakin, at liberty; honour'd him with many presents, took him into a particular trust and confidence, and made him the chief governor of his palace at Babylon. His father indeed had broken his faith shamefully with this Jeconiah, in making him a prisoner after he had so frankly deliver'd up himself, his wife, children, and all his relations upon honour only, for the saving of his country from utter ruin, as is said already.

Evil-Merodach dies, and his son Nigliśar succeeds him. The kingdom goes from him to Labosardochus, and so to Belshazzar.

EVIL-MERODACH died in the eighteenth year of his reign. His son || Nigliśar succeeded him; and when he had reigned forty years, the kingdom fell by succession to his son Labosardochus, who kept it only nine months; and after his death, it went to Belshazzar, by the Babylonians called Naboandel.

Cyrus and Darius make war upon Belshazzar, and besiege Babylon.

 CYRUS the king of the Persians, and Darius the king of the Medes, made war upon this prince; and while they lay before Babylon, there appear'd to Belshazzar a wonderful and a prodigious vision. As he was at supper in a large eating-room, with his courtiers and his concubines about him, and a magnificent ostentation of silver vessels and plate for the service of his table, he call'd, in a frolick, for the sacred vessels also out of his own temple, which Nebuchadnezzar deposited there, upon rifling the temple at Jerusalem, though he never had the confidence to put them to any prophane or private use. Belshazzar was now warm in his cups, and entertaining himself and his company, with prophane extravagancies of speech against the majesty of the true God; when in the height of his jollity there appear'd a hand, writing certain syllables upon the walls, which put the king into such an agony of terror, that he presently call'd a council of cunning men and Chaldeans, and all sort of diviners, who among those barbarians value themselves upon a faculty of disclosing the meaning of prodigies, and the interpretation of dreams, to find out the purport of the words that were there writ upon the plaister. They laid their heads together, and upon advice and consideration, frankly declared, that they understood nothing of the matter. Upon this the king in an anxiety of thought and surprize, caused a proclamation to be publish'd all over his dominions, with promise of a golden chain, the privilege of a royal purple robe, and the third place of rule in his kingdom, to any man that should give him the interpretation of that writing. Upon this proclamation the wiſe men gather'd together more and more, in a ſtriſe who ſhould unfold this myſtery, and all to no manner of purpoſe in the concluſion.

WHILE the king was under great perplexity of mind and aſtoniſhment, at theſe diſappointments, his grandmother went to him and told him, that for his comfort there was a certain Jew among the priſoners that Nebuchadnezzar brought away with him upon the deſtruction of Jeruſalem, who was look'd upon to be a man of great wiſdom and foreſight, and ſo wonderfully skill'd in the ſolving of nice difficulties and queſtions, as if he ſpoke by the direction of a divine ſpirit. She told him alſo that Nebuchadnezzar made uſe of him for his interpreter in the like caſes, when no body elſe was able to reſolve him; wherefore ſhe deſir'd the king by any means to ſend for Daniel, and to enquire of him about that writing, and give him encouragement to ſpeak the truth, though it ſhould import ſomething dreadful to himſelf, if it were but to daſh the ignorance of other pretenders. Upon this advice Belſhazzar cauſed Daniel to be ſent for; profeſſing, indeed, that he had heard of the profound penetration and underſtanding of that man, and of the ſpirit of divination with which he was poſſeſs'd; and that he took him to be the moſt likely perſon in the world to divine the truth of a matter which no body elſe could interpret. So upon Daniel's being brought, the king put him the queſtion, with an aſſurance, that all the promiſes in his proclamation ſhould be made good to him, upon his ſolution of it; which would make him famous all over the world, wherever it ſhould come to be known, that he had theſe honours done him for his wiſdom.

DANIEL excuſed himſelf from the receiving of any gifts or honours. "For wiſdom, ſays "he, is a divine faculty, and not to be cor- "rupted or prophan'd with bribes, but to be "ever ready to ſerve thoſe that ſtand in need "of it. This writing, ſays he, is a foretel- "ling to you, that your death is at hand; "for you ſhould have taken warning by the "judgments that befel your great anceſtor for "his contempt of God, and have applied your- "ſelf to a courſe of life, within the compaſs "of religion, modeſty, and moderation. You "know very well that Nebuchadnezzar was "baniſh'd the ſociety of mankind, and con- "demn'd to the life and condition of a beaſt; "but that afterward it pleaſed God, upon his "earneſt prayers and repentance, to reſtore "him to the converſation of men, and to the "exerciſe of his former government, which "infinite mercy and providence of God he "adored and celebrated afterward all the days "of his life; but for your part, ſays Daniel, "you are ſo far from being wrought upon by "this example in your family, that you blaſ- "pheme God to his face, and take a pride in "prophaning the veſſels of his holy altar, in "your debauches with your harlots. By this "lewd courſe of impiety, you have drawn the "wrath of God upon your head; and the in- "tent of this writing is only to ſhew what "end you are to come to. MENE, which is as "much as number, ſignifies that the days both "of your life and of your reign are number'd, "and that you have but a very ſhort time to "live. TEKEL, or weight, gives to under- "ſtand, that your reign is weighed in the ba- "lance, and drawing to a concluſion. PERES, "or a fragment, portends, that your kingdom "ſhall be divided, and given to the Medes "and Perſians." The king was moſt terribly mortified with this interpretation; yet notwithſtanding, was ſo juſt and generous, as to make good to Daniel, all that he had promis'd him, though the foreteller of his ruin; conſidering with himſelf, that it was not the prophet's fault, but his own unhappy fatality, that he could tell him no better tidings; neither would he deny but Daniel had done the part of a juſt and a good man, in letting him know the truth of things, though never ſo deplorable in the event.

Daniel expounds the writing, Ver. 25--28.

IT was not long after this, when both himſelf and the city fell into the power and poſſeſſion of Cyrus; for Babylon was taken in the ſeventeenth year of the reign of Belſhazzar, who is ſaid to have been the laſt king of Nebuchadnezzar's family. Now Darius was ſixty two years of age, when with the aſſiſtance of Cyrus his kinſman, he wrought the ſubverſion of the Babylonian empire; which Cyrus was the ſon of Aſtyages, though known among the Greeks by another name. He took the prophet Daniel along with him into Media, and had him in great honour and eſtimation; for he made him one of the three chief governors that had * three hundred and ſixty more under them, according to the original conſtitution of Darius. Now Darius had ſo great a tenderneſs and reverence for Daniel, that he conſulted him upon all occaſions as an oracle, and would hardly reſolve upon any matter of moment without his advice; but it fell out with Daniel, as we find it in the caſe of other princes favourites; the confident that is moſt in credit, never fails of drawing upon himſelf the envy of all the reſt. Now Daniel was ſo well aware of theſe court-tricks, and kept ſo ſtrict a guard upon himſelf, that there was no laying hold of any opportunity againſt him. As to the matter of money and bribes, he had a ſoul ſo much above any temptation of that kind, that he made a conſcience of receiving even a lawful acknowledgment for a good office. But this did not hinder his enemies yet from plotting his downfal and deſtruction; and the manner of it was this:

Daniel's advancement under Cyrus, and the envy he contracted by it, Dan. vi. 3, 4.

Daniel's integrity is proof againſt all calumny, ibid.

IT being obſerv'd that Daniel prayed to God conſtantly thrice a day, his adverſaries, to entrap him, bethought themſelves how they might improve that practice of his to his ruin. So they applied themſelves to Darius, in the name of his council and ſtate officers; and upon their advice and requeſt, that he would be pleaſed ſo far to indulge his people, as to paſs an edict only for thirty days, that whoſoever ſhould preſume to ask any thing of God or man within that compaſs of time, ſhould be caſt into the lions den. The king was ſo ſhort-ſighted, as not to ſee through the malice of this contrivance, and that the very propoſal ſtruck at the life of Daniel; ſo that he aſſented to the motion, promis'd a confirmation of it, and order'd the publication of the decree, as the act of himſelf and his council. The dread of this decree put all people into a general damp and silence, for fear of being surpriz'd into a transgression; saving only Daniel himself, who went on still in his daily course of worshipping God, in the publick view of the world, as it was his custom to do, without ever regarding the decree. This way of proceeding furnished his enemies with the opportunity of a pretence, that they had long waited for; which immediately they laid hold of, for giving the king to understand, that Daniel was the only man, who in contempt of his royal proclamation, worshipped contrary to the tenor and direction of the decree, and that he did not do this out of piety neither, but out of a spirit of contradiction, and defiance to the authority of the edict. The envy of Daniel's enemies was the more outrageous, upon the apprehension they had that the king's personal indulgence for him might incline him to pass over the affront; so that they press'd him with clamours and outcries, not to be resisted, for justice upon the malefactor; and nothing would serve them, but Daniel must be immediately thrown into the lions den. Darius was fore'd to yield to the violence of these importunities; but told Daniel for his comfort in this extremity, that rather than so good a man should perish, God would yet work some miracle for his relief; so Daniel was cast into the lions den, and a great stone laid at the mouth of the den, which the king seal'd with his own signet, and so went his way to his palace. He pass'd that night, fasting and waking; for the trouble of his mind for Daniel would not suffer him either to eat or sleep; but early in the morning he got up, and went to the den, where he found every thing as he left it, and the seal untouch'd. He call'd upon Daniel then by his name, at a grate that look'd down into the den, to know if he were living or not; to which Daniel made this answer, that he was safe and well; in which instant the king order'd him to be taken out again; but Daniel's enemies would not allow this deliverance, however, to be the work of a peculiar providence, and would needs face the king down, that the lions bellies were full, and so they let him alone for want of an appetite. The king was so incensed at the spite and malignity of these people, that he order'd as much meat to be given the lions as they could get down, and when they would eat no longer, to turn Daniel's accusers in among them. If they do not devour them, says the king, 'tis because their bellies are full; but if they do, it must be allow'd to be a divine providence that preserv'd Daniel. In short the lions tore them to pieces, every one of them, with as much eagerness as if they had been starved with hunger; or rather, as if the beasts themselves were become the ministers of God's justice upon the workers of iniquity.

Daniel cast into the lions den, Dan. vi. 16

The lions do him no hurt, Ver. 22--25.

But afterwards tear his enemies to pieces, V. 24.

AFTER this execution done upon the treacherous complottors against Daniel, Darius published a decree through his whole empire; commanding his people to acknowledge the God of Daniel to be the only true and Almighty God, and at the same multiplied honours upon the prophet himself, in preference to all the rest of his friends and favourites. Now Daniel, by this way of conduct, having gained the universal esteem of a person highly in favour both with God and man, he erected a stately fabrick at Ecbatan, the capital of Media; a work every way wonderful, as well for the structure and strength of it, as for the beauty. The building is still to be seen, and looks as fresh and as firm at this instant as if it had been finished but the day you first saw it, without any decays of time or age to be seen upon it; whereas it fares with other edifices as with human bodies, time wears them out, and disfigures them. This tower is famous for being the royal monument of the kings of the Medes, Persians, and Parthians, to which use it is still applied, and the place likewise committed to the custody of a Jewish priest to this very day. There are some other passages in the history of Daniel, which are yet more admirable and particular, and not to be passed over in silence. He had this singular blessing attending him, over and above his excellent gift of prophecy, that he liv'd in a high degree of reputation, both with king and people; and at his death left an immortal memory behind him, to his everlasting honour; for we find by his writings that are yet extant, and in daily use and reading, that beyond all question, God communed with him in a very express manner, and revealed to him not only the sum and substance of things to come, (as was usual to other prophets,) but the very time when such or such an event should come to pass. And whereas other prophets were more exercised in the foreboding of calamities, and consequently drew upon themselves envy and ill-will, both from princes and people, Daniel, on the contrary, made friends of both, by the good things he told them, which they took delight to hear; and then for the certainty of the event, all mortals are agreed upon it, that he spoke from the dictate of an infallible spirit, as may be abundantly gather'd also from the writings which this great prophet hath left behind him.

Darius declares Daniel's God to be the true God, V. 25, &c. Daniel erects a magnificent tower at Ecbatan, the capital of Media.

Daniel's vision at Susa, of the ram and the goat, Dan. viii.

"IT fell out, says he, as I was taking the "air one day, with some of my companions at "Susa, the metropolis of Persia, that we "were surpriz'd all on a sudden with an earth-"quake. My friends ran away in a fright, "and left me alone, fallen prostrate upon the "ground, in a consternation upon that acci-"dent. While I was in that posture, some "body, methought, came, took hold on me, "and bad me rise, and take good notice of "things; for I should see wonderful revolu-"tions that would befal my countrymen se-"veral ages to come. Upon my arising, I "saw a large ram, with several horns, and the "last taller than the rest. Turning my face "then toward the west, I saw a goat that "pass'd through the air, and encounter'd the "ram, struck him down twice, and trampled "him under his feet. After this there arose "a large horn out of the forehead of the "goat; and when that came to be broken, "there sprang up four more instead of it, point-"ing toward the four quarters of the heavens." Daniel writes also, "That from one of them "came forth a little horn, which, upon grow-"ing up, should wage war with the nation of "the Jews, and destroy Jerusalem itself, sup-"press the ceremonies of the temple, and all "sacrifices, for the space of twelve hundred "and ninety six days." This was the vision that, as Daniel writes, he saw at Susa, which was first shewed by a revelation from God, and then interpreted after this following manner: "By the ram was designed the kingdoms of "the Medes and Persians; by the horns, the "succeeding kings there; and the last of their "kings, by the last horn, as transcending all "the rest for wealth and power; by the "goat was signified some king of Greece, "that should give two overthrows to the Per-"sians, and subdue that empire; by the great "horn upon the forehead of the goat, was "meant the first of their kings; and by the "budding out of four horns more, pointing "to the four winds, was to be understood the "successors to those kings, and the partition "of their dominions, after the death of the "first, though strangers to the blood; but "that however they should reign for several "years; and in process of time, out of these "should come a king that would make war "upon the Jewish nation, and their laws, and "utterly extinguish the form of the common-"wealth, pillage the temple, and prohibit "any sacrifices or worship in it for three "years." Which calamity came to pass under Antiochus Epiphanes, as the prophet had foretold so many years before. He wrote several wonderful things also about the Roman empire, and what a desolation they should make of our people; all which he received by divine revelation, and transmitted in writing to posterity, to stand as a testimony upon record, of the agreement betwixt the presage and the event. This may serve to establish a veneration for that man's memory, whom God was pleased to honour in so particular a manner, and likewise to confound the impious doctrine of the Epicureans, that will not allow of any ordering or over-ruling providence to interpose in the government, or preservation of the universe, but will have the whole course of sublunary affairs to be only a huddle of contingencies, without either care or counsel. Now if it were as they vainly imagine, the world without a supreme governor or moderator, would be such another fancy as that of a ship at the mercy of the winds and waves without a pilot, which must of necessity miscarry; or, as a chariot among crags and precipices, without a driver, that perishes under its own weight. So that when I consider the predictions of Daniel, I cannot forgive the ignorance and irreverence of those people that make it their profession to decry providence, as if God took no care of us; for how is it possible there should be such a correspondence betwixt a thing foretold at one time, and fulfilled so many ages after, if, according to their opinion, every thing was left to hap-hazard? But what I have found in writing, I do here deliver in writing, just as I found it, leaving every man still to the liberty of his own opinion.

Daniel's wonderful predictions concerning the Roman empire.

CHAP. I.

Cyrus gives the Jews leave to return, and to rebuild Jeruſalem and the temple, with letters recommendatory to his officers and governors, to be aiding and aſſiſting to them.

1 Eſdras i.
3 Eſdra. iii.

IN the firſt year of Cyrus, and the ſeventieth of our Babylonian captivity, God took pity of a miſerable people, according to what he had foretold them by the prophet Jeremiah, before the deſtruction of Jeruſalem; that is to ſay, that after ſeventy years bondage under Nebuchadnezzar, and his ſucceſſors, they ſhould be reſtored to their own country; ſee the temple rebuilt, and return to the ſtate of their former glory. This was all made good to them accordingly; for God put it into the heart of Cyrus, to ſend his circular letters over all Aſia, to this effect, ſigning them, Cyrus the king. "I do fully perſuade myſelf, that "the great God, of whoſe gift and bounty I "hold my empire, is the very God that the "children of Iſrael adore; for I find honour-"able mention made of my name by his pro-"phets of ancient date, as a perſon that in "time to come ſhould rebuild Jeruſalem, and "re-inſtate the people." Cyrus, it ſeems, had ſeen and read the prophecies of Iſaiah, which bore date two hundred and ten years before he was born, wherein he gives an account of a revelation he had from God, "That he "would raiſe up one Cyrus, to be a king of "many, and of powerful nations, who ſhould "re-eſtabliſh the Hebrews in their native coun-"try." This was foretold by the prophet a hundred and forty years before the temple was deſtroy'd. The king was ſo tranſported upon the reading of theſe divine inſpirations and predictions concerning himſelf, that he fell preſently to work upon making good his part of the prophecy. The firſt thing he did, was to call together all the leading men of the Jews to Babylon, where he told them, that ſo many of them as had a mind to go back into their country, ſhould have free paſſports, and permiſſion to rebuild the temple and the city of Jeruſalem, if they thought fit; making no doubt, he ſaid, but that God would bleſs them in the undertaking, promiſing over and above, that he would ſend his orders to all his officers and governors bordering upon Judea, to furniſh them with gold and ſilver for the rebuilding of the temple, and beaſts for ſacrifices. The moſt eminent of the two tribes of Judah and Benjamin, together with the prieſts and Levites, immediately upon this declaration, haſten'd away toward Jeruſalem. But there were a great many, however, that choſe rather to ſtay in Babylon, than to quit their poſſeſſions. Upon their arrival at Jeruſalem, all the king's friends and officers contributed tributed largely and unanimously toward the great work; some gold, others silver; and some again cattle and horses; others attended the discharge of their vows, and the solemnity of oblations, as if they were already enter'd upon the business of re-erecting the city, and in the exercise of their ancient discipline; for Cyrus had then sent them from Babylon, the holy vessels and utensils that Nebuchadnezzar had taken away from the temple at Jerusalem; which were deliver'd to * Mithridates the king's treasurer, and by him to be deposited with Abassar, till the temple should be finish'd, and then immediately to be put into the hands of the priests and magistrates of the people, for the use and service of the temple. Cyrus, after this, wrote another letter to the governors of Syria, in manner following:

Cyrus restores the holy vessels and utensils that had been taken out of the temple, Ver. 7, &c.

Cyrus the king, to Sysina and Sarabasan, greeting.

Cyrus, in favour of the Jews, gives leave for the temple and capital city to be rebuilt.

" BE it known unto you, that I have given " leave to all the Jews that are in my " dominions, to return into their own country,
" and there to rebuild their capital city, with
" the holy temple at Jerusalem, in the same " place where it stood before. I have like" wise sent my treasurer Mithridates, and Zo-" robabel the governor of Judea, to superin" tend the building, and to see it raised † six" ty cubits upward from the ground, and as " many over; the walls to be three rows of " polished stone, and one of the wood of the " country, together with an altar for the sa" crifices; and all this to be done at my own " charge. I have also appointed my treasurer
" Mithridates, and Zorobabel the prince of " Judah, to cause all utensils and vessels that " Nebuchadnezzar carried away from the tem" ple at Jerusalem, to be sent back and re-
" stor'd; that is to say, fifty golden ewers,
" and four hundred silver ones; fifty golden
" vessels, all Thericlean cups, and four hun" dred silver ones; fifty golden lavers, and
" five hundred silver ones; thirty golden cha" lices, and three hundred silver ones; thirty
" golden phials, and two thousand four hun" dred silver ones, beside a thousand of other " large vessels of different sorts. It is my " further pleasure also, that they receive entire
" to themselves all the profits and revenues
" that were formerly enjoy'd by their prede" cessors, and that they have an allowance
" paid them of ‡ two hundred and five thou" sand five hundred drachma's, in considera" tion of beasts for sacrifices, wine, and oil;
" and two thousand five hundred measures of " wheat, in lieu of the fine flower; and all
" this to be raised upon the tribute of Samaria.
" The priests alone to offer up the sacrifices
" according to the laws and ceremonies of " Moses, and to pray daily for the king and " the royal family, and for the welfare and " happiness of the Persian empire. And let " no man presume to do any thing contrary to
" the tenor of this my royal will and procla" mation, upon pain of forfeiting life and
" estate." This was the substance of the king's letter; and the number of those that returned out of captivity to Jerusalem, upon this encouragement and invitation, was forty two thousand four hundred and sixty two persons.

CHAP. II.

The Jews fall to work upon the rebuilding the city and the temple; but Cyrus dying in the mean time, his son Cambyses is prevail'd upon to countermand the design.

THE Jews were no sooner at work upon the foundations of the temple, their hearts being wholly set upon the advancement of the undertaking, but the bordering nations, and especially the Chuthites, which Salmanassar, the king of Assyria, had formerly transplanted from Persia and Media into Samaria, after he had remov'd the Israelites into other habitations: these people, I say, applied themselves to the princes and governors, to whom the care of this enterprize was committed; pressing them with earnest importunities, not to suffer the Jews, upon any terms, to proceed upon the project of rebuilding the city and the temple. These commissioners were prevail'd upon, by the force of bribes and fair words, to slacken their diligence in the dispatch and prosecution of their orders; and during the course of this negligence and delay, Cyrus was so taken up in a war with the Massagetes, (where he lost his life,) that he knew nothing at all of the matter.

Ezra iv.

The Chuthites oppose the rebuilding of the city and temple, Ver. 4, 5.

The work is delay'd, and Cyrus in the interim dies in the war with the Massagetes.

UPON the death of Cyrus ||, Cambyses in course succeeded to the empire, and had an address presented him out of Syria and Phenicia, and from the Ammonites, Moabites, and Samaritans, signed Rathymus, history-secretary; Semelius, scribe; and the magistrates of Phenicia and Syria. The tenor of it was to the purpose following: " This is to give you,
" great Sir, to understand, that the Jews who " were carried away to Babylon, are now re" turned to their former seats, and into our " country, where they are busy upon the re" building of a city that was most deservedly " destroyed for seditious practices. They are " setting up markets, and places of commerce;
" repairing the walls, and renewing the tem" ple; and if they go on at this rate, you " may assure yourself, that they will neither
" pay taxes, nor due allegiance much longer;
" for they are profess'd enemies to kings, and " will never submit to serve, if they once get
" it into their power to command. We ac" count it our duty, Sir, in this heat and zeal,
" for the rebuilding of the temple, to possess
" you before it is too late, with a true state of " the matter. Be pleased only to look back " into the history of your predecessors, and " you shall there find the Jews, from gene" ration to generation, to be the enemies of all " crowned heads, and that this very city was " justly laid waste and desolate, for the crime
" of rebellion; and we are further to present

† Sixty cubits, as we've before observed, were upwards of an hundred an nine English feet; that is, thirty six yards, and one foot.

‡ A Drachma was in value six pence three farthings, and three eighths, of our money; two hundred and five thousand five hundred of which amounted to five thousand nine hundred and eighty two pounds, or thereabouts.

|| This king in Scripture is called Artaxerxes.

" this to your consideration, that if ever they " go through with the re-edifying of this ci" ty, and the finishing the walls, you will " find your communication cut off with Phe-
" nicia and Cœle-Syria."

CHAP. III.

Cambyses puts a stop to the rebuilding of the city and temple. He dies soon after, and the administration of the government is for one year lodg'd in the Magi. Darius is chosen king.

THE king was ill-natur'd, and cross-grain'd enough of himself; but this remonstrance put him out of all patience, as will appear by his following answer:

King Cambyses to Rathymus his historiographer; Belsemus, and Semelius the scribe, and the rest of the inhabitants of Samaria and Phenicia, greeting.

" UPON the reading of your letter of " address, I have caused a diligent search
" to be made into the history of former times,
" according to your request, and I find your " remarks upon the city of Jerusalem to be " true, and that the Jews have ever been a " rebellious, and, as you say, an anti-monar" chical sort of people; turbulent and restless,
" and naturally addicted to innovations. I " find likewise, that their kings have ever " been fierce and violent, and vexatious in " their taxes and impositions, to the highest " degree of oppression, as Phenicia and Cœle-" Syria may bear witness against them; where-Cambyses puts a stop to the rebuilding of the temple, 1 Esdras ii. 25, &c. " fore I do command you to oppose them
" with all your might, in the rebuilding of " the city; for as they grow in power, they " will certainly increase in malice, and be-
" have themselves as seditiously to the present
" governors, as they have done in time past
" to former kings."

RATHYMUS and Semelius had no sooner read this mandate, but away they went with their companions, and took horse immediately for Jerusalem, and a vast multitude of people along with them, where they put an absolute stop to the Jews in the work of the city and the temple; so that it was respited for a matter of nine years; that is to say, to the second year of Darius the king of Persia. Cambyses, after he had reigned six years, and subdued Egypt, died at Damascus, in his return from that expedition. The Magi being cut off, in whose hands, for a full year after his death, the government rested it was afterwards translated by the seven Satrapæ, or eminent families of the Persians, and by common consent conferr'd on Darius the son of Hystaspes.

The work was laid aside for nine years.

Cambyses reign'd six years, and Darius the son of Hystaspes succeeded him.

CHAP. IV.

Darius gives Zorobabel leave to rebuild the city and temple. The Samaritans oppose it; but Darius, on the contrary, promotes the design.

DARIUS, while he was yet a private man, made a vow to God, that if ever he came to the throne, he would send all the holy vessels that were at Babylon back again to the temple of Jerusalem; and it happen'd about that time, that Zorobabel, who was declared the prince or captain of the Jewish captives, came from Jerusalem to Darius. He was an ancient friend and confident of the king's, and taken into a particular trust, with two other great officers, which was an honour that answer'd the height of his ambition.

Darius's vow in favour of the Jews.

Zorobabel the king's ancient friend.

DARIUS, in the first year of his reign, gave a splendid and a most magnificent treat, not only to his own domesticks, but to the princes and nobility of the Medes and Persians, the general officers of all India and Ethiopia, and the commanders, in fine, of a hundred and twenty seven provinces. Upon the breaking up of the company, when the entertainment was over, they retir'd, every man to his own quarter. Darius, in the mean while, finding after a short slumber, that he could not lay himself to rest again, fell into discourses from one thing to another with his three favourite officers, telling them in the end, " That he " had some questions to ask them; and for " their encouragement, he that should give " him the most reasonable and satisfactory an" swer, should have the honour to be cloathed
" in purple, drink in a golden cup, sleep upon
" gold, ride in a chariot with harness of gold,
" wear a silken * Tiara, and a gold chain,
" have the next place to Darius himself in
" the council, and be accounted as one of the " royal blood." After this he put his questions to them in order: to the first, if there was any thing stronger than wine? To the second, the same question again, of the strength of kings; and to the third, what he thought of the strength of women; or finally, of truth, perhaps, above all the rest. Upon the putting of these queries, he made an end of speaking, and left his guards to consider of the matter. In the morning early he call'd together all the princes of the Medes and Persians, with the chief officers and governors, placed himself upon the seat of justice, and caused the three guards of his body to be sent for immediately, to give their opinions severally and publickly upon what he had propos'd.

Several questions put by Darius to his officers, with mighty promises to him that should best resolve them, 1 Esdras iii. 4--12.

The questions were, whether wine, women, or truth, was the stronger, ibid.

THE first began upon the subject of the strength of wine; " Which, says he, with fa" vour of this illustrious assembly, I may take " upon me to pronounce superior to all other " powers whatsoever; for it overthrows the " minds and understandings of all those that " drink too plentifully of it. It puts the " greatest prince into the condition of a child
" in his wardship, that has not wit enough to " look to himself. It sets the slave at liberty,
" even to the forgetting of his chains, and " makes the beggar as rich and as great as an " emperor. It changes and elevates the spi" rits, wherever it takes possession. It enli-
" vens the heavy hearts of the miserable, pays
" all debts, and relieves men in all manner of " necessities. It makes the scoundrel strut
" and swagger like a lord, look and talk big,
" without any regard or fear of either kings
" or captains. It makes men forget their most " intimate familiars and friends, and draw up" on their nearest relations, as if they were " the most hateful of strangers; and then when

The power of kings, 1 Eſdras iv. 1--12.

WHEN the firſt had done dilating upon the topick of wine, the ſecond ſtood up for the power of kings, in preference to all other whatſoever, which he endeavour'd to prove after this manner: " It is beyond diſpute, ſays " he, that God has made man the maſter of " all things under the ſun, ſo far as to com- " mand them, to make uſe of them, and ap- " ply them to the ſervice of mankind as he " pleaſes; but whereas men have only a do- " minion over all other ſublunary creatures, " kings have an authority even over men them- " ſelves, and a right of ruling them by will " and pleaſure. Now he that is maſter of thoſe " that are maſters of all things elſe, hath a " juſt title to an advantage over all the reſt, " and to be accounted inſuperable, having no " earthly thing above him. When princes find " it for their convenience to expoſe the per- " ſons of their ſubjects to wars and dangers, " they obey them, you ſee, without any re- " luctancy or diſpute, let the hazard be what " it will; whether bodies to bodies, or in the " attack of walls or works, forcing of paſſes, " or, as it often falls out, in contending with " nature itſelf; we ſee how frankly they of- " fer themſelves either to kill or to be kill'd, " in the execution of their prince's orders; " and then in caſe of a victory at laſt, the ho- " nour and profit of the whole goes to the " king. This for the military part; and the " ſame reaſon holds in the common buſineſs of " husbandry and tillage, where the country- " man plows, ſows, digs, and ſweats, in the " firſt place, to ſupply the king's ſtores out of " his toil and labour; and whatſoever he com- " mands muſt be obey'd, without any expoſ- " tulation or delay. The king all this time, " while the people are working for him, takes " his fill of all delicacies and pleaſures, ſleeps " in ſecurity and at eaſe, with his guards about " him, under the ſlavery of an indiſpenſible " attendance, and not a man of them who " dares cloſe his eyes while his maſter is at " reſt; for the king's buſineſs is theirs, with- " out any ſort of liberty to attend any other; " ſo that nothing certainly can be ſtronger " than the force of that power which the " whole multitude obeys to all intents and " purpoſes."

Zorobabel upon the power of women, Ver. 13--32.

AFTER this declamation upon the power of kings, Zorobabel took his turn upon the argument of women and of truth; and his diſcourſe was to this following effect: " The " force of wine, ſays he, is not to be denied, " neither is that of kings, that ties up ſo ma- " ny millions of men in one common bond of " allegiance; but the ſuper-eminency of wo- " men, notwithſtanding, exceeds all this; for " the mother of the king was before the king " himſelf, and kings are but the gifts of the " women who brought them into the world; " and women were likewiſe the mothers and " nurſes of thoſe that cultivate our vineyards, " and dreſs our vines. There is not any thing " we can pretend to, but what we either di- " rectly or indirectly receive from them. They " have a hand in the government of all our " domeſtick affairs; nay, in the dreſs and or- " nament of our bodies; and, in fine, God " hath made them ſo neceſſary to us, that " there's no living, nor being without them. " Let a man have never ſo much gold and ſil- " ver, or what is more precious before him, " the ſight of a beautiful woman makes him " ſacrifice all theſe vanities to purchaſe the poſ- " ſeſſion of a beloved beauty. Women have " the power to make us abandon our very " country and relations, and many times to " forget the beſt friends we have in the world, " and forſake all other comforts, to live and " die with them. And it may yet be added, " that when we have compaſſed ſea and land " for all things that are rich and curious in " nature, what does it all come to at laſt, but " a more valuable preſent to a miſtreſs? How " have I ſeen the king himſelf, in the very " meridian of all his glory and titles, ſubmit " to the taking of a box on the ear at the " hand of his concubine Apame, the daughter " of Rabepſaces Themaſinus! And this was " not all neither; for ſhe would take the crown " off from the king's head, and ſet it upon " her own; and he, good man, was ſo complai- " ſant all the while, as to put himſelf into all " ſhapes and humours to pleaſe her, and to be " pleaſant or ſad with her for company, for " fear of giving her any occaſion of offence."

UPON this, the princes and the nobility look'd upon one another, not without ſome admiration at the freedom of the diſcourſe; and ſo Zorobabel proceeded to the laſt point, upon the argument of truth. " I have ſpoken, ſays " he, what I had to ſay upon the ſubject of " women; but when all is done, neither they " nor kings are comparable to the almighty " force of truth; for allowing the vaſt mag- " nitude of the earth, the height of the hea- " vens, and the unſpeakable ſwiftneſs of the " motion of the ſun, and that all this is or- " der'd by a divine providence, it muſt be " granted withal, that God is juſt and true; " and conſequently that truth is of all things " imaginable the moſt powerful, ſince neither " error nor juſtice can prevail againſt it. As " for all other things that paſs for great in the " world, they are mortal and ſhort-liv'd, but " truth alone is unchangeable and everlaſting; " the benefits we receive from it are ſubject " to no variations or viciſſitudes of time and " fortune, but righteous and warrantable, and " without any ſtain of iniquity or reproach."

And finally of truth, Ver. 33--41. A preference given to truth, ibid.

ZOROBABEL had the univerſal acclamation of the whole auditory, for the excellent things he deliver'd; and they all agreed with him, that truth was incorruptible, and the only bleſſing under the ſun that was not liable to alteration and decay; ſo that the king, as an inſtance of his full ſatisfaction in this anſwer to the queſtion, bad him take his choice out of what he had promis'd him, and he would freely grant it him. " For, ſays he, " you ſhall have a preference in my eſteem " above all other men, in proportion to the " ſuperiority of your wiſdom and underſtand- " ing above that of your companions; and " from this time forward you ſhall have the " firſt place of honour next to my own per- " ſon, and ſtand adopted in my affinity and " blood."

Darius is ſo well pleaſed with the ſentence, that he bids him aſk what he would, V. 42. Prefers and adopts him into the royal family, ibid.

ZOROBABEL could not but lay hold of ſo fair an occaſion for the putting of the king in mind

of a former vow he had made; which was, that if ever he came to the crown, he would immediately fall to work upon the rebuilding of Jeruſalem, and the holy temple there, and order a reſtitution to be made of all the ſacred veſſels and utenſils that Nebuchadnezzar had taken away from thence, and carry'd to Babylon. "Now, ſays he, ſince your ma-"jeſty has done me the honour of reputing "me a wiſe man, and allowing me the li-"berty of this election, my humble requeſt "muſt be this, that you will now diſcharge "your vow, and be as good as your word." The king, upon this challenge, raiſed himſelf chearfully from his throne, embraced his adviſer, and kiſs'd him, and ſent away mandates ſoon after to his governors and great officers, to conduct Zorobabel and thoſe that were to go along with him to their journey's end, and to aſſiſt him in the re-edifying of the temple. He wrote letters alſo to the magiſtrates of Phenicia and Syria, to provide carriages for the tranſporting of the Cedar to Jeruſalem, that was cut down in Libanus, and to help them all they could in their main undertaking. The king gave them likewiſe in charge, to exempt all the Jews that ſhould now return out of this captivity, from the burden of any publick tax or duty, and to leave them at liberty in their perſons as well as in their eſtates, without either reſtraint or tribute; commanding alſo the Edomites, Samaritans, and the people of Cele-Syria, to reſtore all thoſe lands to the Jews again that had been formerly in their poſſeſſion, and to contribute fifty talents over and above toward the erecting of the temple, after their own way, and aſſign'd them out of his own proper bounty whatever ſhould be found neceſſary, either in ſacerdotal habits or otherwiſe, for the right adminiſtration of every thing in form. He aſſigned them organs alſo to accompany the voices of the Levites, and order'd a certain proportion of land for the entertainment of the officers and keepers, both of the city and the temple, in the way of an annual penſion; confirming every thing, in fine, that Cyrus had formerly reſolv'd upon about the reſtoring of the Jews, and their holy veſſels.

Darius writes to his governors to be aſſiſtant to the Jews to all manner of purpoſes, V. 47—57.

WHEN Zorobabel had obtain'd this grace from the king, the firſt thing he did after his going out from the place was, with his eyes lift up to heaven, to give God thanks for the honour he had received from the king, in the reputation of his wiſdom, beyond the reſt of his competitors, which he acknowledg'd to be only the diſtinguiſhing effect of his divine goodneſs; concluding his thankſgiving with a prayer for the ſucceſs of his undertaking; and ſo went his way to his countrymen at Babylon with the joyful news of their deliverance. Upon the report of theſe tidings, they join'd immediately in an univerſal thankſgiving for the promiſe of this reſtoration to their native country; and after the ſolemnity of that duty was over, they fell to feaſting, drinking, and making merry, for a matter of ſeven days together, in ſuch a tranſport of joy and jollity as if the day of their redemption and return had been the firſt day of a new life to them. The heads of the tribes made a choice of thoſe that were to go upon this expedition, providing horſes, and other beaſts of burden, and carriages for their wives and children, and taking thoſe troops along with them which Darius had appointed for a convoy. In this manner and company they paſs'd their time merrily upon the way, with pipes and cymbals playing before them, and the whole multitude dancing and rejoicing after the muſick. There was a ſelect number choſen out from all and every of the tribes; but the naming of them in particular would be tireſome to the reader, and interrupt the order of my diſcourſe; ſo that I ſhall only run them over in generals. There were of the tribe of Judah and Benjamin, from twelve years old and upward, four millions ſix hundred and twenty eight * thouſand perſons. After theſe came four thouſand and ſeventy Levites; and a promiſcuous multitude of women and children, to the number of forty thouſand ſeven hundred and forty two. Of the ſtock of the Levites there were a hundred and twenty eight ſingers, a hundred and ten porters; and of others that ſerv'd and aſſiſted in the ſanctuary three hundred and twenty two. There were alſo ſix hundred and fifty two that call'd themſelves Iſraelites, but could not prove their extraction. There were others that had taken wives whoſe genealogy could not be made out, either from the Levitical or ſacerdotal records; and theſe were accounted unqualified for the holy function, to the number of five hundred and twenty five. The train of ſervants that attended them was reckon'd at ſeven thouſand three hundred thirty ſeven; ſinging-men and women, two hundred and forty five; camels, four hundred and thirty five; and other beaſts of carriage, five hundred and twenty five. The leader of this multitude was Zorobabel, the ſon of Salathiel, of the tribe of Judah, and the race of David; and with him was Jeſus, the ſon of Joſedec, and Mardochæus, and Serebæus, which two were choſen to the command, by the ſuffrage of the tribes, and contributed at their own charge † a hundred pound of gold, and || five thouſand pound of ſilver, toward the expence of this expedition. This was the order and the manner of the march of the prieſts and Levites, and that part of the people that went along with them in their return from Babylon to Jeruſalem, the reſt following after by little and little, till in the end they all went back to their own habitations.

Zorobabel carries the Jews at Babylon the tidings of their deliverance.

* The account Joſephus here gives us of the number of Jews who returned from the captivity of Babylon, ſeems to be ſwell'd beyond the bounds of probability. Neither in Ezr. ii. nor in 1 Eſdr. v. where both the names and numbers of all the families that returned are particularly recounted, does the ſum total amount to any thing near what he here affirms them to have been.

† The Hebrew Mina of gold weighed one pound, one ounce, thirteen pennyweights, eighteen grains; and its value in gold was fifty four pounds fifteen ſhillings; an hundred therefore, muſt weigh an hundred and fourteen pounds fifteen pennyweights; and in value, amount to five thouſand four hundred ſeventy five pounds.

|| An Hebrew Mina of ſilver weighed two pounds, three ounces, ſeven pennyweights, twelve grains; and was in value, ſix pounds, ſixteen ſhillings and ten pence half penny; five thouſand therefore, muſt weigh eleven thouſand ſo hundred and ſix pounds three ounces; and in value amounted to thirty four thouſand two hundred and eighteen pounds fifteen ſhillings Engliſh money.

IN

A general assembly indicted at Jerusalem, Ezra iii. 1.

IN the seventh month after their departure from Babylon, Jesus the high-priest, and Zorobabel their prince, sent messengers express all over the land, to summon the people to a general meeting at Jerusalem, who gather'd together with great chearfulness according to the order. Upon this meeting, there was erected an altar to sacrifice upon, according to the appointment of God by his servant Moses, and it was raised upon the same place where it stood before. This proceeding gave a mighty offence to the neighbouring nations, who had a mortal aversion, both to the people, and to whatever they did. This happen'd just upon the feast of tabernacles, according to the Mosaical institution; and after that came the daily oblations, and the sacrifice of the sabbaths, and of the new moons, and of all holy feasts; and all those that had made any vow came likewise to perform it, from the first day of the seventh month.

Money, workmen, and materials for the temple provided, Ver. 7.

THEY enter'd then upon the building of the temple, and expended vast sums of money upon the workmen and builders of all sorts; and upon meat and drink for those that assisted in the carriage of materials. The Sidonians were frank and liberal toward this work, bringing down cedar-trees in abundance from Libanus; and after that, framing them into boats, which they brought into the port of Joppa, as they had been order'd; first by Cyrus, and after him by Darius.

IT was now the second month of the second year after the return of the Jews, when the foundations of the temple being already laid, they began on the first day of December with the superstructure, committing the care of the building to the whole family of the Levites, of twenty years of age and upward, and likewise to Jesus, with his sons and brothers; and to Zoliniel, the brother of Judah, and the son of Aminadab, and to his sons, who were all so diligent and industrious in the discharge of their commissions, that the fabrick went forward beyond expectation. When they were advanced thus far, the priests came and officiated in their habits, with musical instruments; and the Levites, and the sons of Asaph, sung some of the holy hymns of David to the honour of God, according to the first institution. But the priests and Levites, and the elders of their families, who had seen the glory and magnificence of the former house, and computing how little this was in comparison of the other, broke out into tears and lamentations at the thought of it. The common people however that had never seen the former, and consequently could not be troubled at the disproportion, they contented themselves well enough with the present state of things, though the passion of the priests and elders was so great at the same time, that their very sighs and cries were almost as loud as the musick.

THE report of this noise of trumpets, with a confused clamour and mixture of joy and sorrow being brought to the Samaritans, they came running together in great multitudes to learn the meaning of it; and finding that it was occasion'd by the return of the Jews from their captivity at Babylon, and that they were now at work upon the re-erecting of their temple, they went immediately to Zorobabel, and Jesus, with the chief of the tribes, and desir'd that they themselves might likewise be admitted into the undertaking, upon terms in common with the rest. "For, say they, we "worship the same God, value ourselves up- "on the glory of the same profession, and "upon the love and practice of the same re- "ligion, from the very days of Salmanassar, "the king of Assyria, who transplanted us out "of Chuthia and Media, into this land." The answer to the request was, with one voice, that they could not take them into a partnership of the building, because formerly Cyrus, and after him Darius, had assign'd the building of it to their particular care; but that they should have liberty, if they thought fit, to worship there, without exception to any man, and that it should be open to all people indifferently, who had a mind to serve God in it.

The Samaritans propose to join in the undertaking, but cannot be admitted, Ezra iv. 2, 3.

THE Chuthites, (for so we call the Samaritans,) took this refusal so heinously, that they stirr'd up the Syrians to apply themselves to the great men as they did at first, under Cyrus, and afterward under Cambyses, that a stop might be put to the progress of the building, by slackening the diligence of those that were intrusted with the dispatch of the work.

The Chuthites obstruct the work all they can, Ver. 4, 5.

THERE went up to Jerusalem at this time, Sisines, the governor of Syria and Phenicia, and Sarabazanes, with some others, and asked some of the principal men among them, by what authority this temple was to be built? for it look'd liker a castle than a temple, and to what end the walls of the city were made so thick and strong, and the gates so fortified? Zorobabel and Jesus made answer, that they were the servants of the most high God, to whose honour this temple was built, and to his service dedicated by the greatest, the happiest, and the wisest prince that ever sat upon that throne, and that it had stood firm for many ages, till in the end, for the wickedness of their forefathers, the city, by God's permission, was taken, and destroy'd by Nebuchadnezzar the king of Babylon and Chaldea, the temple pillag'd, and laid in ashes, and the people carried away captives into Babylon; but that when Cyrus came to the government of Persia and Babylon, he order'd by his royal proclamation the rebuilding of the temple, and the restoring of all the donatives and vessels that had been taken away by Nebuchadnezzar, which were deliver'd to Zorobabel, and his treasurer Mithridates, to be transported to Jerusalem, and deposited there again in the temple; that by the command of the same king, Abassar was sent to that city to endeavour the finishing of the work out of hand; that upon receipt of the king's letters, he came in all haste, and immediately laid the foundation; and that from that time forward their enemies had been still at work to cast some impediment or other in the way, to obstruct or to delay the design. Now if they pleased they might write to Darius, to the end that upon inspecting the royal records, they might find the whole story to be true as they had told it. Sisines and his companions did not think it reasonable to interrupt the proceeding, without the privity of Darius himself, and therefore they agreed among themselves to write to him immediately about this matter. The Jews were not a little solicitous and apprehensive, for fear the king, upon this application, should countermand the orders he had given, till Aggæus, and Zacharias, two prophets among them at that time, bad them be of good cheer, and fear nothing from the Perſians, for they were certainly inform'd of God's holy will and pleaſure touching that affair. The people did ſo abſolutely depend upon this encouragement, that they wrought harder and harder, without the intermiſſion ſo much as of one ſingle day.

The Samaritans calumniate the Jews to Darius, Eſdras vi. 7--22.

WHEN the Samaritans had written a complaining accuſation againſt the Jews to Darius, objecting againſt them the fortifying of the city, and the erecting of a ſtrong place that look'd more like a citadel than a temple, ſetting forth that this was not at all for the king's ſervice, and ſhewing alſo the epiſtle of Cambyſes, by which he had forbidden and hinder'd it before, as a practice that was neither profitable nor ſafe for the publick; when they had repreſented all this, I ſay, and that the king had receiv'd and conſider'd of theſe letters, he order'd the royal memorials to be conſulted upon this ſubject; and upon the ſearch there was found at Ecbatana, a caſtle in Media, a certain book, wherein was written to this effect:

The decree of Cyrus, in favour of the Jews and their pretenſions, Ver. 24--26.

"IT was ordained by king Cyrus, in the "firſt year of his reign, that the temple of "God ſhould be rebuilt at Jeruſalem, ſixty "cubits in height, and as many in breadth, "and the altar in it; that there ſhould be in "the walls three rows of poliſh'd marble, "and one of wood, of the growth of the "country, and the charge of it to be defray'd "out of the king's treaſury; that the holy "veſſels which Nebuchadnezzar had taken "out of the temple, ſhould be carried back "to Jeruſalem, and reſtor'd; that the ſuper-"intendency of this work ſhould be commit-"ted to Abaſſar, the governor of Syria and "Phenicia, and to his companions, with or-"ders, not to appear at Jeruſalem themſelves, "but to leave the building of the temple to "the Jews, the ſervants of God, and to the "chief of their tribes; and to ſupply them, "however, out of the taxes upon the province, "and to furniſh them for their ſacrifices, with "bulls, rams, lambs, kids, meal, wine, oil, "and whatever elſe the prieſts ſhould deſire, "who were to pray to God for the welfare "and happineſs of the king of Perſia, and of "his people; and whoever ſhould preſume to "act contrary to this mandate, to be forth-"with taken and hang'd up, and his goods "confiſcated, with the addition of a curſe "over and above, that whoever ſhould dare "to oppoſe or forbid the progreſs of this work, "God would ſtrike him with a vengeance, as "a judgment upon him for his iniquity."

WHEN Darius, upon a ſearch into the tranſactions of Cyrus, had inform'd himſelf upon the matter of fact in queſtion, he wrote back to Siſines and his fellow-collegues, to this effect:

King Darius to Siſines, the maſter of his horſe; and to Sarabazanes, and the other magiſtrates with him, greeting.

Darius re-inforces the care of the work, Ver. 27, &c.

"I SEND you a copy of Cyrus's letter, "tranſcribed out of his records, and it is "my will and pleaſure that all things may be "done according to the direction of that ap-"pointment. Fare you well."

THIS letter gave them to underſtand how the king ſtood inclin'd; ſo that Siſines, and the reſt, agreed among themſelves, to comply in all points with the king's orders and command; and undertaking the care of the fabrick, they aſſiſted the Jews, and their magiſtrates and leading men, and carried on the work ſo unanimouſly, that the building was erected according to the command of Cyrus and Darius, and finiſhed within the compaſs of ſeven years; the prophets Aggeus and Zacharias, in the mean time propheſying. In the ninth year of Darius, and the three and twentieth day of the eleventh month, which we call Adar; and the Macedonians Dyſtrus, the prieſts and Levites, with the people of Iſrael, offer'd in ſacrifice, a hundred bulls, two hundred rams, four hundred lambs, and twelve goats, as ſin-offerings for the twelve tribes, in acknowledgment of the bleſſing of their deliverance from captivity into the condition of their former ſtate, and to his holy worſhip again in a new temple. The prieſts and Levites had their porters at every gate, according to the law, the Jews having built galleries round about the temple.

The temple is finiſh'd in ſeven years, Eſdras vii. 5. The dedication of the temple, Ver. 7.

THE feaſt of unleavened bread was now drawing on, and in the firſt month, which the Macedonians call Xanthicus, and we Niſan, the people flock'd up from all places to the city, where they celebrated that feſtival, together with their wives and children, after the practice of their forefathers, with all purity and ſobriety anſwerable to the occaſion. Upon the fourteenth day of the firſt month they held the paſſover, and kept together rejoicing for ſeven days after; offering up ſacrifices and thankſgiving to God, for reſtoring them to the poſſeſſion and enjoyment of their native country, and their antient laws and religion, and for diſpoſing the heart and inclination of the king of Perſia ſo favourably toward them. They ſpared for no coſt in the celebration of this feſtival, and ſo replanted themſelves in Jeruſalem, where they erected an Ariſtocracy; for the ſovereign power was lodg'd in the high-prieſt, till the Aſmonean family, upon a turn of affairs, enter'd upon the government, and turn'd it into a monarchy. Now before the captivity, and for the ſpace of five hundred thirty two years ſix months and ten days, from the time of Saul and David, they were govern'd by kings; and ſo they were likewiſe before, though under the name of judges, and that form of government continued upwards of five hundred years, after the adminiſtration of Moſes and Joſhua. This was the ſtate of the Jews in the reſtoration under Cyrus and Darius.

The paſſover is kept, V. 10.

An ariſtocracy erected.

BUT the Samaritans, who were an envious ſpiteful ſort of people, put them to a great deal of vexatious trouble; for they were powerful and wealthy, and claiming kindred with the Perſians, they valued themſelves upon the credit of their original. They murmured at the taxes that were laid upon them by way of contribution to the ſacrifices, made an intereſt to the ſuperintendent of the works; and, in ſhort, either by themſelves, or by others, they improv'd all opportunities of doing us miſchief. This diſorder, in fine, went ſo far, that the ſenate and the people of Jeruſalem drew up a complaint againſt the Samaritans, and ſent Zorobabel with four more of his collegues upon the embaſſy with it to Darius. When the king came to conſider the crimes that were charg'd upon the Samaritans, he gave them a letter letter back with them for the officers and lieutenants of that province, and the ſenate of Samaria, in words to this purpoſe:

King Darius to Tangar and Sambaba, the maſter of our horſe at Samaria, and to Sadrack Bobelon, and the reſt of their fellow-ſubjects there, ſendeth greeting.

"WHEREAS I am given to underſtand by Zorobabel, Ananias, and Mardochæus, on the part of the Jews, that you ſtand accuſed of interrupting and diſcouraging the rebuilding of the temple, and of refuſing to bear your part in the charge of the ſacrifices, which by my order and command you ought to have done: this is to will and require you upon the ſight of this letter, forthwith to ſupply them out of my treaſury in Samaria, with whatſoever they ſhall want for the uſe of their ſacrifices and worſhip, to the end that they may offer up daily prayers and oblations, both for myſelf and for my people."

Darius reproves them for being ſo croſs to the Jews.

CHAP. V.

Xerxes ſucceeds Darius, and grants to Eſdras whatever he deſires in favour of the Jews. The character and death of Eſdras. Nehemiah gets permiſſion of Xerxes to rebuild the walls of Jeruſalem.

Xerxes ſucceeds his father Darius.

AFTER the death of Darius, his ſon * Xerxes ſucceeded to the government, the heir of his father's piety, as well as of his kingdom; for he made good all that his predeceſſor had done in favour of the Jews and their religion, having a great tenderneſs for both. Joachim the ſon of Jehu was at this time high-prieſt; but the name of the high-prieſt of the Jews that liv'd at Babylon, was Eſdras, a man of a moſt exemplary piety and juſtice, and no man had a fairer reputation among the people. He was ſo well vers'd and skill'd in the Moſaick law, that the king had a particular eſteem for him on that account. Upon a reſolution taken to go to Jeruſalem, and to carry ſeveral of the Babylonian Jews along with him, he deſir'd ſuch a letter from the king as might recommend him to the governors and lieutenants of Syria, which he obtain'd, and the purport of it was this:

Eſdras deſigns for Jeruſalem, with as many of the Babylonian Jews as he can get along with him, 1 Eſdras viii. 5, 6.

Xerxes, the king of kings, to Eſdras the prieſt, and reader of the holy law of God, greeting.

Xerxes gives him letters of licence, recommendation, credit, and authority, Ver. 9--24.

"WHEREAS it is decreed by me and my ſeven counſellors, that what Iſraelites ſoever within my dominions, with their prieſts and Levites, ſhall think fit to bear you company to Jeruſalem, I have, out of my royal clemency, granted them free leave to go to Judea, to worſhip according to the laws of their country; and likewiſe to take along with them all the gold and ſilver, be it never ſo much, that your people all over Babylon ſhall willingly contribute toward that ſervice, for the buying of ſacrifices, to offer upon the altar to your God, and for making ſuch veſſels of gold and ſilver, as you and your brethren ſhall judge meet. It is alſo my will, that what is thus given you, be dedicated to your God; and if you ſhall have occaſion for any thing elſe, uſe your own diſcretion, and ſupply yourſelf out of the publick treaſure; to which end I have already written to the officers that have the cuſtody of it in Syria and Phenicia, expreſly commanding them to furniſh whatſoever Eſdras the prieſt, and the reader of the law of God ſhall deſire, without any delay; and to the end that God may proſper both me and mine, I will have a hundred Côres † of wheat dedicated to God, according to the proviſion of the law; and for the magiſtrates, I do ſtrictly charge and require of them, that they exact nothing from the prieſts, Levites, holy ſingers, porters, or other officers of the temple, and that they lay no burdens upon them. And for yourſelf, Eſdras, I do hereby give you full authority, according to the wiſdom you have received from above, to conſtitute judges that may ſee juſtice done to all people through Syria and Phenicia, that underſtand the law, and are conſcientious in their duty; and at the ſame time do you inſtruct the ignorant, to the end that all tranſgreſſors againſt the law of God, and of the king, may be puniſh'd according to their demerit; ſome with pecuniary fines, others with death, according to the quality of the offence, where it ſhall be found committed, either through contumacy or weakneſs. Farewel."

UPON the receipt of this letter, Eſdras worſhipped God, and gave thanks, aſcribing to his bleſſed providence all the benefits and grace they had received from the king, who ſerv'd but as the inſtrument of that divine and original goodneſs. The Jews of that country were upon this occaſion ſummon'd to a general meeting at Babylon, where the letter was read, and the copy of it tranſcrib'd and ſent away, to be communicated to all the Jews in Media, but Eſdras kept the original to himſelf. This account of the king's wonderful piety towards God, and of the reſpect and kindneſs he had for Eſdras, was a ſurprize of wonderful ſatisfaction to the people; for great numbers of them pack'd up their goods and effects, and haſten'd away to Babylon, with a purpoſe to return to Jeruſalem; but there were then another ſort of Iſraelites, who being accuſtom'd to the place, and ſettled in their habitations, choſe rather to continue where they were; and this is the reaſon that there are only two tribes to be found in Aſia and Europe, under the Roman emperor. As for the other ten tribes, they are all planted beyond the Euphrates, and ſo prodigiouſly encreas'd in number, that they are hardly to be computed. The publication of this recommendatory teſtimonial brought over abundance of people to Eſdras, and not only prieſts and Levites, but temple-porters, ſingers, and other

As for thoſe who had a mind to return out of captivity into their own country, he appointed them a rendezvous at the Euphrates, where, after a three days faſt, and the ſolemnity of vows and prayers for a ſafe and a proſperous voyage, (Eſdras excuſing himſelf from the guard of horſe that was offer'd him, as being already under the protection of the Almighty,) they enter'd upon their journey on the twelfth day of the firſt month, in the ſeventh year of the reign of Xerxes, and got to Jeruſalem in the fifth month of the ſame year, where Eſdras immediately deliver'd out the money he brought, to the prieſts that had the cuſtody of the holy treaſure; ſix hundred and fifty * talents of ſilver, a † hundred talents of ſilver veſſels, twenty ‡ talents of veſſels of gold, and twelve || talents of fine braſs, that was even more precious than gold itſelf. Theſe were the bounties of the king and his friends, and of the Iſraelites that continued in Babylon. When Eſdras had acquitted himſelf of this truſt, he offered unto God burnt-offerings, according to the direction of the law, twelve bulls for the whole people of Iſrael, ſeventy two ſheep and lambs, and twelve goats for a ſin-offering. He communicated alſo the king's letter to the ſtewards and governors of Phenicia and Cele-Syria, who had the Iſraelites in great honour, and readily ſupplied them with whatever they wanted, when they ſaw they could do no other. This was all done by the advice of Eſdras; and I do verily perſuade myſelf, that God's bleſſing went along with it, for the very piety and virtue of the man.

Eſdras's arrival at Jeruſalem, where he delivers up his truſt of [illegible] into the treaſury, 1 Eſdr. viii. 60--96.

By this time they had been a little compoſed and ſettled in their affairs, it came to the ears of Eſdras, that ſome of the prieſts and Levites had departed from the rule of the law, and their duty, in marrying into foreign families, and ſo confounding the ſacerdotal race. Hereupon there was application made to him, that he would ſtand by and ſupport the laws, for fear God in his wrath, for the iniquity of ſome few, ſhould avenge himſelf upon the whole body of the people. Eſdras, upon this complaint, rent his cloaths in a paſſion of ſorrow, tearing the hair off of his head and beard, and caſting himſelf upon the ground, in a deſpair of doing any good in this matter; for there were ſo many great men concern'd in this abomination, that he thought it would be to no purpoſe to lay any injunction upon them to part with their wives and children, ſo that he continued ſtill deſponding, with his face upon the earth. All people that had any ſenſe of goodneſs and reverence for the laws of God and their country, gather'd together about him, to condole with him, and to ſympathize in his ſorrows. Eſdras in the mean time, holding up his hands, ſaid, "Thou, O God, knows I am "aſhamed to lift up my eyes to heaven on the "behalf of theſe people, when I conſider, "that after all the dreadful judgments upon "their anceſtors for their diſobedience, they "will yet go on in the ſteps of their forefathers. WHILE the holy man was in this agony of pious affliction, with a multitude of men, women, and children, gather'd about him, there came to him one Jechonias, a man of quality in Jeruſalem, with a publick confeſſion and declaration of the ſin they were all guilty of, that contrary to the law had married ſtrange women, adviſing him to impoſe an oath upon all that had ſo done, to turn away all their wives and children they had by them; and whoever ſhould refuſe to ſubmit to that law, to be ſeverely puniſhed for it. Eſdras lik'd the counſel, and took an oath of the chief of the prieſts and Levites, and of all Iſrael, to do as was propounded. So ſoon as this was over, he went from the temple to the chamber of Joanan, the ſon of Eliaſib, where he ſpent that whole day without eating any thing, for the trouble that was upon him. The next thing he did, was to command by proclamation, all thoſe people that were now return'd out of captivity, to meet at Jeruſalem in two or three days; and in caſe of any failure, either by neglect or contempt, the penalty to be excommunication, and confiſcation of goods to the holy treaſury. Within three days the two tribes of Judah and Benjamin aſſembled together, on the twentieth day of the ninth month, which the Hebrews call Thebeth, and the Macedonians Appellæus; and when they had placed themſelves in the upper part of the temple, the elders being there preſent, Eſdras ſtood up and told them, "That whereas they "were all guilty of a grievous ſin, that in "contempt of their country's laws had en"ter'd into marriage with ſtrangers, they had "no way to recover God's favour, and to ſe"cure themſelves, but by utterly caſting off "the women they had ſo taken." Whereupon they all cried out with one voice, that they were ready to do it; but the number being very great, the ſeaſon extremely cold, and the buſineſs a matter of importance, they look'd upon it as a thing that requir'd time and conſideration to go through with it; ſo that upon this reflection it was propoſed that a commiſſion of enquiry might be iſſued out to a ſelect number of eminent men and elders, that were innocent themſelves of the fact in queſtion. This motion was receiv'd and approv'd, without any demur or contradiction, and upon the firſt day of the tenth month they enter'd upon the inquiſition, which continued till the firſt day of the month following; and upon the ſcrutiny, they found great numbers of the relations of Jeſus the high-prieſt, as well as of other prieſts and Levites, and the reſt of the Iſraelites, that being involv'd in

This conſideration drew tears from their eyes, and Eſdras taking notice how this compaſſionate ſoftneſs wrought upon them, bad them go home, and ſet their hearts at reſt, for it was a kind of prophaning of the holy ſolemnity, to weep upon a feſtival; wherefore he adviſed them to be rather as free and merry as they could, and to eat, drink, and rejoice, in honour of the day, exhorting them not to make their repentance a mortification to them, any further than to ſecure them for the future from a relapſe into the ſame miſtakes. THERE was among the Jewiſh captives a certain perſon whoſe name was Nehemiah, the butler or the cup-bearer to Xerxes. He was walking one day before Suſa, the capital of Perſia, and happened to hear ſome travellers that had come a long journey together into the city, talking Hebrew one to another. Upon this occaſion he ask'd them from what quarter they came? They told him from Judea. So he asked them further, from one thing to another, how it far'd with the people there, and what news from Jeruſalem? Why truly they made anſwer, that matters went very ill with them; their walls all pull'd down, and their country laid open to the outrages and incurſions of their ſpiteful neighbours; themſelves carried away into captivity, and the highways ſtrew'd every where up and down with dead bodies. Nehemiah could not forbear weeping at this deplorable calamity of his countrymen and kindred; and with his eyes erected toward heaven, cried out to Almighty God, "Lord, ſays he, how long! "how long Lord wilt thou ſuffer thy people "to be trampled upon, and expoſed for a prey "to mankind?" While Nehemiah was at the gate, and in the middle of his lamentations, one brought him word, that the king was ready to go to ſupper; ſo he preſently haſten'd away, all in confuſion and diſorder to his waiting. The king, after ſupper, being ſomewhat more cheerful than before, and taking notice of ſome ſort of heavineſs in the countenance of Nehemiah, asked him what he ail'd. "Alas! Upon this aſſurance Nehemiah clear'd up, came to himſelf again, and bleſſed God and the king upon finding ſo gracious a diſpoſition in his favour. On the day following the king ſent for Nehemiah, and gave him letters of credit to Sadeus, the governor of Syria, Phenicia, and Samaria, with orders and inſtructions to receive and aſſiſt him, as he had promiſed. he diſmiſſed the aſſembly. The authority of Nehemiah made ſuch an impreſſion upon the Jews, that they immediately applied themſelves to their buſineſs. This was the firſt time that the people were ever call'd Jews, or

The firſt time theſe people were call'd Jews.

THE rumour of this enterprize was no ſoon-er brought to the Ammonites, the Moabites, the Samaritans, and the Cele-Syrians, but they were all raging mad at it, and left nothing unattempted, either by force or by treachery, to diſappoint it. They lay in wait for the Jews up and down in ambuſhes, and deſtroy'd a great many of them by ſurprize. They kept ruffians in pay, to attempt upon the perſon of Nehemiah himſelf; plying the people alſo with ſo many falſe alarums, and ſham ſtories of menace and invaſion, that the multitude were within a little of quitting the undertа-king upon the very fright; but Nehemiah ſtood as firm as a rock all this while, and under the ſecurity of a ſlender guard, wrought on without any ſenſe of wearineſs or apprehenſion of danger; and it was not for the ſake of his own ſafety neither, or for the fear of death, that he made this proviſion; but he was very well aſſur'd, that if he himſelf ſhould be cut off, his countrymen would never go through with the building; ſo he gave orders for the future, that all the carpenters, maſons, and other labourers, ſhould work with their ſwords by their ſides, and their bucklers within diſ-tance of having them ready upon occaſion.
He appointed trumpeters alſo to be poſted within five hundred * paces one of another, and upon any diſcovery of an enemy to give the alarum, that the people might have time enough to ſtand to their arms, without any danger of a ſurprize. He went every night the round of the city; and his body was ſo inur'd to hard work, hard fare, and watching, that it was proof againſt all thoſe difficulties;
for he never eat or ſlept more than juſt to ſupport nature. This was his courſe of life for two years and three months; for juſt ſo long were the walls a finiſhing; and this was in the eight and twentieth year, and the ninth month of the reign of Xerxes. Upon the perfecting of the fortifications, Nehemiah and the people which was very unwelcome news to the Syrians, when they came to underſtand it. Nehemiah reflecting upon it, that the city at that time was thin of inhabitants, he perſuaded all the prieſts and Levites thereabouts to take up their habitations in the city, and he would be at the charge of providing them houſes. He order'd likewiſe the people in the country that follow'd husbandry, to carry their tenths into the city for the maintenance of the prieſts and Levites, and that they might not be diverted by any worldly cares from attending the duty of their office. This was readily agreed to on all hands; and by this means it came by degrees to be better peopled. After this, and a great many other glorious actions, worthy of eternal honour, Nehemiah, now in years, departed this life; a man naturally addicted to virtue and juſtice; a perſon of eminent bounty and charity to his countrymen, as may appear by this everlaſting monument of his ge-neroſity and goodneſs, in the walls of Jeruſalem; and this is the hiſtory of what was done

The death of Nehemiah.

CHAP. VI.

Artaxerxes ſucceeds Xerxes. He puts away his wife Vaſhti, and marries Eſther, the niece of Mordecai. Haman preſſes the rooting out of the Jews, and the putting of Mordecai to death; but he is hanged himſelf upon the very gibbet he provided for Mordecai, and Mordecai promoted.

AFTER the death of Xerxes, the government deſcended to his ſon Cyrus, whom the Greeks call † Artaxerxes; in whoſe reign over the Perſians, the whole nation of the Jews, with their wives and children, were in great danger of being utterly deſtroy'd, as ſhall be ſhew'd in due time and place. But ſomewhat ſhould be prieviouſly ſaid of the king himſelf, and how it came to paſs that he married a wife of the royal blood of the Jews, and as the hiſtory delivers it, the protectreſs of our nation. When Artaxerxes had taken the crown upon him, and ſettled the governors of a hundred and twenty ſeven provinces betwixt India and Ethiopia, he made a moſt magnificent and ſumptuous feaſt at Suſa, in the third year of his reign, where he treated his friends and officers, as became the dignity of ſo great a prince; and the ſolemnity laſted a hundred and fourſcore days. There were ſeveral other nations alſo, and their embaſſadors, that aſ-ſiſted at the ceremony of the entertainment ſeven whole days ſucceſſively; and it was or-der'd after this manner: there was a tent erected upon golden and ſilver pillars, cover'd with fine linnen and purple, and large enough to receive ſome thouſands of people. The wine was ſerv'd up in cups of gold and precious ſtones, that were made both for curioſity and delight. There was order given to the waiters, after the Perſian manner, that no man ſhould be forced to drink any more than he had a mind to, and proclamation made all over his dominions, that they ſhould ſet ſome certain number of days apart for the celebration of a festival for the prosperity and safety of the kingdom. Queen Vashti had her apartment also in the palace for the entertainment of the women. She was so wonderfully handsome, that the king had a mind to oblige his guests with the sight of her, and so sent for her to come to him; but the laws of Persia, it seems, will not allow wives to be seen by any beside their domesticks; so that out of a reverence to that prohibition, she refused to go to the king, and not only once, but upon several orders brought her by the eunuchs to the same purpose, she persisted still in the denial. The king took this obstinacy so ill, that after the festival was over, he call'd for the seven commissioners that were expresly appointed for the interpretation of the Persian laws to advise with, what was to be done in this case of his wife's contumacy and disobedience; complaining that it was not only once, but over and over that she refused to come to him; and so he desired to know what the law directed in that case. One of them whose name was Muchæus, gave his opinion, "That it was not only an affront "to himself in the matter of fact, but a pre- "sident of dangerous consequence to all his "subjects in general, whose wives would be "apt to despise their husbands too, and by "that contempt provoke them to lewd courses, "if this exemplary contumacy of the queen's "against so mighty a king should pass unpu- "nish'd; concluding, that as it was a heinous "offence, so it ought to be encounter'd with "an answerable severity; and that nothing "less would satisfy, than the banishing of "Vashti from the king's court and presence "for ever; and this to be done also by pro- "clamation, and another taken into her place." The king was so divided betwixt the love he had for the queen, and the respect he had for the law, the one being against their parting, and the other against their living together, that he was miserably distracted what to do in this difficulty of acting against his inclination. While he was in this anxiety of thought, his friends plied him with good offices and counsels, to divert him from the weakness of making himself miserable for the unprofitable love of one woman, when he might have the greatest beauties upon the face of the earth at his devotion, if he thought fit to command them; so that he had no more to do, but to get a sight of her, and take her for his wife, that he had most a mind to, out of the whole sex; variety and a new love would quickly wear out the fondness of a former, and a little custom and conversation would bring him to himself again.

Vashti the queen invited to him, Esther i. 10, 11.

She refuses to come, though sent for over and over, Ver. 12.

The king advises with his council what to do in the case, V. 13-15.

The king yields, Ver. 21, 22.

THE king, upon second thoughts, was well enough pleased with the advice, and sent commissioners immediately over all his dominions to take a view of the most celebrated beauties they could find, and bring them up to him. They were very punctual and diligent in the execution of their charge; and among others, they found a maid in Babylon, whose name was Esther. Her father and mother were both dead, and she brought up under the care of her uncle Mordecai, who was of the tribe of Benjamin, and a principal man among the Jews. This virgin was so much beyond all the rest, for the graces of her beauty and person, that she was the admiration of every one who saw her. She was committed to the care of one of the eunuchs, where she was treated with all possible delicacy and respect; that is to say, with the richest of essences and perfumes, and all other ornamental curiosities that are made use of in courts by great ladies, to make them more agreeable and charming. At this rate was Esther treated for the space of six months, in company with four hundred virgins, after which time, being thus prepared for the king's bed, he had every day one of them brought him, whom he received into his arms, and then sent back again to the same eunuch. But when it came to Esther's turn, he was so transported with the love of her company and conversation, that he took her to himself for his lawful wife, and celebrated the nuptials in the seventh year of his reign, and the twelfth month, which is called Adar, sending his messengers every where up and down to proclaim the solemnity of a marriage-festival. As for the Medes and Persians, and the great men of other nations, the king himself entertain'd them at the wedding-feast, for the space of one whole month; and upon his wife's entering into the palace, he placed the crown upon her head, and so liv'd with her without ever enquiring after her country, or her extraction. Her uncle remov'd from Babylon to Susa, where he would be often waiting at the king's gate, and still inquisitive after Esther's welfare, who was equally dear to him, as if she had been his own child.

Esther is brought in to supply the place of Vashti; an orphan, and under the care of her uncle Mordecai, a Benjamite, Esther ii. 6--9.

The king falls in love with Esther, and takes her to wife, ibid.

THE king at this time pass'd an ordinance, that none of his domesticks should presume, while he was sitting upon his royal throne, to come to him, unless they were call'd or sent for, upon pain of losing their heads for it; and there were officers with their axes still at hand to do the execution. The king in the mean time had a golden sceptre in his hand, and whensoever he had a mind to save any of those that came uncall'd, he held that sceptre forth, and upon their touching it, they were exempted from the penalty; and so much for that at present.

None to approach the king upon his throne uncall'd, upon pain of death, Esther iv. 11.

THERE broke out a little after this a conspiracy that was form'd betwixt Bigthan and Teresh, two of the chamberlains, or eunuchs, against the person of the king. Barnabazus, a servant of one of them, and a Jew by extraction, discover'd this treachery to Mordecai, the king's uncle; and he, by the hands of Esther, to the king himself, who had such an apprehension of the thing, that he put the criminals to the question, and upon conviction, they were both deliver'd up to justice. The king gave Mordecai no other reward for this discovery, than by appointing the service and the deliverance to be registe'rd upon the record, and the allowing him admittance into the palace, with the same freedom and privilege as one of his domesticks.

HAMAN, the son of Ammedatha, an Amalekite, being now advanced by the king, and coming frequently to court, the Persians, as well as strangers, paid him the greatest reverence imaginable still in his passage; and it was also the king's pleasure and command that it should be so. Mordecai was the only person that did not bow to him, being a ceremony contrary to the practice of his country, which did not allow of that manner of respect. Haman taking notice of this singularity in Mordecai, asked him what countryman he Haman slighted by Mordecai, Esther iii. 1, 2.

Haman finding Mordecai to be a Jew, he was? And finding him to be a * Jew, broke out into a violent exclamation, at the insolence of such a scoundrel; that when all the natives and the free-born Persians made no difficulty of doing him that honour, this Jew, who was no better than a slave, should presume to affront him. In this rage, he took up a desperate resolution to be reveng'd upon Mordecai; and the hatred he had for the Jews was so mortal, that it was not enough, he thought, to wreak a vengeance upon the person of Mordecai alone, without destroying the whole race of the Jews at once; not forgetting at the same time, that the Amalekites his countrymen, had been formerly beaten out of their land, and utterly exterminated by the Jews. In the heat of this outrageous indignation, Haman hastens to the king, and accosts with a complaint in his mouth against the Jews, as a vile generation of people in every respect, insociable in their humours, singular in their manners, given up to the superstitious laws and ceremonies scattered up and down in all quarters of his dominions, and men that shew themselves in their practices and conversations, the common enemies of mankind. "Now Sir, (says Haman,) if you "will lay the greatest obligation in the world "upon your subjects, you must order this sort "of men to be rooted out from among your "people, without sparing so much as one cap-"tive, or one servant, in the whole number. "And for our security, that you shall not suf-"fer by it in your revenue, I will be answer-"able for † forty thousand talents of silver, "to your treasury, out of my own estate; for "I shall not value any diminution of my own "particular fortune, provided that your do-"minions may be clear'd of this lewd sort of "people." The king told Haman, upon this proposal, that he would leave the Jews to be dealt with according to his discretion, and remit the money over and above. Haman, immediately upon this, publish'd an edict in the king's name, and sent it abroad thorough all his dominions, to this effect:

Haman calumniates the Jews to the king; and moves to have all the Jews extirpated out his dominions. V. 8--9.

Haman issues out a proclamation in the king's name, to have them all put to the sword, man, woman, and child. Esther xiii. 1--7.

The great king Artaxerxes to the hundred and twenty seven governors of the provinces betwixt India and Ethiopia, greeting.

"WHEREAS it has pleased God to "give me the command of so many "nations, and a dominion over the rest of the "world, as large as I my self desire, I being "resolved to do nothing that may be either "tyrannical or grievous toward my people, "and to bear a gentle and an easy rule over "them, with an eye to the preserving of their "peace and liberties, in the first place, and "to settle them in a state of tranquillity and "happiness not to be shaken. All this I have "taken in mature consideration; and being "given to understand, by my trusty and well "beloved friend and counsellor, Haman, a "person of a try'd faith, prudence and jus-"tice, and whom I esteem above all others, "that there is a mixture of a sort of inhuman "people among my subjects, who take upon "them to govern by their own laws, and to "prescribe ways to themselves in contempt "of publick order and government; men "deprav'd, both in their customs, and in "their manners; and enemies, not only to "monarchy, but to the methods of our royal "administration: This is therefore to will "and require, that, upon notice given unto "you by Haman (who is to me as a father) "of the persons intended by this my procla-"mation, you put all the said persons, men, "women and children to the sword, without "any commiseration or favour, in a strict "pursuance of my decree: And it is my far-"ther command, that you put this in execu-"tion upon the thirteenth day of the twelfth "month of this present year; to make but "one day's work of the destruction of all "mine and your enemies, in order to a future "peace and security all our lives after."

This edict was quickly spread from town to town thorough the whole empire, and the people made themselves ready accordingly to do execution upon the Jews at the day appointed; and there was the same disposition to mischief at Susa, the king's place of residence, as elsewhere. The king and Haman, all this while pass'd their time in drinking, feasting and making merry: But the people of the town were under very dismal apprehensions, at the thought of so barbarous a massacre at hand.

So soon as Mordecai came to be informed of the tenor and intent of this proclamation, he tore his garments, put on sackcloth, and went up and down the town with ashes on his head, exclaiming against the horrid injustice of that murderous and bloody design upon the Jews. At this rate he went raving from one place to another, till he came at last to stop before the gate of the king's palace; for there was no entrance allow'd to any man in that habit. The resentment and behaviour of the Jews was the same in all other places, as well as here, upon the communication of the king's orders: that is to say, they were every where overwhelmed with lamentations and despair. When it came to the queen's ear, that Mordecai was before the gate of the palace in that forlorn habit, she was troubled at the report, and sent one out to him to change his Garment; but his answer was, that he could not do it, till the cause was first remov'd that made him take it up. It fell out that Hatach, one of the king's eunuchs, was at that time in the queen's presence; so she call'd him to her, and presently sent him out to inform himself what had befallen Mordecai, that he should put himself into such a dress, and then refuse to quit it again at her request. The eunuch put these questions to Mordecai, who gave him the whole story of the business at length, and in order, how the king, at the instigation of Haman, had issued out his royal proclamation thorough all his dominions, for the extirpating of the Jews,

† We take the talent here meant to be the Babylonian, which was much inferior to the Hebrew, and weighed only sixty six pounds, six ounces, eight pennyweights, and eighteen grains, and its value in silver amounted to no more than one hundred ninty nine pounds, twelve shillings, and two pence farthing; forty thousand therefore must weigh two million six hundred sixty one thousand six hundred and ten pounds, and amount in value to seven million nine hundred eighty four thousand three hundred and seventy five pounds English money: But the sum here seems greatly exaggerated by Josephus; for in Esther iii. 9. there is mention made of no more than ten thousand talents of silver, that Haman offer'd to pay the king upon this account.

and how vaſt a ſum of money Haman had offer'd by way of compoſition, for leave to do it. Mordecai gave him a true copy of the edict from the original, to be deliver'd to the queen; deſiring farther, that ſhe would be pleas'd to make an humble application to the king upon this matter, and to intercede with him on their behalf; for the lives of the whole nation were in queſtion, and this was not a time to ſtand upon punctilio's, or neceſſities of ſtate; for Haman, that was as the king's right hand, would never leave calumniating the Jews, and exaſperating the king againſt them, till he had gain'd his point. Upon the eunuch's giving the queen this account of the matter, ſhe ſent Mordecai word back again, "That it was a capital crime to "break in upon the king when he was upon "his throne of ſtate, without being call'd to "attend him, unleſs he ſhould vouchſafe to "hold forth his golden ſcepter in token of "his pardon." When Mordecai heard this, he preſs'd the queen once again, by the ſame meſſenger as before, telling her, that it was not her own perſonal ſafety that was now the queſtion, but the ſecurity of the whole race; adviſing her likewiſe to have a care how ſhe ſlipt that opportunity of doing ſo neceſſary and charitable an office; and to aſſure her that God himſelf would relieve them, even if ſhe ſhould neglect to do it: And that ſhe and her family might live to be at the mercy of thoſe that ſhe now deſpiſed. Eſther then made uſe of the ſame meſſenger back again to her uncle, to call an aſſembly of the Jews together at Suſa, and to indict a three days faſt for the ſafety of the queen; that ſhe and her ſervants would do the like; and that after that preparation, ſhe was reſolved to go to the king, in deſpite of all prohibition and danger: And that if ſhe muſt die, ſhe would frankly expoſe her life in that ſervice. Mordecai did as the queen order'd him; appointed a publick faſt, and humbled himſelf in ſupplications to Almighty God, to defeat the malice of their enemies; and according to his wonted goodneſs, to extend his mercy to penitent offenders, and finally to deliver them from the deſtruction denounced againſt them: Repreſenting that "it was "not for any fault of their own that they "were expoſed to this extremity, but it was "the pride of Haman's ſtomach, that thought "it an indignity offer'd to himſelf, in the "refuſal of that adoration to him, that was "only due to God:" And that a whole nation was now to be rooted out, becauſe they would not be corrupted into a violation and contempt of the divine laws. The devotions of the whole multitude were all upon the ſame ſubject too, deſiring God to vouchſafe them his protection, and to avert that dreadful judgment from the Iſraelites, that now hung over their heads. The queen herſelf worſhipped likewiſe with her face proſtrate upon the ground, after the manner of her country, in a mourning weed, and impoſing upon herſelf a three days abſtinence from either meat or drink, or any other ſenſual ſatisfaction, beſeeching God to move the king's heart, in favour of her mediation for a miſerable and perſecuted people, by rendering both her words and her perſon more acceptable than ever, upon this fatal extremity, to the confuſion of their enemies, and of all their malicious deſigns upon her poor countrymen.

AFTER three days ſpent in a fervent and pious importunity for mercy and compaſſion from above, the queen put on her royal apparel; and with her two handmaids, leaning gently upon the one, and the other bearing up her train ſhe advanced towards the king; her face being cover'd with ſuch a bluſh as expreſs'd both grace and majeſty together, but at the ſame time not without ſome mixture alſo of doubtful apprehenſion; for upon the ſight of the king mounted on his throne, and the ſparkling glory of his robes, that were all over embroider'd with gold, pearl and precious ſtones, ſhe was taken all of a ſudden with a trembling at ſo ſurprizing a ſpectacle: And upon fancying over and above, that the king look'd upon her as if he were a little uneaſy, and out of humour, ſhe fell into the arms of one of her maids in a downright ſwoon †. This accident, by the intervention of God's holy will and providence, put the king into a fright, for fear ſhe might not come to herſelf again; ſo that making what haſte he could from his throne, he took her into his arms, and with the kindeſt words that could be, gave her this comfort, that no advantage ſhould be made of the law to her prejudice, though ſhe came without calling; for that was a decree that extended only to ſubjects; wherein ſhe was not at all concern'd, whom he look'd upon as his companion and partner in the empire. With theſe words he put his golden ſcepter into her hands, and laying it gently upon her neck, ſecur'd her from any farther fear or danger. Upon this tenderneſs both of love and aſſurance, coming to the uſe of her ſpeech and reaſon again, "Sir, "(ſays ſhe) it is impoſſible for me to expreſs "the manner of this ſudden ſeizure: But I "had no ſooner the awful appearance of "your ſacred perſon and majeſty in my eye, "but my heart fail'd me." The queen accompany'd theſe words with ſo languiſhing an accent, and ſo weak a voice, that the lively repreſentation of what ſhe felt made the king ſtill more ſolicitous to comfort her; which he did in terms ſo explicit, that he bad her ask him any thing to the one half of his kingdom, and that it ſhould be given her. Eſther told him that her requeſt was only this, that he would be pleaſed to take part of a treat with her that day; which ſhe had provided for him, and permit Haman to come along with him. Her ſuit was granted, and they both came; and when the king was in his cups, and in good humour, he call'd upon his wife as before, to ask what ſhe pleaſed within that compaſs, and it ſhould be granted her. The queen begg'd the king's favour for the ſame honour again the day following at another entertainment, bringing Haman along with him once again; and ſhe would then take the freedom, ſhe ſaid, to preſent him her petition. overjoy'd at it, to find himself the only man that was singled out upon so honourable an occasion, to bear the king company at a treat: But in his return homeward it was his fortune to see Mordecai the Jew in the king's palace; and taking notice that he paid him no sort of reverence, he went with his wife Zerish with a knot of his friends about him, and there told them the whole story, how much he was in the good graces of the king and the queen; how he had supp'd with them that day, upon a particular invitation, and was to be with them to-morrow again upon the same account. "But still after all this "(says he,) the sawcy stiffness of the Jew "Mordecai gives me no small uneasiness." Why then, says Zerish, let me advise you what to do. Order a gallows of * fifty cubits high to be immediately set up, and get the king's leave to-morrow morning to hang up Mordecai upon it. Haman took his wife's counsel, and commanded his people to erect such a gallows in his own palace, which he design'd for the execution of the Jew; and the gibbet was set up accordingly. But God, who foresees and orders all events, disappointed wicked Haman in all his impious hopes and purposes; for that very night, the king finding that he could not sleep, and accounting it time lost to lie idle and waking, chose rather to employ his thoughts upon somewhat that might turn to the advantage of his government, and so commanded his secretary to bring him his memorials and papers of state, as well modern as ancient, and to read the contents of them. The king found upon the reading of them, the name of a person that had great honours and possessions given him, as a reward for a glorious and a remarkable action: And so likewise of another, that made his fortune by the bounties of his prince for his fidelity; coming at last to the particular story of the conspiracy of the two eunuchs, Bigthan and Teresh against the person of the king; and of the discovery of this treason by Mordecai. The secretary read it over, and was passing forward to the the next; but the king bad him hold, and ask'd him if that person had any reward given him for his service. The other made answer, that there was no reward mentioned in the relation, and so the king bad him stop there; and inquire of the waiters what time of night it was: And answer being brought that it was break of day, he bad his secretary go see if any of his friends were at the palace-gate, and bring him word; when he came to look, whom should he find there but Haman, who was earlier up than ordinary, for fear of being too late with his petition to the king against the life of Mordecai. Word being brought to the king that Haman was at the gate, he ordered him to be call'd in; and upon his entrance into the lodging, the king spoke to him after this manner: "I know "(says he,) that you are the kindest friend "to me in the world; and therefore I would "ask your counsel, what mark of honour you "would advise me to bestow upon the person "that I have the greatest obligation to, imaginable; and I would do it with a respect "to my own royal dignity, as well as to my "affection." Haman made no doubt of finding his own interest in his resolution to this question, presuming that this character could not be intended of any other than of himself: So Haman gave his opinion, that the king should cloath the man whom he desired to honour, with own his royal apparel, mount him upon his own horse, make him a present of a golden chain, and then cause some one or other of his particular confidents and friends to march before him, as a herald, and make proclamation all over the city: That "thus "shall it be done to the man that the king "vouchsafes to honour." Now Haman suggested this counsel to the king, in confidence that he would adjudge this honour to him, and no other; and the king was highly pleased with the motion: "Wherefore go (says "he,) and take the horse, the apparel and the "chain, and when you have found out Mordecai the Jew, equip him in these accoutrements; and when he is mounted, do you "march before him in the quality of an "officer, to make the proclamation; for you, "being my particular friend, are the fittest "man both to advise withal, and to execute "your own counsel. I will do this honour "to Mordecai, because I am indebted to him "for my life." This order being intirely unexpected, struck Haman like a thunder-bolt: But in this confusion, however, he durst do no other than execute it; and so was oblig'd to go with the horse, habit, and the gold chain to look for Mordecai; and finding him at the palace-gate in his rags of humiliation, he bad him strip himself of his sackcloth, and put on that purple. Now the Jew, knowing nothing of the matter, took the whole ceremony for a mock, and treated Haman in plain terms, as a mean insolent wretch, to insult at that rate over the miserable: But upon a farther reasoning of the matter, Haman convinced him at last, that the king had order'd this honour to be done him in recompence of the service he had render'd him in the saving of his life from the conspiracy of the two eunuchs: and being thus convinced, he put on the royal purple, and the golden chain, mounted the king's horse, and took the tour of the city; Haman making proclamation before him, Thus shall it be done unto him that the king honours. Mordecai, after this, went to the king; Haman sneaking away shamefully to his own house, where he entertain'd his sorrowful wife and friends, with the lamentable account of what had pass'd. Upon the hearing of circumstances, they found that there was no revenging themselves upon Mordecai, for God had taken him into his protection.

As they were in the middle of this discourse, the king's eunuchs came from Esther, to call away Haman presently to supper. One of them, whose name was Sabuchadas, taking notice of a gibbet that was erected there in the court, ask'd one of the servants the meaning of it, and understanding that it was prepared for Mordecai, the queen's uncle, whom Haman had designed to beg of the king for execution, he made no more words of it. As they were at supper, and all parties pleased with the entertainment, the king put the former day's propoſal over again to the queen, with an aſſurance, that let her ask what ſhe pleaſed, it ſhould not be denied her. Upon that occaſion ſhe fell into a deploring, ſad diſcourſe, upon the miſerable ſtate and danger of the Jewiſh nation; and how ſhe herſelf, and her countrymen were all deſign'd for deſtruction, giving the king to underſtand that this was the ſubject ſhe deſir'd leave to ſpeak upon. "She did not deſire, ſhe ſaid, to give any in- "terruption to his affairs of ſtate; or if it had "been ſo order'd that her countrymen might "have only been ſold for ſlaves, this calami- "ty might have paſs'd yet for tolerable; ſo "that ſhe had only this ſuit to move him in, "that he would be pleaſed to put a ſtop to "the imminent deſtruction that was otherwiſe "to be executed upon the whole race." The king call'd out preſently to know who it was that had any ſuch deſign a foot. The queen made anſwer, without mincing the matter, "That Haman was the author of that advice, "and that he did it out of an impulſe of pure "malice to the people." This diſcourſe put the king out of humour, and ſo he withdrew from the treat into the garden. Haman by this time found the ſtorm a coming, and began to apply himſelf to the queen, with acknowledgments of his miſtakes, and deſire of pardon; and caſting himſelf upon the bed by her as in a way of humiliation and reſpect. The king returning at the ſame time, and ſeeing Haman in that poſture upon the bed, was more irritated by that circumſtance, than by all the reſt, calling him the baſeſt and the wickedeſt of men, for ſo inſolent an attempt upon the honour of his wife. Theſe words were accompanied with ſuch a fierceneſs of tone and action, that Haman was directly out of his wits at the hearing of them, and had not one ſyllable to ſay for himſelf. Upon this the eunuch before mentioned told the king of a gibbet of fifty cubits in height, that Haman had ſet up for Mordecai in his own court, as he underſtood by one of his ſervants, when he was there to give him an invitation to ſupper. The king immediately took up a reſolution of inflicting the ſame puniſhment upon Haman, that he had prepar'd for Mordecai, and ſo order'd him immediately to be hang'd upon the ſame gibbet. I cannot paſs over this wonderful harmony of providences, without a remark upon the almighty power and the admirable juſtice and wiſdom of God, not only in bringing Haman to his deſerved puniſhment, but entrapping him in the very ſnare he had laid for another, and turning a malicious device upon the head of the contriver.

THUS was the end of Haman, the wicked abuſer of the king's goodneſs and bounty. His body was deliver'd up to juſtice, and his eſtate given to the queen. The queen had by this time made it known to the king that Mordecai was her kinſman; ſo that he ſent for him, and deliver'd him the ſame ring that Haman had been entruſted with before. The poſſeſſions of Haman, that the king had granted to the queen, ſhe beſtow'd upon Mordecai, and then made it her requeſt to his majeſty, that he would deliver the Jews out of that apprehenſion for their lives, that was yet upon them, minding him of the letters that Haman the ſon of Ammedatha, had diſperſed in his name all over the empire, making declaration that her own life depended upon the ſafety of her country and her relations. The king gave her his royal word, that nothing ſhould be done to the Jews without her privity and good-will; and he gave her farther liberty to write what ſhe thought fit, concerning the Jews, in his name, and the letters ſhould be ſign'd and ſeal'd, and diſpers'd by his order throughout all his dominions; and when they ſhould once come to be confirm'd by the royal ſignature, their authority would paſs without any diſpute or contradiction; wherefore the king appointed his ſcribes and ſecretaries to attend him, commanding them to write letters on the behalf of the Jews to the magiſtrates of all the nations that lie betwixt India and Ethiopia, under the command of a hundred and twenty ſeven governors. Of which letter this is a true copy:

"WHEREAS it is a common practice "in the world for men that are ad- "vanced rather upon favour than merit, not "only to inſult over their inferiors, but to "fly in the faces even of their benefactors "themſelves, and as much as in them lies, to "extinguiſh all ſenſe of gratitude or good- "nature in human ſociety; perverting alſo out "of a pride and impotency of mind, the power "and credit that was given them, to the diſ- "honour of their patrons, from whom they "receiv'd it; and all under ſuch an appearance "too, as if they thought God himſelf could "not ſee through the diſguiſe; beſide that, it "is no new thing neither, for ſtate-minions "to gratify their own private paſſions to the "prejudice of their maſters, by miſrepreſent- "ing things and men, and calumniating the "innocent; and by theſe ill offices with the "prince, to put honeſt men in danger of their "lives. I do not ſpeak this upon hiſtory or "hearſay, but upon the certainty of what I "have ſeen with my own eyes, and upon "proof, not rumour; wherefore let no heed "be given for the future to bare accuſations, "or, in truth, ſlanders rather; but let the "fact be ſtrictly examin'd, and the perſon ac- "cuſed be either acquitted or puniſh'd, as he "ſhall be found innocent or guilty.

"IT is well known that Haman, the ſon of "Ammedatha, was by extraction an Amalc- "kite, and not a Perſian, and with what ten- "derneſs of affection and hoſpitality I receiv'd "him; what honours I conferr'd upon him, "even to the degree of calling and eſteeming "him as my father, commanding all my ſub- "jects to pay a reverence, next in order to "what they ought to my own perſon. Now "this man was ſo intoxicated with the fumes "of his vanity and weakneſs, that paſſing all "the meaſures of ſobriety and duty, he im- "proved the power I gave him, ſo far as in "him lay, toward the ſupplanting of me in "my kingdom, and the deſtroying of that "perſon by treacherous practices, to whom I "ſtand indebted for my life and government. "I ſpeak of Mordecai, my benefactor and "preſerver, and of my deareſt wife the queen "likewiſe, whom I tender as the one half of "my own ſoul, and my partner in the empire; "his plot being in the firſt place perfidiouſly

" Now for ſo much as the lewd deſigns of " prove of their inſtitutions, ways, and man" ners, as a people worſhipping the ſame God,

" to whoſe bounty and protection our family
" ſtands indebted both for the poſſeſſion and " preſervation of our empire. It is therefore " our royal pleaſure, by theſe preſents, not " only to diſcharge the ſame people of all the " licious perſecution, with his whole family,

" to be put to death upon a gibbet before the " gates of Suſa, as a moſt neceſſary ſacrifice
" to divine juſtice.

" This is alſo farther to will and require
" you, that you forthwith diſpatch copies of " theſe our letters through all our dominions,
" permitting the Jews to live in a peaceable
" enjoyment of their own laws, and that you " give them your aid and aſſiſtance toward the " vindicating of themſelves upon thoſe that " ſpitefully and injuriouſly oppreſs'd them in " their adverſity; and whereas the preciſe
" time appointed for the utter extermination
" and deſtruction of theſe people was to have " been upon the thirteenth day of the twelfth " month, or the month of Adar, it is our
" pleaſure, that you pitch upon the ſame month
" and day for the work of their deliverance,
" as a circumſtance the moſt agreeable to the " methods of God's power and juſtice, not " doubting but that this way of proceeding
" will be much to the ſatisfaction of all our " friends, and the example of it ſtand upon " record to poſterity, for a monumental cau" tion to all traitors in time to come; and
" be it likewiſe known to all our cities,
" towns, and people herein concerned, that " what perſon ſoever ſhall preſume either by
" diſobedience, or neglect, to act in any thing
" contrary to the tenor of this our imperial " command, he ſhall be liable to military ex" ecution by fire and ſword, whereof all our " ſubjects are to take warning, and the Jews
" to be in readineſs at the time aſſigned, to
" do themſelves right upon their enemies."

THERE were couriers immediately diſpatch'd with theſe letters to all quarters. Mordecai in the mean while coming forth out of the palace dreſſed in royal robes, a crown, and golden chain, the Jews preſently interpreted his appearance in a common bleſſing to them all; and the publication of the king's letters through all the towns and cities of his dominions, diffuſed ſuch an univerſal joy amongſt them, that every man look'd as if he were animated with a new ſoul; nay, and this grace of the king had ſo powerful an influence and effect, even upon other nations, that many of them circumciſed themſelves, in hopes they might eſcape better under the diſguiſe of Jews, who were highly elevated by the king's aſſigning them the ſame day for their revenge that had been deſigned for their execution; that is to ſay, the thirteenth day of the twelfth month, which the Hebrews call Adar, and the Macedonians Dyſtrus. Upon the obtaining of this mandate, the princes, governors, magiſtrates, and lieutenancies did all pay a more than ordinary reverence to the Jews, for fear of the power of Mordecai.

The ſame day aſſign'd to the Jews for their revenge that was appointed for their deſtruction, Eſther ix. 1--11.

UPON the publiſhing of this edict, the Jews put five hundred of their enemies to the ſword at Suſa, and the king ſhew'd the queen the number of them; but there was no account taken as yet of thoſe that were ſlain elſewhere; ſo he propoſed it to her, if ſhe would require any thing more, for he was reſolved to deny her nothing. Her requeſt was then, that the Jews might have one day's revenge more upon their enemies, and that the ten ſons of Haman might be hang'd upon the gallows, which the king granted alſo for the day following, without any heſitation or delay; ſo that they gather'd in troops together upon the fourteenth, and killed near three hundred more of their adverſaries, without ſo much as touching any of their goods; but upon the ſame heat in other places up and down the empire, they deſtroy'd ſeventy five thouſand of thoſe whom they reputed to be their enemies. This ſlaughter was made upon the thirteenth, and on the day following they feaſted; and ſo at Suſa alſo they celebrated the fourteenth of the following month as a feſtival; and theſe days are ſtill obſerved by the Jews with the ſame ſolemnity, regaling one another by way of compliment, with ſome preſent or portion of the entertainment. Mordecai, upon this, ſent his orders to all the Jews under the dominion of Artaxerxes, requiring them to obſerve thoſe days for feſtivals, and to tranſmit the obſervance of them to poſterity, and ſo to make it everlaſting, for the perpetual memory of the thing; for it was but reaſonable to celebrate their deliverance by a ſolemnity of rejoicing upon the ſame day that was by the treachery of Haman appointed for the maſſacre, and to make it a day of thankſgiving, in memory as well of their being freed from the danger, as of having their enemies given up into their hands. Upon this account it is that thoſe days are obſerv'd, which they call Phruræa, or Purim; that is to ſay, feaſts of conſervation. Mordecai all this while was a man of great power with the king, both in reſpect of his adminiſtration, being near his perſon, and as an aſſiſtant and companion to the queen. The affairs of the Jews proſper'd under their direction and favour beyond all expectation; and let this ſuffice for the hiſtory of our people under Artaxerxes.

John, the high-prieſt, kills his brother Jeſus in the temple. Manaſſes, the brother of Jaddus the high-prieſt, marries the daughter of Sanballat.

deceaſe came on in courſe his ſon John, who was the occaſion of the violation, and the prophanation of the temple afterward by Bagoſes, the commander in chief of the troops of Artaxerxes, impoſing a tribute alſo upon the Jews, obliging them to allow out of the publick treaſure, fifty * drachma's a day for every lamb they ſacrificed, before they enter'd upon their daily offerings, which impoſition came thus to be brought on. John had a brother whoſe name was Jeſus, and Bagoſes being very much his friend, took upon him the advancing of Jeſus to the pontificate. Jeſus depended ſo much upon this aſſurance, that he took the liberty to enter into a diſpute with his brother, in the temple itſelf, upon this ſubject; and the conteſt went ſo far, that his brother, in a rage, ſet upon him and kill'd him; the greateſt affront to religion certainly that ever was committed, eſpecially by a prieſt; and for the farther aggravation of the ſcandal, it was beyond all preſident, either among the Greeks, or Barbarians; but God would not ſuffer ſo audacious an affront to eſcape unpuniſh'd. Now the people loſt their liberty for it, and the Perſians prophaned the temple; for ſo ſoon as the news of it came to Bagoſes, that the high-prieſt had ſpilt the blood of his brother in the very temple, he call'd out to the Jews in contempt and indignation. "Prophane "wretches, ſays he, to make a ſhambles of "the place of your worſhip!" At the ſame time preſſing to get into the temple, but being oppos'd in his paſſage, "What, ſays he, do "you look upon my living body to be fouler "than the carcaſs that lies here within?" And with theſe words forced his way. Upon this occaſion he kept a ſevere hand over the Jews for ſeven years; but after the death of John, his ſon Jaddus came to the prieſthood. This Jaddus had a brother whoſe name was Manaſſes, to whom Sanballat, underſtanding Jeruſalem to be a famous city, and that the kings of it had put the Syrians and Aſſyrians to many difficulties, frankly gave his daughter † Nicaſa in marriage as a teſt and earneſt of the amity he propounded to himſelf with the Jews. This was that Sanballat that govern'd Samaria under the laſt Darius, a Chuthite born, from whence the Samaritans had their original.

CHAP. VIII.

Alexander the Great carries the war out of Europe into Aſia; breaks the Perſian empire; and when it was expected he ſhould have deſtroy'd Jeruſalem, he treated the Jews with all tenderneſs and reſpect.

Philip of Macedon murder'd. His ſon Alexander ſucceeds him.

IT was about this time that Philip the king of Macedon was treacherouſly murder'd in the city of Ægea, by Pauſanias, the ſon of Ceraſtes, of the family of Oreſtes. Alexander the ſon ſucceeded the father, and croſſing the Helleſpont, gave Darius a notable overthrow at the river Granicus. After which he ſubdued Lydia and Ionia, and paſſing his army through Caria, he enter'd into Pamphylia, as is ſaid elſewhere.

Manaſſes gives a ſcandal by marrying a ſtrange woman.

THE elders of Jeruſalem were at this time very much unſatisfied with the brother of Jaddus the high-prieſt, for taking to wife a ſtrange woman; inſomuch, that the diſguſt they had, fell little ſhort of a tumult; for it look'd like a ſtep toward the antiquating of their country's laws about marriages; and that if they ſuffer'd it to go on, it would come by little and little to a cuſtom. Neither had they forgotten that this very thing was the cauſe of their former captivity, and of all the calamities that enſued upon it; that is to ſay, the tranſgreſſion that drew thoſe judgments upon them, was the marrying of women that were not of their own extraction, and therefore they poſitively required, that Manaſſes ſhould either diſmiſs his wife, or ſerve no more at the altar. But the ‡ high-prieſt and the people being mov'd with indignation, after this would not ſuffer Manaſſes to officiate at the altar, whereupon he went to Sanballat, his father-in-law, with a profeſſion of the great affection he had for his daughter; but at the ſame time he could not ſubmit to loſe his prieſthood and honour that was annexed to his family, and the higheſt of all others in eſteem among the Jews, for the ſake of a wife, though never ſo excellent. Sanballat told him upon this, that he would undertake not only to ſecure him the exerciſe of the function, but advance him to the pontificate, and eſtabliſh him prince of the whole country, upon condition of owning his daughter for his wife, and that he would build a temple for him upon mount Garizin, that overlooks Samaria and the reſt of the mountains thereabouts, not inferior to that at Jeruſalem; and this he took upon him to ſee effected by the conſent of Darius himſelf. Manaſſes depended ſo abſolutely upon this aſſurance, that he made no doubt at all of the performance, and ſo he continued with his father. Sanballat was now in years, and finding a great many prieſts and Iſraelites hamper'd in ſuch matches, the ſtate of Jeruſalem was not a little troubled at it; for all thoſe irregular people went over to Manaſſes, Sanballat furniſhing them with money, houſes, land, and ſtock, and all to maintain the ambition of his ſon-in-law.

He is order'd either to put away his wife, or to lay down his office.

Manaſſes lays his caſe before Sanballat.

Sanballat undertakes to ſecure him to all purpoſes, make him prince of the whole country, build him a temple at Garizin, equal to that at Jeruſalem, with Darius's leave and conſent, which Manaſſes depends upon, and continues with his father.

Divers prieſts and Iſraelites concern'd in ſuch matches go over to Manaſſes.

UPON the news of Alexander's paſſing the Helleſpont, and the famous victory he had obtained at the river Granicus, Darius, to prevent his farther progreſs, drew together all the force he could make, both horſe and foot, to obſtruct his paſſage, with a reſolution to give the Macedonians battle, before they ſhould over-run the whole of Aſia, which they intended to do; ſo that having paſs'd the Euphrates with his army, and likewiſe Taurus a mountain in Cilicia, he put himſelf there in order, with a reſolution to fight the enemy in that province. Sanballat was not a little comforted with this advance of Darius; and in a full confidence of ſucceſs, told Manaſſes, that every thing ſhould be made good that he had promis'd him, ſo ſoon as the king ſhould return; for he was fully perſuaded, and all the Aſiaticks were of his opinion too, that the Macedonians with their handful of men would never ſtand the firſt ſhock. But in the event they found their miſtake; for upon the armies joining, Darius was totally routed, a great part of his army loſt, his mother, wife, and children made priſoners, and himſelf forced to fly into Persia. Alexander in the mean time marched into Syria, took Damascus and Sidon, and laid siege to Tyre, writing also to the high-priest of the Jews, that he expected the same assistances from them which they had before allow'd to Darius, and that they should provide a market for the supply of his army, where he might have necessaries for his money, assuring them that they should have no reason to repent the respect. The answer the high-priest return'd was briefly this, that they had bound themselves by an oath to Darius, never to bear arms against him, and that they were tied up by that obligation during his life. Alexander was highly incensed at this return, but went on with the siege of Tyre, making no doubt but to be suddenly master of it, with terrible menaces, that upon the reducing of that place he would march against the high-priest himself, and give all people to understand, how far oaths were to be broken or kept. Alexander, that was indefatigable, took Tyre by assault; from whence he proceeded to besiege Gaza, a Persian garrison, of which one Babemeses was the governor.

The high-priest excuses it, that they were under an oath to Darius.

Alexander takes Tyre by assault, and besieges Gaza.

Sanballat goes over with eight thousand men from Darius to Alexander,

BUT to return now to the business of Sanballat: when he found that Alexander was before Tyre, he took that opportunity of going over to him with eight thousand of his own men, and so betook himself to the enemy's camp, delivering up his trust, and transferring his allegiance from Darius to Alexander, who received him with open arms, and bad him speak freely whatever he had to say. So Sanballat told him, that he had a son-in-law, whose name was Manasses, the brother of Jaddus, the high-priest of the Jews, and great numbers of that people following him, who and gets leave to build a temple in that province.

desired nothing more than leave to build a temple in that province; setting forth also, that it would be Alexander's interest to permit it, if it were but to divide the power of the Jews, and to prevent commotions; for they are vastly numerous, and as likely to be troublesome to other kings, as they were formerly to the Syrians. This favour was no sooner granted, but they were immediately, all hands at work, upon the building of the temple; Manasses to be the high-priest, and the honour to descend to the posterity of Sanballat's daughter, as he projected to himself; but after seven months time spent before Tyre, and two more at Gaza, Sanballat died, and Alexander presently upon the taking of Gaza, advanced to Jerusalem, which put Jaddus the high-priest to his wit's end how to behave himself in an address to a prince whom he had so highly provoked by a refusal to comply with his orders; wherefore he appointed publick prayers and sacrifices to be offer'd up to God for his assistance and protection, and for the common welfare of the people. On the night following God appear'd to the high-priest in a dream, bidding him to be of good courage, adorn the city with flowers and garlands, and without more ado to open the gates, the people to march out in white garments to meet Alexander, and himself with the rest of the priests, in the habits of their order, depending upon providence for the rest. Jaddus, upon waking, told the citizens with great joy the substance of this revelation, and so put every thing in order to attend the approach of the king. Upon intelligence a little while after, that he was drawing near toward the town, Jaddus advanced, together with his priests and the citizens, in a new and a venerable way of pomp and solemnity, to a place that is called Sapha; that is to say, a place of prospect, because it commands the view of both city and temple. The Phenicians and Chaldeans promis'd themselves all the license of blood and pillage upon the high-priest himself, as well as upon the citizens, that rage or revenge could draw from a victorious prince under the sense and provocation of the affront he had received. But in the event they found the clear contrary; for when Alexander saw from a distance the order of the procession, the people all in white, with the priests at the head of them in their silken robes, and the high-priest himself in his purple stole, embroider'd with gold, his mitre upon his head, and a golden plate upon his forehead, with the name of God engraven upon it, the majesty of this spectacle struck him with so reverend an awe, that he advanced to him in his own single person, ador'd the sacred inscription, and saluted the high-priest himself; all the Jews at the same time, with one heart and voice, saluting Alexander with loud acclamations, and gathering in multitudes about him. The kings of Syria, and the rest that were there present, were so amazed at the king's behaviour, that they could hardly take him to be in his right senses; but only Parmenio took the freedom to ask him, in a familiar way, how it came to pass that he who was ador'd by the whole earth should now descend to bow to a Jewish priest? No, says Alexander, I do not adore the man, but the God whom he serves; for some time past, when I was at Dion in Macedonia, I saw this man I remember, and in this very habit. I was then deliberating what course I should take to conquer Asia; and this very person bad me pass my army over the river, and be confident, that if I would take his counsel, I should make myself master of the Persian empire. Now upon the view of this man, and in this habit, I call to mind my dream at Dion, and that this is the lively figure of what I saw there in a vision, and of the person that encourag'd me to this expedition; so that it is not without a divine impulse that I undertake this war, and I make no doubt at all of gaining my point upon the Persians, and succeeding in all things to my wish. After this discourse to Parmenio, the king embrac'd Jaddus, and was conducted into the city by the rest of the priests, where he went up to the temple, and sacrificed in form, according to order, paying also a singular veneration to the high-priest himself, who shew'd the king, when the ceremony was over, the book of the prophet Daniel, and in it the prediction of a certain Greek in time to come, that should make himself master of the Persian empire, which Alexander interpreted of himself; and so with great satisfaction in all respects he discharg'd the multitude till the day following, at which time he call'd them together again, to know what request they had to make him. The high-priest made answer, that they only desir'd his leave to enjoy the freedom of their own country laws, and that they might be exempted from the seventh year's tribute, which was all granted them. They besought him farther also, to allow the same freedom to the Jews in Babylon and Media,

The priests and citizens march out accordingly.

Alexander with a respectful reverence salutes the high-priest in person.

Alexander calls to mind the figure of Jaddus in a vision he had at Dion.

The priests conduct Alexander into the temple, where he sacrifices in form.

Sanballat dies, and Alexander advances against Jerusalem.

dia, which he granted likewiſe; offering them moreover, that if any of them had a mind to take up arms in his ſervice, they ſhould be received into his army, and enjoy the liberty of exerciſing their religion as before, which generoſity brought great numbers of the Jews over to him.

MATTERS being thus ſettled at Jeruſalem, Alexander marched with his army from place to place among the neighbouring cities, and wherever he came he was well received. The Samaritans, whoſe capital at that time was Sichem, near the mountain Garizin, and peopled by Jewiſh deſerters, taking notice how honourably Alexander treated the Jews, began now to bethink themſelves of tacking about again, and returning to their former profeſſion; for theſe people are of that temper, as we have ſaid already, that when they ſee the Jews are in affliction, "They are ſtrangers to us, they "cry; we have nothing to do with them," which is nothing but the truth. But ſo ſoon as ever fortune ſmiles upon them again, they claim kindred preſently, and value themſelves upon the very heraldry of their deſcent from Joſeph and his ſons, Manaſſeh and Ephraim. Alexander was hardly out of the city, when the Sichemites, in great pomp and parade, and with wonderful joy in their looks, preſented themſelves before him, in company with the troops that Sanballat had ſent over to him; making ſuit to the king, that he would vouchſafe to honour their city and temple with his preſence, who ſpoke them all fair, and promiſed to give them a viſit at his return; but upon their deſiring an immunity of the ſeventh year's tribute, as the other, in regard that they did not ſow in that year, Alexander asked what countrymen the petitioners were? They told him they were Hebrews, but that they were called Sichemites by the Sidonians. The queſtion was put to them again, whether they were Jews or not? They ſaid, no; "Where-"upon, ſays Alexander, I have granted this "to the Jews; but, however, when I come "back again, I ſhall do what I think reaſon-"able, upon a fuller information of the mat-"ter:" And ſo the Sichemites were diſmiſs'd; but he took Sanballat's men along with him into Egypt, allotting them a diſtribution of lands to live upon there, which they had afterwards in Thebes, where they were put in garriſon.

The Samaritans change parties with their intereſt.

They demand the immunity of the ſeventh year's tribute, but it is not granted them.

AFTER the death of Alexander, the empire was parted among his ſucceſſors, only the temple by Garizin remain'd untouch'd: And if at any time the Jews at Jeruſalem were found guilty of the violation of their laws, as in eating forbidden meats, the breach of the ſabbath, or the like; they took ſanctuary with the Sichemites, upon a pretence that they were unjuſtly accus'd. About this time the high-prieſt Jaddus dy'd; and Onias, his Son, ſucceeded him in the dignity. This is all we ſhall ſay of the ſtate of Jeruſalem at that time.

The irregular Jews at Jeruſalem take ſanctuary with the Sichemites.

Onias, the ſon of Jaddus, ſucceeds his father.

CHAP. I.

After the death of Alexander, his generals ſhare the empire. Ptolemy ſurprizes Jeruſalem; tranſplants divers colonies of Jews into Egypt, and employs them in places of great truſt. The Jews of Jeruſalem, and the Samaritans, are perpetually in war.

WHEN Alexander king of Macedon had made himſelf abſolute maſter of the Perſian empire, and ſettled the affairs of the Jews, as we have ſhew'd already, he departed this life, and left the empire broken, and parcell'd out into ſo many principalities. Aſia fell to Antigonus. Babylon, with the countries bordering upon it, to Seleucus. The Helleſpont to Lyſimachus, Macedon to * Caſſander, and Egypt and Ptolemy, the ſon of Lagus. Upon this diviſion there enſued a long war betwixt theſe ſeveral princes, who were all competitors for the ſovereign command of the whole, to the ruin of ſeveral conſiderable cities, and the loſs of a great many lives. The whole tract of Syria was abundantly ſenſible of this miſery, under the government of Ptolemy, otherwiſe call'd the ſaviour, (though never any man had leſs pretence to that title than himſelf.) This was he who made himſelf maſter of Jeruſalem by a ſtratagem; that is to ſay, upon a ſabbath-day, under a colour of devotion, and then treacherouſly poſſeſs'd himſelf of the city without any oppoſition, difficulty, or ſo much as the leaſt apprehenſion of any danger from him; this being a day of reſt, over and above; which made his entrance as eaſy as his adminiſtration afterwards was tyrannical and barbarous. Agatharchides the Cnidian, ſays much the ſame thing in his hiſtory of the ſucceſſors of Alexander, when he imputes the loſs of our country and liberties to the vanity of our ſuperſtition. His words are theſe:

The Perſian empire canton'd out into principalities after the death of Alexander.

The ſeveral princes are competitors for the ſovereignty of the whole.

Ptolemy, otherwiſe call'd the ſaviour.

He ſurprizes Jeruſalem by treachery, under a cloak of religion.

Agatharchides imputes the loſs of it to the Jewiſh ſuperſtition.

"THERE are a people (ſays he,) that are "known by the name of Jews, and have "their habitation in a great and well fortify'd "city call'd Jeruſalem. Theſe men fell into "the hands of Ptolemy, and ſubjected themſelves to a cruel ſlavery upon a fantaſtical "ſcruple of conſcience, that would not ſuffer "them to take up arms againſt an oppreſſor in "their own defence, upon that day." This is what Agatharchides delivers concerning our brethren. But Ptolemy carry'd away a great many captives out of the mountainous part of Judea, from about Jeruſalem, Samaria, and the mountain Garizin, which he tranſported into Egypt; and then reflecting upon the ſacredneſs of an oath among the Jews, by their fidelity to Darius, even after his overthrow, notwithſtanding the ſummons, and the invitation of Alexander to come over to him, he diſpoſed of them into ſtrong holds, gariſons, and places of truſt upon their oath of fidelity to be true to him and his ſucceſſors; granting them alſo immunities and privileges in Alexandria, in common with the Macedonians themſelves; ſo that betwixt the temptation of Ptolemy's liberality on the one hand, and the pleaſure and convenience of a fruitful country on the other; there came over great numbers of Jews into Egypt from other parts alſo. But the Jews and the Samaritans could never be reconcil'd yet upon the ſubject of their ancient laws and conſtitutions; the one inſiſting upon it, that the temple at Jeruſalem was the only holy place, and the Jews not allowed to ſend their ſacrifices any where elſe; the other ſaying as much for the temple at Garizin; inſomuch, that there was a great deal of blood ſpilt upon this queſtion.

The Jews and the Samaritans are divided: one for the temple at Jeruſalem, t'other for that at Garizin.

CHAP. II.

Ptolemy Philadelphus ſets a hundred and twenty thouſand Jews at liberty. He ſends for ſeventy two choſen perſons out of Judea, to turn the Jewiſh laws into Greek. He makes a preſent of rich donatives to the temple, and treats the deputies with a magnificence ſuitable to his greatneſs.

Philadelphus Ptolemy ſucceeds Ptolemy the ſaviour.

* AFTER the death of Ptolemy (the ſaviour, as they call'd him) Philadelphus the ſon ſucceeded in courſe to the kingdom of Egypt. He reigned nine and thirty years, and gave orders for the tranſlating of the law into the Greek tongue. There were at that time captives in Egypt, to the number of a hundred and twenty thouſand Jews, which this Philadelphus commanded to be ſet at liberty upon this following occaſion. Demetrius Phalereus having under his care and cuſtody the truſt of the king's library, made it his buſineſs to make a collection of all books that were any where extant at what rate ſoever. This fancy was his particular inclination; ſo that he brought up all the choice books that he could hear of, which he thought might be worthy of a place in the king's ſtudy and good opinion. Philadelphus asking one time how many thouſand volumes he thought he had got? he told him, ſome two hundred thouſand; but that he hop'd in a ſhort time to make them five hundred thouſand; for he was certainly inform'd that there were a world of choice manuſcripts among the Jews, concerning their laws, cuſtoms and ceremonies, that are very well worth the reading, and the honour of a place alſo in the royal library; but being written in their own language and characters, it would be a matter of great difficulty and trouble to turn them into Greek; for though there may ſeem to be ſome reſemblance and affinity betwixt the language and the writing of the one and of the other, there are yet ſeveral niceties peculiar to each, and diſtinct from the other. Not, ſays he, that this is to diſcourage the turning of them out of the Hebrew, and the depoſiting of them in the royal collection, ſo long as there is where-withal to anſwer the expence. The king highly commended this project of Demetrius upon ſuch a collection of books, and wrote to the high-prieſt of the Jews to give him his aſſiſtance in the providing of theſe copies. There was one Ariſtæus, a particular confident of the king's, a man of great modeſty; and upon that account he had his maſter's ear with the more freedom. This ſame Ariſtæus had it a long time in his heart to get the Jews ſet at liberty; and laying hold of this occaſion as the moſt decent opportunity of moving the king about it, he went in the firſt place to Soſibius, Tarantinus, and Andreas, three captains of the guards, to feel how they ſtood affected; and upon finding them well diſpos'd, he beſought them earneſtly to aſſiſt him with their intereſt, toward the doing of ſo good an office; upon which aſſurance he addreſs'd himſelf to the king after this manner.

Soſibius, Tarantinus, and Andreas, three captains of the guards, well affected to them.

" Sir (ſays he,) if I may preſume to lay my " thoughts at your feet in all ſimplicity, and " without diſguiſe, ſince it is your royal plea- " ſure that the laws of the Jews be not only " tranſcribed, but tranſlated, to anſwer your " preſent purpoſe, I do not well ſee how it " can be fairly done, while ſo many of that " nation are in bondage under your govern- " ment, from whom you require and expect " ſo neceſſary an aſſiſtance and ſervice. It " ſeems to me to be an act worthy of your " magnificence and goodneſs, to ſet theſe poor " people at liberty from their preſent miſery; " for by all that ever I could underſtand of " the matter, the ſame God that orders " and over-rules your government, is the " author of their laws; and both we and " they worſhip the ſame creator and almighty " power, only under the name of Jupiter, " or Jove, à Juvando, from helping, being " the life of us all. Wherefore you may " be pleaſed, out of a reverence to that God " whom they love and worſhip with a zeal " and affection beyond all other mortals, to " reſtore theſe wretched exiles to their own " country, that they may end their days " where they receiv'd their birth, as in the " place that Providence had aſſigned them. I " do not preſume, Sir, to interpoſe on their " behalf out of any partiality, upon the ac- " count of tribe or extraction, but in a con- " templation, that the ſame God is the crea- " tor of us all, and that ſo illuſtrious a cle- " mency would be acceptable even to that " God himſelf." The king ask'd him then, how many thouſands he thought there were that would ſtand in need of this indulgence? Andreas being preſent, made anſwer, That he believ'd there might be a matter of a hundred and twenty thouſand ſouls. Well, ſays the king to Ariſtæus, and durſt thou take this for ſo moderate a requeſt? Soſibius, and the reſt that were by, ſaid, That it would be an action becoming the dignity of ſo great a prince, to be merciful to others, in acknowledgment of the honour that he himſelf had received from above. The king was ſo well pleaſed with this motion and advice, that he order'd an allowance of a hundred and twenty † drachma's to the ſoldiers for every Jew they had in cuſtody, to be made good to them on the next pay-day, over and above their ſtipend, with a further promiſe to anſwer the deſire of Ariſtæus, (or, in truth, the appointment of Providence) in all points, and to ratify the whole by a publick edict, wherein ſhould be comprehended not only thoſe which his father, or his army, had carried away, but thoſe alſo that either before, or ſince that time, had been taken into captivity. His friends told him that at this rate the deliverance of theſe people would ſtand him in at leaſt four hundred * talents; but the king would not ſcruple to pay that, he ſaid, for the thing ſhould be done. Now for the greater honour of this illuſtrious king, I ſhall here inſert a copy of the proclamation itſelf.

The king diſcharges the Jews by proclamation.

"IT is our royal will and pleaſure, that all "the Jews whatſoever, that have been ſubdued, and taken by any of my father's forces, upon their incurſions into Syria and "Phenicia; and thoſe brought away or ſold, "into any of my dominions, and all thoſe "likewiſe that either before, or ſince that "time, have been ſo ſold and enſlav'd, be all "ſet free, upon the payment of one hundred "and twenty drachma's for every ſuch ſlave; the ſoldiers to receive this redemption-money, together with their pay, and the reſt "out of the treaſury; for the forcing many "people away into captivity, and the revenging of their country by the outrage and licence of the ſoldiers, for the ſake purely "of the pillage and booty, was a courſe that "my father undoubtedly neither intended nor "approv'd, and a thing as contrary to common "equity and reaſon; wherefore out of a reverence to the memory of my father, and "a commiſeration of the poor and weak that "ſuffer under the power of oppreſſion and "violence, I do hereby expreſly charge and "command, that all the Jews that are at this "time in ſervitude, be immediately diſmiſs'd "upon the payment of the ſum aforeſaid to "their reſpective maſters, in obedience to this "our mandate, without fraud or colluſion. "And farther, that this our proclamation be "made publick for three days ſucceſſively "after the receipt of it, and in the mean time, "that the aforeſaid maſters bring in a liſt of "their priſoners to ſuch officers, and in ſuch "manner as we ſhall find moſt for our ſervice. And all this to be done upon the peril of the confiſcation of his goods, if any "man ſhall be found acting contrary to the "tenor hereof."

An allowance of redemption-money.

UPON the firſt ſight of this draught, the king took notice, that the proviſion for the liberty of thoſe that were taken either before, or after, was not ſo cautiouſly expreſs'd, but there was room left to evade it; ſo that the king, of his own proper generoſity and motion, ſuperadded a latitude of indulgence in thoſe caſes, and gave poſitive orders to the collectors of his tribute, and the officers of his treaſury, to have the money in readineſs for the ranſom of the Jews. So within ſeven days the whole work was diſpatch'd at the king's charge, to the value of four † hundred and ſixty talents; the maſters inſiſting upon the ſame rate for their children, that they had for the reſt, though the king's edict extended no farther than to thoſe that were brought away priſoners, without comprehending ſuch as were born there.

The king enlarges his grant.

WHEN every thing was advanced thus far, with great honour and juſtice, according to the king's mind, he commanded Demetrius to publiſh his purpoſe about the tranſcribing of the Jewiſh books and records, proceeding from one thing to another in order, and with conſideration, ſo that there was entered upon a regiſter, a copy of Demetrius's petition, and likewiſe of the letters that were written upon that occaſion, with an account of the preſents that were made toward the work, and what they were, and by whom; ſo that at firſt ſight, the excellency both of the authors and the contrivers, might appear from the very work itſelf. Now the petition aforeſaid ran in terms much to this purpoſe.

"SINCE it is your royal will and com- "mand, that I ſhould do my endeavour to "ſupply what may be yet further added toward "the perfection of your library, and to find "out what curious and uſeful books and copies "may have hitherto eſcaped my ſearch and "enquiry, this is humbly to inform your ma- "jeſty, that after much ſtudy and thought upon "this matter, I do not find any thing ſo much "conducing to your preſent purpoſe, as the "hiſtory of the Jewiſh laws; for being writ- "ten in Hebrew characters, and in a Hebrew "Idiom, it will be hard for us to underſtand "them aright; beſides, that the verſion we "have already of them, is not ſo correct as "it ſhould be, for want of a royal authority "and encouragement toward the making of "them known; ſo that it will be neceſſary "to have them accurately and carefully tranſlated, as being a body of the wiſeſt and "perfecteſt laws that are any where extant; "God himſelf having been the author of them. "For this reaſon, ſays Hecatæus the Abderite, "we find in none of the poets or hiſtorians, "any mention made of theſe laws, or of the "adminiſtrators of them; the original and "inſtitution of them being ſacred, and not to "prophaned by unhallow'd lips; wherefore "your majeſty may be pleaſed, if you ſhall "judge it meet, to write to the high-prieſt "of the Jews, only to ſend you out of every "tribe, ſix elders, whom he ſhall make choice "of, as men the beſt skill'd in the knowledge "of their conſtitutions and cuſtoms; and by "their aſſiſtance, in the interpreting and expounding of their writings, we may be able "to gather ſomething from them to your majeſty's ſatisfaction."

The king's munificence toward the ſervice of the holy temple and altar.

UPON the receipt of this letter, Eleazar, with all the deference and reſpect imaginable, returned this following anſwer.

Eleazar the high-prieſt to king Ptolemy, greeting.

" ſix elders out of every tribe, with the law,
" to attend your pleaſure, remitting ourſelves
" upon the whole matter to your piety and
" juſtice, that after the tranſcribing of them,
" they may be return'd to us ſafe by the ſame
" bearer; recommending your majeſty to the " providence of the Almighty."

The particulars of Ptolemy's donatives.

Six elders out of every tribe ſent to attend the king with the books of the Jewiſh laws.

THIS was the high-prieſt's anſwer to the king's letter, to which were ſubjoined, the names of the ſeventy elders that were ſent by Eleazar upon this occaſion, which names I ſhall

* Admitting theſe to be Jewiſh talents, fifty weighed five thouſand ſeven hundred and three pounds, one ounce, ten penny weights; and their value in gold amounted to two hundred ſeventy three thouſand ſeven hundred and fifty pounds; but if Egyptian, fifty muſt weigh three thouſand eight hundred two pounds, one ounce; and their value in gold amount to one hundred eighty two thouſand five hundred pounds Engliſh money, according to Calmet's tables.

† An hundred talents, ſuppoſing them Hebrew, weighed eleven thouſand four hundred and ſix pounds, three ounces; and their value in ſilver amounted to thirty four thouſand two hundred and eighteen pounds, fifteen ſhillings; but ſuppoſing them to be Egyptian, which ſeems more probable, ſeven thouſand ſix hundred and four pounds, two ounces, and were worth in value twenty two thouſand eight hundred and twelve pounds, ten ſhillings, of our money.

not

not need to enumerate over again in this place. But for the magnificence and curiosity of the donatives and presents for the service of God, that part of the account cannot be pass'd over in silence, without great injustice to the king's honour, piety, and bounty; considering with what liberality and expence he promoted the work, the countenance and encouragement that he gave to the prosecution of it, and the assiduity of his care and watchfulness in overlooking the workmen, to see that they should neither be heedless nor idle. Now in these cases I am obliged to be more particular, not as a branch of the history, but as a memorial of the king's greatness of mind, that shall stand upon record to his everlasting fame; and I shall begin with the description of the table.

The golden table.

As to the dimensions, the king sent his artificers to learn out the measure of the former table at Jerusalem, and to see whether the place would not bear a bigger. They brought him word that he might make it as big as he pleas'd; whereupon he proposed to himself to make this five times larger than the other. But considering, upon second thoughts, that so great a bulk might possibly make it too cumbersome and unweildy for daily use, and look more like a work for ostentation than for service, he came to a resolution upon the first scantling; and to supply the expence, he sav'd in weight and metal, in a charge upon extraordinary workmanship and beauty. Now the king had a wonderful insight into the nature and reason of things, and such a presence of thought, for the finding out of expedients and new inventions, that it was a common practice with him to form his own designs, and prescribe to the very workmen themselves, their precise rules and measures; so that for the proportions of this table, he order'd it to be two cubits and a half long, one over, and one and a half in height; all of solid gold, and round about it a border of a hand's breadth, set out on three sides with curious carving of flower works, twisted strings, and other agreeable figures; which being triangular, were likewise so equal and just, that turn it which way you would, (as it was easily transpos'd,) the prospect would be still the same. This table, in fine, was delicately wrought all over, but that part of it especially that was most in sight; with an intermixture of precious stones loop'd together by golden buckles, to the string-work beforementioned, at equal distances one from another. The outside of it was set with other rich stones of an oval cut, and an emboss'd work of twigs and branches creeping round the table. There were also several sorts of fruits wrought together under the figure of a crown, as bunches of grapes, ears of corn, pomegranates, &c. all in their proper and natural position, and express'd by stones set in gold, bearing the native colour of what they represented. Under this crown was another row of ovals; which, for the matter, the order, and ornament, was so like the former, and so exactly uniform from top to bottom, that there was no distinguishing one part from the other. Under the table from side to side, there pass'd a golden plate of four fingers breadth; and into this plate the feet were fasten'd with springs and hooks to keep them firm and steady, by binding the cover and the frame together. There was drawn also upon this table the resemblance of a meander, the course of it mark'd out with stones of lustre and value, sparkling like so many stars; as rubies, emeralds, and whatever else was most precious or excellent in the kind. Along this meander there were divers pieces of sculpture in bows and knots, that had somewhat in them of the figure of a lozenge; and they were so embellish'd by an orderly disposition of crystal and amber, for the advantage of the view, that it made, all together, one of the most agreeable spectacles imaginable. The cornishes of the feet had the resemblance of a lilly work; the stem upright, with the leaves and tendrils winding under the table. The basis was a hand's breadth over, garnish'd with rubies, and a border round about it, and two hands distance betwixt the feet that rested upon it. The graving work of these feet was incomparable, being the fancy of a foliage of the vine and the ivy, render'd so exquisitely to the life, (with grapes, berries, and all,) that it was hard to say which was which; but upon the least breath of air, the leaves would move and play, as if it had been the work of nature rather than of art. This table consisted of three parts, which were so artificially put together, that there were no joints to be discern'd, or so much as to be imagin'd where they met, and the thickness of it was half a cubit. This great prince gave to understand by the magnificence of his present, in the inestimable value of the materials, and the exquisite curiosity and perfection of the whole work, that what he abated of his first project in size and proportion, was abundantly supplied by a most munificent expence in art and ornament.

There was also a pair of large golden cups, wrought half way up the bowl, scallop-wise, and inlaid with all sorts of precious stones, orderly ranged into the resemblance of a meander of a cubit over, with delicate figures of twigs and creepers, branching out into a kind of net-work up to the brim, and interlaced with several compartiments in form of a lozenge, about four fingers broad, and adorned with stones of value, as before; the borders were also set out with an intermixture of lillies, flowers, vines, grapes, and the like, round the lips of the vessel. This was the form of finishing of these goblets; and for the contents, they held a matter of three or four gallons a-piece; and then for the silver pieces, they were so glorious and radiant, that no crystal mirror was comparable to them.

The king's additional bounties.

The king, after all this, furnished yet thirty golden vessels more, richly set out, and adorned up and down with precious stones, and overshadowed in the intervals with vine and ivy leaves in curious sculpture. Neither was the excellency of these miraculous pieces to be wholly ascribed to the design and mastery of the artificer; but the king himself took a kind of glory in contributing every way to the perfection of the work, making it a great part of his care and business, to visit the shops, and superintend the masters themselves, in the execution of their charge and profession, which made them much more industrious and intent, when they saw the king himself had a more than ordinary regard and concern for the well doing of every thing, than they would have been otherwise.

Upon

Upon the receipt and dedication of the king's donatives, his commiſſioners are honourably treated and diſmiſs'd.

UPON the delivery of theſe donatives, and the dedication of them to the uſe and ſervice of the holy temple at Jeruſalem, Eleazar treated the king's commiſſioners with all honour and acknowledgment, and ſo diſmiſs'd them with good wiſhes and preſents, to return to their maſter. The king had no ſooner heard of their arrival at Alexandria, and that they had brought the ſeventy elders along with them, but he ſent inſtantly for his two ambaſſadors, Andreas and Ariſtæus, from whom he receiv'd Eleazar's letter, and particular ſatisfaction to many queſtions by-the-by. His mind was ſo bent upon an immediate conference with the ſeventy perſons that were ſent over to him to interpret the laws, that no creature had acceſs to him upon any particular buſineſs, though contrary to his cuſtom of giving private audience once in five days, and publick once a month. Having thus ſecured himſelf from the importunity of any of thoſe caſual interruptions, he only waited the coming of Eleazar's agents, who attended him ſoon after with preſents from the high-prieſt, and with certain manuſcripts of the Jewiſh laws written upon parchment in golden letters. Upon the king's asking for the books, they were produced, to his great admiration at the nicety of the work; for the leaves were ſo artificially put together, that there was no diſcerning where one skin was join'd to another; his majeſty at the ſame time telling them, that he had a great reſpect for the perſons that brought him that rarity, a greater yet for him that ſent it, but the greateſt reverence of all for the author of thoſe laws that were now brought and ſent him. The deputies and their aſſiſtants gave the king with one heart and voice ſuch moving inſtances, by their joint prayers and acclamations, of the zeal and paſſion they had for the ſervice, that he could not forbear weeping at the tenderneſs of the reſpect; for there are tears of joy, as well as of ſorrow. The writings were then put into the hands of the officers that were to have them in charge, and the king taking the deputies into his arms, told them that he would only in the firſt place ſpeak a word or two to the buſineſs they came about, and after that take their perſons into his particular care; for he looked upon the day of their arrival, he ſaid, as ſo great a providence to him, that he reſolved to have it obſerved all the days of his life, as an anniverſary feſtival in memory of the bleſſing; and it fell out luckily in this too, that it happen'd to be upon the very day of his naval victory over Antigonus. The king, in fine, told them that they ſhould be his gueſts, and order'd them the moſt beautiful apartments in his own palace. The care of entertaining and providing for ſtrangers was properly Nicanor's province, who appointed Dorotheus under him in this, as in other caſes, to ſee that nothing might be wanting. Now the king's method was this, both for the honour and convenience of ſtrangers, that they ſhould be all treated after the way of their own country; and inſtructions were accordingly given on the behalf of the elders too, that the uncouth novelty of things might not diſguſt them.

Eleazar attends the king with preſents and parchment manuſcripts of the Jewiſh laws in golden letters.

The king's order and method of entertaining the commiſſioners.

THE management of this affair was committed to Dorotheus, as a perſon well vers'd in the faſhions and cuſtoms of the Jews. There was in the firſt place two ſeats diſpoſed of; one on the king's right hand, the other on his left, by his own order, and with all becoming deference to the commiſſioners. When the gueſts had taken their places, the king bad Dorotheus ſerve them after the ſame manner, as he had formerly ſerv'd their countrymen upon the like occaſion; ſo that the Egyptian prieſts and officers that uſually did duty at the king's eating time, were all diſcharg'd; and one of our own deputies and prieſts, Eliſa by name, was called out by the king himſelf to bleſs the table, who thereupon ſtood up to give God thanks; and after the ſolemnity of a benediction, upon what they were about to receive, and a fervent prayer for the happineſs of the king and his people, to the infinite ſatisfaction of all that were preſent, the company fell cheerfully to the meat that was before them. The king took occaſion while they were at dinner, to ſtart ſeveral philoſophical queſtions, curious and diverting enough, and ſo to bandy them about from one to another, by way of entertainment and diſcourſe. The ſenſe and judgment of the commiſſioners was ſo grave and pertinent to every point, that the king took a wonderful delight in the converſation, and ſo they continued feaſting and rejoicing for the ſpace of twelve days. If any man has a mind to know the particular points that were here in agitation, I ſhall only refer him to a book of Ariſtæus, expreſly writ upon this ſubject. The excellency of this converſation had wonderful effects, not only upon the king, but they brought over Menedemus the philoſopher alſo to acknowledge an over-ruling providence, and to put a final end to that controverſy; the king acknowledging himſelf all this while to be ſo exceedingly edified by converſing with theſe people, that they had perfected and inſtructed him in the very art of government; ſo he ordered them a gratification of * three talents a man, and they were then conducted to their lodgings. At the end of three days, Demetrius took them along with him by a cauſeway of ſeven furlongs in length, and a bridge of communication betwixt the iſland and the continent, and ſo advancing from thence northward, ſettled them in a houſe by the ſea ſide, where they might be from noiſe and diſturbance; the retreat, in fine, being very commodious for men of thought and contemplation. When they were now ſo diſpoſed of, that there was nothing more to be deſir'd in favour of the undertaking, he made it his requeſt, that they would immediately fall to work upon the interpretation, and ſo God ſpeed them in the enterprize. They ſpared for neither care nor pains, but kept cloſe to their ſtudies from early in the morning till three in the afternoon, which was their dinner-time; Dorotheus not forgetting, according to the king's order, to ſupply them with delicacies from his own table, over and above a plentiful competency of proviſions at the king's ordinary allowance. It was their cuſtom to wait upon the king eve-

* Theſe, as they were given in Egypt, were, moſt probably, Egyptian talents, three of which weighed two hundred and twenty eight pounds, one ounce, and ten pennyweights, and in value amounted to ſix hundred and eighty four pounds, ſeven ſhillings, and ſix pence of our money, according to Calmet's tables.

ry morning at his levee, and thence to betake themselves to their task again, still washing their hands with sea-water, before they enter'd upon their business.

The translation finish'd in seventy two days.

Read over, examin'd, and approv'd.

THIS version of the law was finished within the compass of seventy two days, and when that was over, Demetrius call'd all the Jews together into the place where it was translated, and in the presence of the interpreters read over the book, the whole assembly unanimously approving of the interpretation, and extolling Demetrius as the occasion of the great advantages they had receiv'd. He desired also, that it might be read by the eminent men of the nation; and after this the high-priest, the elders, and the magistrates of the people propos'd, that since the translation was so happily finish'd, the authority of it might be ratified, and the text remain unalterable for ever. They were all so perfectly of the same mind, that they came to this resolution, that the book might be subjected to a further examination and revise; and if there should be found any thing in it of excess or defect, it might, upon mature consideration, be rectified; but that upon a further approbation it should stand good for ever.

Revised, and finally ratified.

THE king was doubly pleased, to the highest degree; first, for the gaining of his point; and secondly, that it succeeded so happily to the advantage of the publick. But when he came to hear it read to him, he was transported with joy, in the contemplation of the wisdom of the law-giver, and enter'd into a discourse with Demetrius, that neither any historian nor poet should ever make mention of these incomparable laws. Demetrius made answer, that the frame of them being so manifestly divine, and the matter of them so venerable, people were afraid of meddling with them, especially considering what judgments had befallen several people for their temerity of prophaning them; as Theopompus, taking upon him the part of a plagiary in publishing texts of holy writ as his own invention, was struck with a fit of madness that held him thirty days; and in the intervals of his phrenzy was conscious of the sin, and asked God forgiveness for it, having revelations also in his sleep that it was his audacious curiosity, in confounding sacred things with prophane, that brought this distemper upon him. But, in fine, upon his repentance and amendment, he was restored again to his right mind; and so it fared likewise with Theodectes the poet, who was struck blind upon the intermixing of divine writ with tragedy; and upon the acknowledgment of his sin, restored to his sight again.

Theopompus runs mad,

upon conforming sacred things with prophane.

Theodectes struck blind for the like profanation.

THE king, upon the receipt of these books from Demetrius, bless'd God and worshipp'd, giving a strict command for the preserving of them safe and entire, desiring the interpreters also, that he might see them again as often as they could upon a visit; assuring them, that it should turn to their honour as well as to their advantage. He was obliged at present, he said, to part with them; but whenever they should come hereafter upon their own accord, they should not fail of such an acknowledgment as might become wise men to receive, and a great prince to give. Upon this the king dismiss'd them with a present to each of them, of three rich suits of raiment, * two talents of gold, the value of † one talent in cups, couches to sit and eat upon, with presents also for the high-priest, of ten beds with silver feet, and suits of furniture belonging to them; a chalice of thirty ‡ talents, ten purple robes, a glorious crown, and a hundred pieces of fine linnen, besides cups and goblets of several sorts, and two golden vessels dedicated expressly to the service of the temple; desiring the high-priest by letter, that if any of these commissioners should have a mind to come to him again at any time hereafter, he should give them leave; for he had a high esteem for the conversation of learned men, and could not think his favours better bestow'd than upon such company. This is the short history of what Philadelphus did to the honour of the Jews.

The king dismisses the interpreters with variety of rich presents.

CHAP. III.

The kings of Asia always very kind to the Jews. Antiochus the Great marries his daughter Cleopatra to Ptolemy king of Egypt.

THE Jews were in great esteem also among the kings of Asia, both for their faith and skill in military matters; insomuch that Seleucus, surnamed Nicanor, gave them the privileges of freemen in all the cities he built throughout Asia and the Lower Syria; nay, and in the metropolis of Antioch itself too, declaring it to be his will and pleasure, that they should enjoy the same rights and immunities with the Greeks and Macedonians, which was no more than what they are possess'd of to this very day. As for example, the Jews being interdicted the use of foreign oil, the Olympick officers who had the ordering of that affair, were obliged by the government to allow them so much money in lieu of it. The people of Antioch insisted upon the abrogating of that custom in the following war; but Mutianus, who was then governor of the province of Syria, would not suffer it. In the reign afterward of Vespasian, and his son Titus, the people of Alexandria would have had the Jews disfranchis'd; but such was the honour and the justice of the Romans, and especially of those two magnanimous princes before-mentioned, that they could not obtain it; not that they wanted either pretence or provocation for a revenge upon a people that had been such a thorn in their sides, by so troublesome a war, and so obstinate a rebellion; but they look'd upon their rights and privileges to be still sacred, and therefore refused to gratify either their own passions, or the importunity of two great nations with any vindictive act of injustice. They laid more weight upon the sense of their ancient merits, than upon that of their present misdemeanor, and would not do a mean thing, though in favour of never so considerable an intereſt. As for them, they ſaid, that had taken up arms againſt the Romans, they had ſuffer'd enough in all conſcience by the calamities of the war, without any other forfeiture; and to puniſh thoſe who had not offended, would be an indignity againſt common ſenſe and juſtice.

Marcus Agrippa ſtands by them alſo againſt the Ionians.

WE read likewiſe to the ſame purpoſe of Marcus Agrippa's good affection to the Jews; for when the Jonians, in a ſeditious animoſity againſt thoſe people, went open-mouth'd to them with a remonſtrance, that their city being ſingly and entirely their own, by the gift of Antiochus, the grandſon of Seleucus, whom the Grecians ſirnamed the God, they deſired to be put in poſſeſſion of it with ſole privileges, excluſive of all other people; demanding farther, that if the Jews ſhould pretend to the ſame immunities, it might be upon condition of their worſhipping the ſame gods. The Jews brought the queſtion to an iſſue, Nicolaus of Damaſcus being of their council, who obtained judgment for them in favour of the right they claim'd to the free exerciſe and enjoyment of their own laws and cuſtoms; Agrippa pronouncing upon the whole matter, that he could not agree to any innovation upon that point. He that would be farther ſatisfied in the ſeries of this tranſaction, may read the whole ſtory at large in Nicolaus's hiſtory, B. 123, 124. But not being at that time in war with the Romans, I do not ſo much wonder at Agrippa's judgment in this particular, as I do at the generoſity and candor of Veſpaſian and Titus, whoſe very names are not to be mention'd but with infinite honour and admiration; perſons that in all the outrages of a fierce and a bloody war, could never be tranſported beyond the ſtricteſt bounds of humanity and moderation. But to go on where I left off:

Nicolaus of Damaſcus pleads for the Jews, and obtains a judgment for them.

The hiſtory of Nicolaus of Damaſcus.

The juſtice and generoſity of Veſpaſian and Titus.

UNDER the reign of Antiochus the Great, Aſia, Judea, and Cele-Syria, were never at reſt; for Antiochus being at that time in actual hoſtility with Philopator Ptolemy, and his ſon Ptolemy, ſirnamed Epiphanes, whether ſide ſoever had the better of it, the Jews betwixt the proſperous and adverſe fortune of Antiochus, were ſtill ſure to be ſufferers, like a veſſel in a ſtorm at ſea, that is batter'd and daſh'd betwixt two billows, as well on the one ſide as the other; but Antiochus, in the end, prevail'd, and made himſelf maſter of Judea.

During the war betwixt Antiochus and Philopator Ptolemy, the Jews were ſtill ſufferers.

Antiochus makes himſelf maſter of Judea.

IN proceſs of time, after the death of Philopator, his ſon ſent a great army into Cele-Syria, under the command of Scopas, who took ſeveral of their cities, and reduced Judea by force; but Antiochus a while after obtained a notable victory over Scopas, at the head of the river Jordan, and recover'd the places in Cele-Syria and Samaria, which Scopas had got poſſeſſion of before. The Jews, upon this ſucceſs, render'd themſelves upon their own accord, received the army into their city, provided plentifully for the elephants, and valiantly aſſiſted in the attack of the caſtle, where Scopas had left a body of men in gariſon. Antiochus thought it but reaſonable to gratify the Jews with ſome honourable mark of the ſenſe he had of their good-will and ſervices upon this occaſion, and ſo wrote to ſuch of his friends and officers as were witneſſes of the obligations they had laid upon him; giving to underſtand in the ſaid letters, what manner of requital he intended to make them. You ſhall have the copy of it in its due place, but I am firſt to tell you what Polybius the Megalopolitan, in the ſixteenth book of his hiſtory, ſays upon this ſubject. "Scopas, ſays he, Ptolemy's general, made a "winter war with the Jews, broke into the "heart of their country, and wholly ſubdued "it." And then he goes on a little after, in the ſame book, with the ſtory of Scopas's being defeated by Antiochus, over-running Bathamea, Samaria, Gadara, and Abila; after which the Jews of Jeruſalem, and of the glorious temple there, went over to him. "I "ſhould ſay a great deal more, ſays he, upon "this text, but I muſt put it off to another "time." Thus far went Polybius; but I ſhall now return to my relation, taking the letter of Antiochus in my way.

See Polybius Megalopolitanus.

The Jews of Jeruſalem go over to Antiochus.

King Antiochus to Ptolemy, greeting.

Antiochus to Ptolemy in honour and favour of the Jews.

"WHEREAS we have received ſeveral inſtances of the good diſpoſitions "and affections of the Jews toward us and "our ſervice, from the time of our firſt co"ming into their country, which they have "expreſs'd by their pomp and reſpect of their "elders and magiſtrates, in attending us in a "body upon the way, and the ſplendid recep"tion of our perſon, and our army into the "city, and making ſo ample a proviſion, both "for our horſes and elephants, aſſiſting us "likewiſe againſt the gariſon of the Egyptians "in the caſtle: theſe good offices being duly "conſider'd, we reckon ourſelves bound, in "piety and honour, to beſtow upon them ſome "diſtinguiſhing marks of our acknowledgment "and eſteem, by contributing toward the re"pairing of their miſerable city, and reſtoring "it to its former ſtate of reputation and glo"ry, by recalling all their countrymen, where"ever diſtreſſed, to their former habitations; "and in order to the compaſſing of thoſe ends, "we have in the firſt place aſſigned twenty "thouſand pieces of ſilver toward the charges "of their ſacrifices, wine, oil; and frankin"cenſe; and for fine flower, according to the "cuſtom of the place, one thouſand four "hundred and ſixty meaſures of wheat, and "three hundred ſeventy five meaſures of ſalt; "and it is our will and pleaſure, that all this "may be executed and made good according "to my order; and then for any thing that "may be wanting toward the repairing of the "temple, porch, galleries, or whatever elſe, "it it our will that the timber be ſupplied, "whether from Judea, Libanus, or elſewhere, "without any tax or duty; and we do like"wiſe grant the ſame immunity for all other "materials, that ſhall be made uſe of for the "holy temple, with permiſſion moreover of "an univerſal liberty to live and govern them"ſelves according to their country-laws; and "we do hereby reſpectively diſcharge their "elders, prieſts, ſcribes, and ſinging-men, of "poll-taxes, royal duties, and of all other "tributes whatſoever; and for a further en"couragement to the ſpeedy re-peopling of "this city, we do by our royal authority grant "unto all the preſent inhabitants of the ſame, "and to ſuch others as ſhall come to reſide "there, at any time betwixt this and the month "of Hyperberetæus next enſuing, a total ex"emption

" emption from all publick impoſitions for the " ſpace of three years to come; and ſo like-
" wiſe from that time forward, an abatement
" of one third part of all taxes, in conſidera-
" tion of their paſt damages and ſufferings.
" And finally, whereas great numbers of theſe
" people have been carry'd away captive, and " remain to this day in bondage, we do far" ther command, that they be forthwith ſet
" at liberty, with reſtitution, in ſatisfaction
" for what had been taken from them. And
" ſo we bid you heartily farewel."

THIS gracious prince did not ſtop here neither; but follow'd his generous declaration in favour of the people, with another edict, which he caus'd to be publiſh'd all over his dominions, in ſubſtance as follows: that is to ſay, " That no ſtranger ſhall preſume to enter " into the temple, but with the conſent of the " Jews, and without being purify'd and qua-
" lify'd beforehand for his admittance, ac" cording to the laws of the country: that no " man ſhall dare to bring into the city, the " fleſh either of horſes or mules, or of aſſes,
" wild or tame; the fleſh of panthers, foxes,
" hares, or of any other creatures that the " Jews are not allow'd ſo much as to touch,
" nor the ſkins of any of them; nor to bring " up, or feed any of theſe, or any other crea" tures in the city, but ſuch as their forefa" thers, according to God's appointment, made
" uſe of for ſacrifices, upon the penalty of " * three thouſand drachmas, to be levy'd up-
" on every offender againſt the ſaid orders,
" for the uſe and benefit of the prieſts."

A ſecond edict of Antiochus relating to the Jews religion, laws, and cuſtoms.

THIS king had another eminent occaſion alſo to give the world a ſignal proof of the high eſteem he had for us in the matter of our piety and allegiance. Upon the breaking out of a commotion in Phrygia and Lydia, Zeuxes at that time commanding an army in the upland provinces, the king preſently order'd this general, a perſon for whom he had a ſingular reſpect, to ſend away from Babylon ſuch a number of the Jews there, into Phrygia, giving him his inſtructions in a letter to this effect:

The king Antiochus to Zeuxes, his friend and father, greeting.

Antiochus to his general Zeuxes, much to the reputation of the Jews.

" IF you are well, all is well; for I am ſo " too. Whereas I am given to under" ſtand, that there are ſeveral perſons who
" ſtrive to raiſe ſeditions and make innovati" ons in Phrygia and Lydia, it ſtands me up-
" on to look well about me betimes; ſo that " I am now to acquaint you that I am adviſed
" by my council, and friends, to take two " thouſand Jewiſh families out of Babylon and " Meſopotamia, and to tranſport them into " Phrygia, with their goods and whatever be" longs to them, and there to place them for " a guard in ſtrong holds and garriſons, be" ing thoroughly ſatisfy'd in the knowledge
" I have of their zeal and fidelity; not only " from the principles of their religion, but " from the proof and experience of their al" legiance to my anceſtors. Wherefore, it is " my pleaſure (all difficulties notwithſtand-
" ing) that they be forthwith tranſplanted;
" giving them all aſſurance, that they ſhall
" ſtill enjoy the freedom of their own laws
" and cuſtoms. And upon their arrival there,
" you are to aſſign them lands and poſſeſſions,
" with all ſorts of conveniencies for building,
" planting and tillage; with an immunity al-
" ſo from all taxes and contributions, out of " the profits for ten year to come. And in " the mean while, till they may be able to " ſupport themſelves out of the fruits of their " own induſtry, you are to allow them a com" petent proviſion of wheat, for the main" tenance of themſelves and their families:
" by which kind uſage they will be encou" raged to act more chearfully in our ſervice.
" You are finally to take care, that they be " not expoſed to any ſort of trouble or mo-
" leſtation. And ſo we bid you farewel."

THIS is enough to ſhew what eſteem Antiochus the great had for the Jews: after which, there followed a league of amity and alliance betwixt this king and Ptolemy, upon a marriage with his daughter Cleopatra, who had in lieu of a portion, Cele-Syria, Phenicia, Judea and Samaria. The revenue was in partition betwixt the two kings, and let out in farm to ſome of the principal men in the reſpective provinces, who took care of the collections, and ſo paid their proportions into the king's treaſury, according to the contract.

Antiochus marries Cleopatra the daughter of Ptolemy.

THE Samaritans were at this time proud and powerful, and moſt particularly troubleſome and vexatious in their inroads upon the Jews; carrying ſeveral of them away captives; and this ravage was committed chiefly in the time of the high-prieſt Onias: for after the death of Eleazar, his uncle Manaſſes took the pontificate; and after his death, ſucceeded Onias, the ſon of Simon the Juſt; which Simon was the brother of Eleazar, as we have ſaid already. This Onias was weak and covetous, to the degree of refuſing the king the coſtomary tribute of † twenty talents, which his anceſtors ſtill made to him, in acknowledgment of a duty. This coarſe behaviour of Onias, incenſed Ptolemy Euergetes the father of Philopator to ſuch a degree, that he ſent an embaſſador expreſly to Jeruſalem, with a menace to demand the payment of it, upon the peril of having an army quarter'd upon their country at diſcretion, and a new plantation ſettled there, if they did not immediately comply. This meſſage gave the Jews moſt terrible apprehenſions; but Onias out-faced the danger, his heart being only ſet upon his money.

The Samaritans bitter enemies to the Jews.

Manaſſes had the pontificate after his nephew Eleazar, and Onias, a weak prince, ſucceeded Manaſſes.

Ptolemy menaces Onias by his embaſſador Athenion, for refuſing to pay him his annual tribute.

CHAP. IV.

Joſeph, the nephew of Onias, begs his uncle's pardon of Ptolemy; makes his own fortune by it, and advances his ſon Hyrcanus. The death of Joſeph.

THERE was one Joſeph, the ſon of Tobias, by the ſiſter of Onias the high-prieſt. This Joſeph was a young man, but for his integrity Joſeph the nephew of Onias.

* Three thouſand drachma's, reckoning a drachma worth ſeven pence of our money, amounted to eighty ſeven pound ten ſhillings.

† Twenty Hebrew talents weighed two thouſand two hundred and eighty one pound, three ounces, and their value in ſilver amounted to ſix thouſand eight hundred and forty three pound fifteen ſhillings of our money.

tegrity, prudence and juſtice, a perſon of great reputation among the Jews. While he was one time at Phichola, the place of his birth, his mother ſent him an account of the meſſenger before ſpoken of, and of his buſineſs, who went immediately with an invective to Onias for ſo manifeſt an expoſure of the publick peace; reproaching him withal, that if he could but ſave his money, he car'd not what became of the people, to whom he ſtood indebted for his promotion, both ſacerdotal and civil. But however, if his heart was ſo overcome with the love of money, that he would ſacrifice his country, friends and all, rather than part with it, he adviſed him at leaſt to make a dutiful application to the king about it, and to try if he could get the whole, or at leaſt ſome part of it remitted. Onias made anſwer, that he was not ſo fond of his place either in church or ſtate, but he could willingly part with both, if it were permitted him, rather than go to the king upon that errand; and that for his part he would not meddle in the matter. Why then, ſays Joſeph, will you give me leave to attend the king upon the ſame commiſſion? Onias told him [with all his heart.] So Joſeph went up to the temple, where he called a congregation, and bad them chear up their hearts, for he was in hope that this failing of his uncle would have no further ill conſequence; telling them, that if they thought fit, he would wait upon the king himſelf in their name, and do the beſt he could to ſet matters right again. The whole multitude gave him thanks for the propoſal, and ſo left the buſineſs entirely to his management. Joſeph, upon this, went his way preſently to find out the king's commiſſioner; and when he had treated him ſplendidly for ſome certain days, and made him rich preſents, he diſmiſs'd him to his maſter again, with an aſſurance that he himſelf would follow him very ſuddenly. Joſeph's heart was now ſet more and more upon this expedition, being not only encouraged and invited to it by the king's meſſenger, but ſure alſo of the beſt ſervice he could do him there; who made no doubt at all neither, but that upon ſuch an application, Joſeph might gain his point. This perſon was mightily taken with the good graces and addreſs of the young man; and upon his return into Egypt, reflecting abundantly upon the ingratitude of Onias, he did not forget at the ſame time, to ſpeak the beſt things in the world of Joſeph, who he ſaid would be there himſelf e'er long, on the behalf of the people; which office he had now taken upon himſelf, to atone for the ill-natur'd lazineſs of his uncle. This miniſter, in fine, was ſo taken up ſtill upon the ſubject of Joſeph's character and commendations, that the king and his wife Cleopatra were half in love with him before ever they ſaw him. Upon this occaſion, Joſeph ſent to his friends in Samaria to take up money for his equipage; which in clothes, horſes, carriages, plate, and other neceſſaries, ſtood him in a matter of * twenty thouſand drachma's. He had the hap, in his way to Alexandria, to fall into company with a train of the princes and nobility of Syria and Phenicia, who were at that time trooping up to the king to treat with him about his revenue, according to a yearly cuſtom they had of putting it up by the way of outcry to the faireſt bidder. Theſe great men made themſelves merry at the poor pitiful appearance of Joſeph and his retinue: but he kept on his way ſtill, directly to Alexandria; and being there informed that the king was ſtill at Memphis, he proſecuted his Journey; and had the good hap to meet him ſitting in his chariot with the queen, and his particular confident Athenion, in his return to Alexandria. This Athenion was the perſon that carry'd the embaſſy to Jeruſalem, and was ſo honourably treated by Joſeph there. Joſeph was no ſooner in his eye, but he gave the king to underſtand that this was the young man whom he had ſpoken ſo many excellent things of, at his coming back from Jeruſalem. Ptolemy upon this, ſtopt and ſaluted him, and took him into his chariot; complaining upon the firſt greeting, how ill he had been us'd by Onias. "Sir (ſays Joſeph) an old man is the "ſecond time a child, and I hope your ma- "jeſty will impute nothing to Onias beyond "that infirmity; but for the young men that "are in their vigour of ſtrength and under- "ſtanding, I dare be anſwerable for it, that "you ſhall not find any one of us wanting in "his duty." The king was ſo delighted with this taſte of Joſeph's diſcretion and civility, upon this firſt interview, that he gave orders immediately for the lodging of him in his own palace, and entertaining of him at his own table; which ſingular reſpect gave no ſmall diſguſt to the envious Syrian noblemen, when they came to ſee at Alexandria the honour that was done to Joſeph.

THE day of auction was now come on, when the ſeveral branches of the revenue were to be put up, and the nobility of every ſeveral province reſpectively to bid for the purchaſe; ſo they came to a contract for eight thouſand talents upon the duties out of Cele-Syria, Phenicia, Judea and Samaria. Joſeph blam'd the contractors, for beating down the compoſition ſo much below the value, and propounded the doubling of it himſelf, over and above the forfeitures, which theſe publicans had reſerved for themſelves. The king was very well pleas'd with this propoſal for the improvement of his revenue, and in favour of the propoſer himſelf too. But what ſecurity can you give, ſays he, for the performance of what you undertake; Joſeph pleaſantly enough reply'd, that he could give him the ſecurity of perſons beyond all exception; and upon the king's bidding him name them, his anſwer was, that he doubted not, but his majeſty and the queen would be bound one to another for his honeſty and juſtice. The king, in fine, was ſo well ſatisfy'd with this ingenious way of proceeding, that he intruſted him with his revenue upon his word, without any other ſureties. This ſurprizing preference of a ſtranger, put the reſt of the undertakers exceedingly out of humour, and out of countenance, to think of going back again with ſhame and repulſe.

Joſeph reaſons the caſe of Ptolemy with his uncle, but can do no good upon him.

Joſeph courts Athenion with treats and preſents. Athenion goes back to to his maſter, and Joſeph promiſes to follow him.

Athenion does Joſeph all good offices:

While Joſeph provides for his journey.

He falls in upon the way with a train of great perſons going to treat with the king about farming his revenue.

The king happens to meet Joſeph upon the way; and upon Athenion's telling him who he was, the king takes him into his chariot.

The king blames Onias: and Joſeph imputes it to age and infirmity.

The king entertains him in his own palace.

Upon the bidding for the farm, Joſeph offers double to the reſt of the contractors.

The king agrees with him without ſecurity.

* Twenty thouſand drachma's came to about five hundred and eighty three pounds, ſix ſhillings, and four pence, of Engliſh money.

Joseph with a guard of 2000 soldiers, goes to Askalon, to collect the duty.

JOSEPH, upon being taken into this truſt, deſir'd a guard of two thouſand ſoldiers to ſupport him in the collecting of the duty, in caſe of any oppoſition; which guard was granted him; and thereupon having borrow'd * five hundred talents of the king's friends in Alexandria, he went his way into Syria. Upon his coming to Askalon, and demanding the king's tribute there, they did not only refuſe him the money, but affronted him outrageouſly with foul words; but he preſently cauſed his ſoldiers to take up twenty of the ringleaders, and inflict exemplary juſtice upon them; raiſing a † thouſand talents out of their forfeited eſtates, and ſent the treaſure to the king, with a particular account of what had been done. The king was ſo wonderfully taken with the conduct and diſcretion of the proceeding, that he entruſted him after that to do whatever he thought fit. The freſh example of this ſeverity upon the people of Askalon, wrought ſuch an effect upon the reſt of the Syrians elſewhere, that they ſet their gates open in all places to Joſeph, and without any difficulty, or ſcruple, paid their taxes.

The people riſe againſt him, and he makes twenty of the ringleaders examples.

Scythopolis follows the preſident of Askalon in the ſtubbornneſs of the faction, and Joſeph makes them as exemplary in their puniſhment.

The inhabitants of Scythopolis followed the precedent alſo of Askalon, in the obſtinate refuſal of their cuſtomary impoſitions, and in the contempt of the king's officers and authority; ſo that Joſeph was forced to deal with the heads of the faction there, as he had done before with thoſe at Askalon; confiſcating their eſtates, and applying the forfeitures to the king's uſe, and the maintenance of the government; accounting it a point of wiſdom to ſecure what they had got, and to make their country maintain it ſelf; to ſay nothing of the many rich preſents that were made by-the-bye, both to the king and to his people; and many more to the king's well-wiſhers and favourites; by which means Joſeph both gained friends, and kept them.

How Joſeph came to marry Solymius's daughter, by whom he had Hyrcanus.

JOSEPH liv'd in this ſtate of proſperity for the ſpace of two and twenty years, having had ſeven ſons by one wife, and another by the daughter of his brother Solymius, whoſe name was Hyrcanus, whom he took to wife upon this occaſion.

Joſeph falls in love with a beautiful woman at Alexandria.

TRAVELLING one time in company with his brother to Alexandria, to find out ſome Jew of quality that might be a match for a daughter of his that he took along with him, and was at that time marriageable; as he was at ſupper with the king, he fell paſſionately in love with a beautiful maid that he ſaw dance there for the king's entertainment. He made his brother his only confident of the ſecret, deſiring him that ſince he could not lawfully enjoy her as his wife, (being a ſtranger) he would do him the good office to bring them together privately. His brother, promiſing that he would do what he could in it, dreſs'd up his own daughter, and at night put her to bed to him. Joſeph, who had drunk pretty plentifully, paſs'd the firſt night by a miſtake with his brother's daughter, and never found the error. This abuſe was put upon him over and over, and the oftner he enjoy'd this converſation, the more enamour'd he grew of his miſtreſs, till at laſt he made his moan to his brother, that he was afraid he ſhould never get that love out of his heart; beſide that he fear'd the king would never agree to make a match of it. As for that fancy, ſays Solymius, trouble your head no farther; for you may lawfully enjoy the woman you love, and enjoy her as your wife too. Solymius confeſſed the whole matter to him; and that he had rather choſen to ſuffer an affront in the perſon of his daughter, than to have his brother guilty of ſo diſhonourable a ſin. Joſeph upon this diſcovery, extoll'd his brother's tenderneſs and friendſhip to the ſkies, and marry'd his daughter; by whom he had Hyrcanus, as we have ſaid already. This ſame Hyrcanus, at thirteen years of age, gave the world ſuch hopes of him, to all the purpoſes of generoſity, underſtanding, and good-nature, that the pregnancy of this youth (being the youngeſt of that ſtock) drew a mortal envy upon him from the reſt of his brothers; as having the reputation of an advantage over all the reſt. Now Joſeph, out of a deſire to make an experiment, which of his children was the beſt inclin'd, ſent them one by one to the moſt expert maſters he could think of in their ſeveral profeſſions; but betwixt ſloth and lazineſs, they all came home again as ignorant as they went out. Joſeph, after this, ſent his youngeſt ſon Hyrcanus, upon a ſeven days journey into a deſart with three hundred pair of oxen to plough and ſow there, having firſt privately taken away the lines that ſhould couple the yoak and the plough together. When he came to the place, and wanted his tackle, he was adviſ'd by ſome husbandmen to ſend home to his father for it; but he was againſt loſing ſo much time, and therefore bethought himſelf of an invention that look'd liker the ſtratagem of an old beaten ſoldier than the ſhift of a child; that is to ſay, he cauſed ten yoak of oxen to be kill'd, dividing the fleſh among his workmen; and cutting the skins into thongs, he tack'd the oxen and their gears together; plough'd up the ground, and ſow'd it as his father had order'd him, and ſo went home again. Upon his return, his father kiſſed and embraced him, bleſſing himſelf at his preſence of thought, and the prudence of his behaviour, and to conſider, that ſo very a youth ſhould have the ſteddineſs of mind to put ſo extraordinary an invention in execution. So that Hyrcanus was to his father as if he had been his only ſon; but his brothers hated him.

Joſeph thanks him for his friendſhip, and marries his daughter, by whom he hath Hyrcanus.

The early pregnancy and reputation of Hyrcanus, being the youngeſt of eight ſons, makes the reſt hate him

The prudence and ſagacity of Hyrcanus.

ABOUT this time, there was news brought to Joſeph that the queen was deliver'd of a ſon, to the exceeding joy of the princes and great men of Syria, who preſently marched together in great pomp to Alexandria, to gratulate the king and the court upon this bleſſing; only Joſeph, by reaſon of his age, was forced to ſtay behind. But he had a mind however to feel how his ſons ſtood affected to this expedition; and upon putting them to the queſtion, "one did not underſtand the ways "of the court, (he ſaid) another made a diffi-"culty of ſhewing himſelf to the king;" and ſo with one pretence after another, they put it to Joſeph ſending a preſent could not be his wife, and therefore he gives her to his miſtreſs Solymius gives his daughter to bed to him.

* Five hundred talents weighed thirty eight thouſand and twenty pound ten ounces, and their value in ſilver amounted to one hundred and fourteen thouſand and ſixty two pounds ten ſhillings, of our money.

† The talents here meant we take to be the Syrians, one of which weighed fourteen pound three ounces one pennyweight and twenty one grains, and its value in ſilver amounted to forty two pound, fifteen ſhillings, and fivepence halfpenny half farthing; a thouſand muſt therefore weigh fourteen thouſand two hundred and fifty ſeven pound nine ounces fifteen pennyweights, and amount in value to forty two thouſand ſeven hundred and ſeventy three pound eighteen ſhillings and nine pence.

Joſeph ſends Hyrcanus upon a compliment to Ptolemy to joy him on the birth of a young prince.

their father to ſend Hyrcanus, on the errand; which he was very glad to hear, and had him call'd immediately. "Son, (ſays Joſeph) "what if I ſhould ſend you now upon a com- "pliment to the king? could you behave "your ſelf, do you think, as you ought to "do?" Why Sir, ſays Hyrcanus, I ſhould take it for a great honour to be ſo employ'd, and moſt readily obey you. And ſays he further, I ſhould not put you to any great expence neither; for I would manage every thing as well as I could, and a matter of ten thouſand drachma's would do my buſineſs. The father was much delighted with his ſon's ſobriety and moderation; and ſo the diſcourſe ſtopt for a while, till the ſon after a little pauſe broke the ſilence. "Sir, (ſays he) if I durſt "be ſo free with you, I would propoſe it to "you not to ſend the king any preſents from "this place; but rather to write to your a- "gent at Alexandria, to furniſh me where- "withal to buy the richeſt, and the moſt a- "greeable curioſities for preſents for the king, "that are to be had for money." Joſeph reckon'd upon it, that about ten * talents, perhaps, might ſerve the turn; ſo that he comply'd with his ſon, and gave him letters of credit to Arion his caſh-keeper at Alexandria, who had ſome † three thouſand talents at that time in his hands; it being Joſeph's method ſtill to remit thither the collections he receiv'd in Syria, to be there return'd into the treaſury upon the preciſe pay-day; which Arion was intruſted to take care of. Hyrcanus was no ſooner diſpatch'd, but away he went to Arion at Alexandria with his letters; his brothers at the ſame time being engag'd in a ſecret practice and deſign upon his life. Upon the delivery of his credentials, Arion asked him how many talents would ſerve his turn; computing that about ten talents, or ſomewhat over, might be ſufficient. Hyrcanus told him, that he ſhould have occaſion for a ‡ thouſand talents. What, ſays Arion, to be ſquander'd away in luxury and profuſion? No no, Sir, (ſays he) your father made his fortune by induſtry and good husbandry, and you ſhould do well to tread in his ſteps. In ſhort, you are like to have but ten talents of me, and I will ſee every penny of the money laid out upon the preſents too. This inſolence of his, provoked Hyrcanus to put him in chains. Now the wife of Arion being much in the queen's favour, carry'd the tidings of this adventure preſently to her miſtreſs; and the queen imparted it to the king, not without ſomewhat of reproach upon the raſhneſs and intemperance of the young man. This complaint was ſoon follow'd by a meſſage from the king to Hyrcanus, giving to underſtand, that he being ſent expreſly by his father to attend his majeſty, he very much wonder'd that he ſhould never come at him; and not only at that neither, but likewiſe at his taking upon him to impriſon his father's agent; wherefore it was his majeſty's command, that he ſhould wait upon him, and acquit himſelf, if he could, of the charge that was exhibited againſt him. Hyrcanus deſir'd the meſſenger to inform the king, that by the Jewiſh law no man was permitted to eat of the fleſh of any thing that was ſacrificed, who had not been firſt in the temple, and offered ſacrifice himſelf; which by a parity of reaſon was his very caſe, for he durſt not wait upon his majeſty till he had firſt preſented the oblations which his father had intruſted him withal, in teſtimony of his gratitude and duty; and for the matter of puniſhing a ſervant for his diſobedience, he thought, with ſubmiſſion, that he had great right on his ſide; for the relation is ſo near betwixt great maſters and little ones, that an ill example in a ſubject ſtretches in the conſequence to the king himſelf; for where the contempt of authority paſſes with impunity, the precedent is contagious. The king could not but ſmile and wonder at the hearing of this, to find ſo great a ſoul in a perſon of ſo green years.

Joſeph gives him letters of credit to Arion his agent at Alexandria.

Hyrcanus haſtens away to Arion.

Hyrcanus demands 1000 talents for preſents.

Arion expoſtulates the matter, and Hyrcanus puts him in chains.

Ptolemy ſends for Hyrcanus to chide him for what he had done.

Hyrcanus excuſes himſelf at preſent, in ſuch a manner as gives the king great ſatisfaction.

ARION perceiving by this time that his court-intereſt fail'd him, deliver'd the thouſand talents that were demanded of him, as a compoſition for his liberty. After three days, Hyrcanus went to court to pay his reſpects to the king and queen; where he had the honour out of a ſingular reſpect they bore to his father, to be admitted to their table. While this was in agitation, he contracted privately with certain merchants for a hundred of the moſt beautiful youths that were to be gotten, at a talent a head, and as many lovely ingenious girls at the ſame price. Being invited after this to the king's entertainment, together with other perſons of the moſt eminent quality, the officers that had the ordering of the ceremony in the ranging of the gueſts, aſſigned Hyrcanus, being but a youth, the loweſt place at the table. When the reſt of the company had fill'd their bellies with the fleſh, they laid their bones together by conſent, in a mockery, before Hyrcanus; and ſet on Tryphon, a jeſting buffoon that the king took pleaſure to make ſport with; who in his buffooning way deſir'd the king to take notice what a heap of bones Hyrcanus had before him. Juſt ſo, ſays he, has the father pick'd the bones of all Syria, as the ſon has ſerv'd thoſe bones that are now before him. The king could not but ſmile at the drollery of the conceit, and asked Hyrcanus how he came to have ſuch a pile of bones before him. Oh Sir, ſays he, there's no wonder in it at all; for the dogs devour fleſh, and bones and all, pointing with his eye to thoſe that had none before them; but men, ſays he, ſuch as I am, when they have eat the fleſh, throw away the bones as I do. The king found him ſo facetious, that he not only applauded him himſelf, but recommended him alſo to the reſpect and kindneſs of the company.

Arion at laſt ſupplies Hyrcanus with the thouſand talents; and ſo he provides his preſents.

Hyrcanus being treated ſoon after at the king's table, the gueſts ſet Tryphon, a buffoon, upon him to make ſport with him.

Hyrcanus's ſharp and ingenious way of acquainting himſelf.

HYRCANUS made his court upon the day following to the king's friends, and the great men about him; where he artfully pump'd out of the ſervants what preſents their maſters
